FOREWORD.

WITH this volume are presented the histories of seven counties in Central Oregon, aside from a general history of the state. It is nearly a year since the compilation of this work was begun, and the historical part alone has occupied the time and attention of four writers. In the collection of this valuable data cheerful assistance has been rendered by so many prominent residents and pioneers of the territory covered that it would be invidious to make special mention of any, but to all who have so willingly contributed to make this history as reliable and authentic as possible, we return our most sincere thanks.

Histories of the state of Oregon have been written before and the field ably covered in a general way. But this, the latest work of the kind, goes more deeply into county detail and contains some features that have never before been presented to the public. For instance the two portraits of the Indian pilgrims to St. Louis in search of the 'White Man's Book,' were procured by us from the Smithsonian Institute, and we believe they have never before been reproduced in any history. Their arduous journey, from a historical viewpoint, forms one of the most romantic episodes in the story of the old and famous Territory of Oregon.

In the compilation of this work Mr. F. A. Shaver, collaborating with Arthur P. Rose, R. F. Steele and A. E. Adams, has given to the public as complete and reliable a history as time and money could make it. That this is substantiated by the citizens of Central Oregon will be seen from the voluntary endorsements of seven committees representing seven counties.

GENERAL STATE HISTORY

CHAPTER I

---

EXPLORATIONS, COASTWISE AND INLAND.

"Far as the breeze can bear the billows' foam, Survey our empire and behold our home."

—The Corsair.

The Seacoast of Oregon!

Historic region, rich with the legendary lore of earliest adventurers in America; struggles for national foothold in bitterly disputed territory; establishment of outposts, trading posts, rude forts, stockades and the ebb and flow of the tide of desultory warfare. A terra incognita; at one period lying above California and having no northern boundary known to man; a football of semi-piratical adventurers and the bone of contention of five nations. Such was the condition of the wide expanse of Oregon so early as 1550. It is ours to trace the gradual evolution of this great state from a dormant, benighted region; the hunting and battle fields of various tribes of Indians, and of various degrees of ferocity, through the fierce crucible of semi-civilization into the broad, fair light of industrial peace, business activity and full intellectual development.

Few students of history have failed to observe the immediate impetus given to maritime exploration by the royally proclaimed exploit of Columbus in 1492. Only nine years after the caravels of the Italian navigator had dropped anchor in American waters, off San Salvador, a Portuguese sailor, Gaspar Cortereal, was cautiously feeling his way along the Atlantic coast. This was in the summer of 1501. The voyage of Cortereal reached as high on the Atlantic mainland of North America as 42 degrees north. Some historians have advanced the claim that the explorations of Cortereal really antedated the discovery of Christopher Columbus. But of this there is no authentic evidence; there is a preponderance of testimony to the contrary. By eminent cosmographers the year 1501 is now accepted as the period of Cortereal's exploits on the coast of the Atlantic, in the vicinity of modern New England. This little fleet of two caravels had been dispatched by Manuel, King of Portugal. There is no proof that this voyage had any other object, or at least any other result, than pecuniary profit. Seizing fifty Indians he carried them away, on his return, and sold them as slaves.

As Cortereal was among the earliest on the Atlantic seaboard, so Juan Rodriguez Cabrillo, or Cabrilla, as the name is sometimes spelled, is admitted to have been the earliest navigator along southern California. It was, evidently, the intention of Cabrillo to continue his voyage far higher on the Northwest Coast, for he, too, had heard of the then mysterious "Strait of Anian," now modernized as Bering Strait, and was enthused with most laudable geographical ambition. But fate ruled otherwise. Cabrillo died in the harbor of San Diego, California, in January, 1543, fifty-one years after the momentous achievement of Columbus on the southeastern shores of the present United States. The mantle of Cabrillo fell upon the shoulders of his pilot, Bartolome Ferrelo. To within two and one-half degrees of the mouth of the Columbia river Ferrelo continued the exploration, tracing the western coast of the American continent along this portion of the Pacific, and to Ferrelo has been accredited the honor of having been the first white man to gaze upon the coast of Oregon.

But back of that dimly outlined shore which Ferrelo skirted, above latitude 42 degrees, far inland, lay the immense, wonderful territory that afterward became Oregon. It is not susceptible of proof that Ferrelo ever gained north of the present Astoria, although this claim was at one period urged by Spain. But a country which could solemnly lay claim to the whole Pacific ocean, by "right of discovery" by Balboa, would not be at all backward in declaring that one of her navigators was the first to sight the Northwest Coast, and that, too, far above the point really gained by Ferrelo. It is not considered likely that he reached above the mouth of Umpqua river.

Francis Drake was an English navigator, a privateer, a freebooter, a pirate and plunderer of Spanish galleons, yet withal a man of strong character and enterprising spirit. In 1577 he attempted to find a northwest passage. Drake probably reached as high as latitude 43 degrees, and dropped his anchors in the shoals of that region. No inland explorations were achieved by him, and he reluctantly abandoned the search for Anian, returned to Drake's Bay, on the coast of California, and subsequently to England around the Cape of Good Hope. En passant it is noticeable that during the subsequent famous Oregon Controversy, which obtained ascendancy in international politics two hundred and fifty years later, the discoveries of Drake were not presented by England in support of her claims for all territory north of the Columbia river. Whether Great Britain was doubtful of the validity of discoveries made by a freebooter, or attached no importance to his achievement, the fact remains that they were not urged with any force or enthusiasm. In that portion of the "History of North America," written by Alfred Brittain and edited by Guy Carleton Lee, Ph. D., the author says:

"Drake, in his voyage around the world, entered the Pacific through the Straits of Magellan in 1578, and sailing northward, after calling at various places to plunder Spanish ships, he reached a point where the cold and ice compelled him to turn south, and he put into a bay in California to refit. Here he landed and took formal possession of the country in the name of Queen Elizabeth and named the land New Albion. The exact place of his landing is uncertain, but it was not far from the Golden Gate."

When compelled to turn south by cold and ice Drake was, probably, in the vicinity of latitude 43 degrees north, perhaps many miles above. If so, he gained a higher point than had been reached by Ferrelo. Continuing Mr. Brittain says:

"By Drake's expedition, undertaken with the double object of exploring the Pacific ocean—the South Sea of the Spaniards—and of crippling England's secret enemy, the English formally acquired their first territory on the western shores of North America, though the acquisition was not followed up. The energies of England were to be directed to the explorations of lands already discovered on the eastern coast, and to the founding of the settlements that were soon to develop into well organized and enterprising colonies."

This coincides with the fact that England did not put forth her claims for a portion of Oregon based on any exploits of Drake—did not, in fact, follow up the acquisition. This must be borne in mind by the reader when he approaches the chapter relating to "The Oregon Controversy."

Cabrillo and Ferrelo were not emulated in maritime discoveries in the waters of the Northwest Coast, until 1550. But on the shore line of the Atlantic, Cartier, for six years, between 1536 and 1542, had made a number of inland voyages, ascending the St. Lawrence Gulf and river five hundred miles, past the site of Montreal and to the falls of St. Louis. In the far south Hernando De Soto, contemporary with Cartier, had sailed coastwise along the Florida peninsula and penetrated that tropical country until forced back by swamps, morasses and everglades. Inland exploration in the middle of the sixteenth century comprised, practically, in its northern limitations, a line crossing the continent a few miles below the 36th parallel, from the Colorado to the Savannahs, Coronado advancing into the modern Kansas, having passed the line at its central part. The Pacific had been explored sufficiently only to barely show the shore line to the 44th degree of north latitude.

In the way of northern exploration on the Pacific coast Spain had, in 1550, accomplished little or nothing. But fifteen years later Spain became aggressive along the lines of maritime activity. Urdaneta in 1565, planned and executed the initial voyage eastward, opening a northern route to the Pacific coast of North America. From the Philippines he was followed by Manila traders, eager for gain, and for two centuries thereafter, through the rise and decline of Spanish commercial supremacy, these active and energetic sailors reaped large rewards from the costly furs found in the waters of the Northwest Coast. It is fair to say that the spirit of commercialism contributed far more toward development of the region of which this history treats than did the more sentimental efforts of geographical science.

Still, the latter spirit was not without its apostles and propagandists. Among them was one who called himself Juan de Fuca, a Greek of Cephalonia. His real name was Apostolos Valerianos. Acting, as had Columbus, under royal commission from the King of Spain, he sailed bravely away to find the legendary Strait of Anian—the marine pathway between the greatest oceans of the world. The name of Anian, a mythical northwestern kingdom, originated in 1500, and it is said to have been taken in honor of a brother of Cortereal. The real strait was discovered by Russians in 1750. These Russians were fur-hunting Cossacks, who reached the Pacific coast of North America in 1639. Their point of rendezvous was at Okhotsk, on the sea of that name. The following short biography of Vitus Bering is from the Century Dictionary and Cyclopaedia:

Vitus Bering (or Behring) was born at Horsens, Jutland, 1680; died at Bering Island, 1741. A Danish navigator, in the Russian service, noted for discoveries in the North Pacific ocean. He explored the northern coast of Siberia in 1725, traversed Bering Strait (named from him), in 1728, proving that Asia and America are separated, and in 1741 explored the western coast of America to latitude 69 degrees north.

Though the voyage of Juan de Fuca never attained fruition, it must be conceded that it was conceived in the interest of science; a move in behalf of international economics, and honorable alike to both Spain and the intrepid navigator. In 1584 Francisco de Gali reached the Pacific coast, from the west, in 37 degrees 30 minutes. He was content to sail southward without landing, but recorded for the archives of Spain the trend and shore-line of the coast. By the same route Ceramenon, in 1595, met with disaster by losing his vessel in Drake's Bay, a short distance above the present city of San Francisco. Prominent among other voyagers, bent mainly on profit, were Espejo, Perea, Lopez and Captain Vaca.

As has been stated, the earliest explorations of the Northwest Coast were maritime. They were also, in the main, confined between latitudes 42 degrees and 54 degrees, mainly south of the boundary line finally accepted by Great Britain as between Canada and the United States. Even in that twilight preceding the broad day of inland discovery, there were wars between nations, with "Oregon" the issue; and some compromises. Later came the advance guard of inland explorers who found, at the occidental terminus of their perilous journeys, a comparatively unknown seaboard 750 miles in extent, below the vast reaches of Alaskan territory and the Aleutian Islands. From the far north came Russian explorers, and they encountered southern navigators who had come upward from the ambrosial tropics. They compared notes; they detailed to each other many facts, intermixed with voluminous fiction, but from the whole was picked out and arranged much of geographical certainty. Four nations of Pacific navigators came to what afterwards was known as Oregon, related their adventures, boasted of the discoveries each had made, discussed the probability of a northwest passage, the "Strait of Anian"—and the Northwest Mystery remained a mystery still.

And what a wealth of industrial resources lay back of the coast line within the vast territory of the ancient Oregon; the country above California with no known northern limits! Gold and silver, rich seal and salmon fisheries; coal; timber, at that period apparently inexhaustible; grain and fruit lands; extensive cattle and sheep ranges; splendid harbors, and, in short, every facility and resource necessary for a mighty empire. But it remained for future generations to recognize, grasp and develop these glorious possibilities. To these semi-barbaric early navigators all this knowledge was without their ken.

The Spaniards, between 1492 and 1550, were in the lead, so far as concerns actual geographical results, of all other European sailors. Spain, through the agency of the Italian, Columbus, had discovered a new world; Spain had meandered the coast line for 30,000 miles; from 60 degrees on the Atlantic coast of Labrador, round by Magellan Strait, to 40 degrees on the coast of the Pacific. Vast were the possibilities of the future for Spain, and the old world did honor to her unequalled achievements. From a broad, humanitarian point of view it is a sad reflection that so many of the golden promises held out to her should, in subsequent centuries, have faded away as fades the elusive rainbow against the storm-cloud background. But Spain's misfortune became North America's opportunity. England, too, and Russia, watched and waited, seized and assimilated so rapidly as possible, piece by piece the territory on which the feet of Spanish explorers had first been planted. That it was the survival of the fittest may, possibly, be questioned, but it remains a fact that Spain's gradual, yet certain loss of the most valuable territory in the world has furnished many of the most stirring episodes in the world's history. Spain has lost, sold, ceded and relinquished vast domains to nearly all the modern powers of the Twentieth Century. And not the least valuable of Spain's former possessions are now under the Stars and Stripes.

It is interesting to note the vast shrinkage in the claims of Spain throughout successive years. She finally departed from the contest for Oregon. George Bancroft, in the best "History of the United States," so far written, says, volume 1, page 9:

"To prevent collision between Christian princes, on the 4th of May, 1493, Alexander VI published a bull in which he drew an imaginary line from the North Pole to the South, a hundred leagues west of the Azores, assigning to the Spanish all that lies west of that boundary, while all to the east of it was confirmed to Portugal."

Thus was the Northern Hemisphere arrogantly and farcically given to two nations. In the subsequent gradual deterioration of Spanish possessions, or rather, preposterous claims, one may consistently quote from the world's greatest dramatist,

"What a fall was there, my countrymen!"

Thus far has been hastily sketched the salient facts concerning the earliest maritime discoveries on the Northwest Coast. None of the Spanish, English, Russian or Italian navigators had penetrated inland farther than a few miles up the estuary of the Columbia river. It was destined to remain for a class of explorers other than maritime, yet equally courageous and enterprising, to blaze the trail for future pioneers from the east.

To Alexander Mackenzie, a native of Inverness, knighted by George III, is accredited the honor of being the first European to force a passage of the Rocky Mountains north of California. June 3, 1789, Mackenzie left Fort Chipewyan, situated at the western point of Athabasca lake, in two canoes. He was accompanied by a German, four Canadians, two of them with wives, an Indian named English Chief, and M. Le Roux, the latter in the capacity of clerk and supercargo of the expedition. The route of this adventurous party was by the way of Slave river and Slave lake, thence down a stream subsequently named Mackenzie river, on to the Arctic Ocean, striking the coast of the Pacific at latitude 52 degrees, 24 minutes, 48 seconds. This territory is all within the present boundaries of British Columbia, north of the line finally accepted as the northern boundary of "Oregon" by the English diplomats.

Singular as it may appear there is little authentic history of the origin of this term, "Oregon." There is, however, cumulative testimony to the effect that the name was invented by Jonathan Carver; that the name was exploited and made famous by William Cullen Bryant, late editor of the New York Evening Post and author of "Thanatopsis;" that it was fastened upon the Columbia river territory, originally by Hall Kelley, through his memorials to congress in 1837, and secondly by various other English and American authors. Aside from this explanation are numerous theories adducing Spanish derivatives of rather ambiguous context, but lacking lucidity or force. It is likely that no more etymological radiance will ever be thrown upon what, after all, is rather unimportant, though often mooted question. However, concerning the Spanish derivative, we can give no more convincing testimony than the following from the columns of the Portland Oregonian. To the Editor of the Oregonian the following question was propounded—"Will you please give the derivation, and the meaning of the word 'Oregon,' and oblige Many New Comers?" To this the Editor of the Oregonian replied as follows:

On the 15th of September, 1863, the late Archbishop Blanchett contributed the following interesting paper to the Oregonian, which fully answers the question. It will be observed that the archbishop speaks of himself in the third person:

"Jonathan Carver, an English captain in the wars by which Canada came into the possession of Great Britain, after the peace, left Boston June 6, 1766; crossed the continent to the Pacific and returned October, 1768. In relation to his travels which were published in 1778, he is the first who makes use of the word 'Oregon.' The origin of that word has never been discovered in the country. The first Catholic missionaries, Father Demers, now Bishop of Vancouver Island, and Father Blanchett, now Bishop of Oregon City, arrived in Oregon in 1838. They traveled through it for many years, from north to south, from west to east, visiting and teaching the numerous tribes in Oregon, Washington Territory and the British possessions. But in all their various excursions among the Indians they never succeeded in finding the origin of the word 'Oregon.'

"Now it appears that what could not be found in Oregon has been discovered by Archbishop Blanchett in Bolivia, when he visited that country, Chili and Peru, in 1855 and 1857. The word 'Oregon,' in his opinion, most undoubtedly has its root in the Spanish word oreja, (ear); and came from its qualifying word orejon (big ear). For it is probable that the Spaniards, who first discovered and visited the country, when they saw the Indians with big ears, enlarged by the load of ornaments, were naturally inclined to call them orejon (big ears). The nickname first given to the Indians became, also, the name of the country. This explains how Captain Carver got it and first made use of it. But the travelers, perhaps Carver himself, not knowing the Spanish language nor the particular pronunciation of the j in Spanish, for facility's sake, would have written it and pronounced it 'Oregon,' instead of 'Orejon'; in changing j to g. Such, in all probability, must be the origin of the word 'Oregon.' It comes from the Spanish word 'Oregon.' This discovery is due, in justice, to the learned Dr. George Haygarth, A. M., M. D., of London, a man well versed in the Spanish, whom the archbishop met in La Paz, Bolivia. So much for the etymology of the word 'Oregon.' This, probably, becomes a conviction when we consider how customary it is for travelers in a new country to give appropriate names and how generally these names are received, retained and pass to posterity. We have not a few instances of this practice on the Pacific coast, and in Oregon in particular."

We cannot but regard this explanation of the worthy archbishop as rather far-fetched and not, altogether, conclusive. The study of languages reveals too many words of similar orthography with, sometimes, diametrically opposite definitions. Again, it is nowhere recorded that Jonathan Carver ever visited the extreme Pacific coast at the time mentioned by the archbishop. Had he done so he would have antedated the Lewis and Clark expedition by between 36 and 40 years. Concerning Carver the Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia says:

Carver, Jonathan. Born at Stillwater, Conn., 1732; died at London, January 31, 1780. An American soldier and traveler, explorer of the region beyond the Mississippi. To find a northern passage to the Pacific, he started from Boston, June, 1766, explored the shores of Lake Superior, and proceeded as far west as the sources of the St. Pierre, returning in 1768. In 1769 he went to England. He published "Travels to the Interior parts of North America," including an account of the manners, customs, languages, etc., of the Indians (1778), "A Treatise on the Cultivation of the Tobacco Plant" (1779), etc.

Here we have nothing indicating that Jonathan Carver went so far west as the Pacific coast. We do have, however, the plain statement that Carver was "an American soldier," instead of an British officer, and that he was born in the New England state of Connecticut.

William Barrows, in his "Oregon: The Struggle for Possession," clearly demonstrates that Carver never gained the Pacific coast, and, probably, never entered the vast territory then known as "Oregon," Mr. Barrows says:

"Leading and prominent among explorers was Jonathan Carver, a hard soldier in the French and Indian wars, that terminated at Quebec, a rugged and daring pioneer, with a passion for forest life and all its wild adventures and thrilling incidents. In the late wars he had become inured to hardship, and he was enamored of the fascinations that lie along an unexplored border of wilderness. Carver left Boston in 1766, under the geographical delusion of the day, that North America was an archipelago, and that a sailing passage could be found, extending through to the Pacific. The leading purpose with him in his tour was to discover those mythical and always receding 'Straits of Anian,' as the channel was called. His head was fired with the vision of the discovery of a northwest passage, or a communication between Hudson Bay and the Pacific Ocean—an event so desirable and which has been so often sought for but without success. He returned in two years, having explored no farther than the present limits of Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota. He claimed that he was the first white man, after Hennepin, the French missionary, to explore the Mississippi as far up as the falls of St. Anthony."

The expedition of Mackenzie, crowned with results most valuable to science and territorial development, comprised one hundred and two days. At the point he first made on the Pacific coast the explorer executed with vermilion and grease a rude sign bearing the following inscription: "Alexander Mackenzie, from Canada by land, July 22, 1793." Subsequently expeditions were made by Mackenzie to the coast, one of them via the Peace river.

But now comes one M. Le Page du Pratz, a talented and scholarly French savant, with the statement, made several years ago, that neither Mackenzie nor Lewis and Clarke were the first to cross the Rockies and gain the Northwest Coast. Our French student claims to have discovered a Natchez Indian, being of the tribe of the Yahoos, called L'Interprete, on account of the various languages he had acquired, but named by his own people Moncacht Apé, "He Who Kills Trouble and Fatigue." M. Le Page declares that this man, actuated mainly by curiosity, a stimulant underlying all advancement, unassisted and unattended, traveled from the Mississippi river to the Pacific coast so early as 1743. This was sixty years before President Jefferson dispatched Captain Lewis and Clark on their governmental expedition, the results of which have proven so important and momentous in the history of the development of Oregon. Moncacht Apé, it is claimed, met many tribes of Indians, made friends with all of them, acquired portions of complex dialects, gained assistance and information and eventually gazed upon the same waters upon which Balboa had fixed his eyes, with enthusiasm, many hundreds of miles to the south.

It cannot be denied that hardly has a great discovery been heralded to the world ere some rival springs up to claim it. Possibly it was this spirit which may have actuated M. Le Page in producing the somewhat mysterious Moncacht Apé, to pose as the pioneer of the Northwestern exploration. But we, of today, are in no position to combat his claims, reserving to ourselves the undeniable fact that Mackenzie and Lewis and Clark were the first white men to gain, overland, the Northwest Coast.

From 1543 to 1803 this greatly abridged foreword has traced northwestern discoveries. We now enter upon a brief description of the glorious achievements of Lewis and Clark in that particular portion of their historic journey, commemorated this year by the magnificent exposition at Portland, Oregon, which proved so fruitful to this great state.

CHAPTER II

EXPLORATIONS BY LAND.

Following the exploration and rude charting of Puget Sound, and the discovery of the Columbia, for a number of years maritime adventure was quiescent. Activity in this direction was stimulated, however, not by an immediate prospect of penetrating the "Strait of Anian," but the possibility of finding vast auriferous deposits—gold—the legendary lore of the primitive country being highly embellished with a wealth of glittering fiction founded upon a modicum of fact.

In overland exploration the pioneer ship must be accorded to one Verendrye, although he utterly failed to discover a pass through the Rocky Mountains. But he made a number of determined efforts, and for these he deserves credit. He acted under the authority of the governor general of New France, setting out from Canada on an exploration of the Rocky Mountains in 1773. This gallant explorer and his brother and sons made many important expeditions, added much to the general knowledge of the country, but being unsuccessful their adventures scarcely come within the province of this volume.

The first traveler to lead a party of civilized men through the "Stony mountains to the South Sea" was Alexander Mackenzie. Yet his field of discovery, although adding much richness to the store-house of science, is, also, without the scope of our purpose, being too far north to figure prominently in the international complications of later years. Western exploration by land had, however, elicited the interest of one whose forcefulness and dominant energy were sufficient to bring to a successful issue almost every undertaking worth the effort. While other statesmen and legislators of his time were fully engaged with the ephemeral problems of the moment, the masterful mind of Thomas Jefferson, endowed with a wider range of vision and more comprehensive grasp of the true situation, was projecting exploring expeditions into the Northwest. In 1786, while serving as minister to France, he had fallen athwart the enthusiastic and ardent Ledyard, who was fired with the idea of opening a large and immensely profitable fur trade in the north Pacific region. To this young man the astute Jefferson suggested the idea of journeying to Kamtchatka; thence in a Russian vessel to Nootka sound, from which, as a point of departure, he should make an exploring expedition eastward to the United States. On this suggestion Ledyard acted. But in 1787, in the spring of that year, Ledyard was arrested as a spy by Russian officials, and harshly treated. This caused a failure of his health and a consequent failure of his enterprise.

Yet another effort was made by the indomitable Jefferson in 1792. He then proposed to the American Philosophical Society that it should engage a competent scientist "to explore north-west America from the eastward by ascending the Missouri river, crossing the Rocky Mountains and descending the nearest river to the Pacific ocean." This glorious idea was quite favorably received. Captain Meriwether Lewis, who afterward distinguished himself as one of the leaders of the Lewis and Clark expedition, at once professed his services. But for some reason Andre Michaux, a French botanist, was given the preference. Michaux proceeded as far as Kentucky, but there received an order from the French minister to whom, it seems, he owed equal obedience, that he should relinquish his appointment and engage upon the duties of another commission. Whether this abrupt countermand was inspired by a spirit of national jealousy, or from a disposition to retard American enterprise in the extreme northwest, is not known. Suffice it to say that Michaux at once threw up his commission and returned to the French legation.

Thus it chanced that it was not until the dawn of a new century that another opportunity for furthering his favorite project presented itself to Jefferson. An act of congress, under which trading-houses had been established for facilitating commerce with the Indians, was about to expire by limitation. In recommending its continuance President Jefferson seized the opportunity to urge upon congress the advisability of fitting out an expedition "to explore the Missouri river and such of its principal streams as, by its course of communication with the waters of the Pacific ocean, whether the Columbia, Oregon, Colorado or any other river, may offer the most direct and practical water communication across the continent, for the purpose of commerce."

An appropriation was voted by congress; the expedition was placed in charge of Captains Meriwether Lewis and William Clark. Minute and particular instructions concerning investigations to be made by them were communicated by President Jefferson. They were to inform themselves should they win their way to the Pacific ocean "of the circumstances which may decide whether the furs of those parts may be collected as advantageously at the headwaters of the Missouri (convenient as is supposed to the Colorado and Oregon and Columbia) as at Nootka sound or any other part of that coast; and the trade be constantly conducted through the Missouri and United States more beneficially than by the circumnavigation now practiced." In addition to these instructions the explorers were directed to ascertain if possible on arrival at the sea board if there were any ports within their reach frequented by the sea going vessels of any nation, and to send, if practicable, two of their most trusted people back by sea with copies of their notes. They were, also, if they deemed a return by the way they had come imminently hazardous, to ship the entire party and return via Cape of Good Hope or Cape Horn, as they might be able.

It was destined that material significance should be added to this enterprise. A few days before the initial steps were taken in discharge of the instructions of President Jefferson, negotiations had been successfully consummated for the purchase of Louisiana, April 30, 1803. But the authorities at Washington, D. C., did not learn of this momentous event, fraught with such immense profit to the United States, until the 1st of July. Of such transcendent import to the future of our country was this transaction and of such vital moment to the section with which our volume is primarily concerned, that we must here interrupt the trend of our narrative to communicate to the reader an idea of the extent of territory involved and, if possible, to enable him to more fully appreciate the influence of that purchase. France, by her land explorations and the establishment of trading posts and forts, first acquired title to the territory west of the Mississippi and east of the Rocky Mountains, although Great Britain claimed the territory in accordance with her doctrine of continuity and contiguity, the greater number of her colonial grants, by express terms, extending to the Pacific ocean. Spain also, claimed the country by grant of Pope Alexander VI. Concerning these conflicting claims William Barrows, in his valuable work, "Oregon: The Struggle for Possession," says:

In 1697, the year of the Treaty of Ryswick, Spain claimed as her share of North America, on the Atlantic coast, from Cape Romaine on the Carolina shore a few miles north of Charleston, due west to the Mississippi river, and all south of that line to the Gulf of Mexico. That line, continued beyond the Mississippi, makes the northern boundary of Louisiana. In the valley of the lower Mississippi Spain acknowledged no rival, though France was then beginning to intrude. On the basis of discovery by the heroic De Soto and others, she claimed up to the heads of the Arkansas and the present famous Leadville, and westward to the Pacific. On that ocean, or the South Sea, as it was then called, she set up the pretensions of sovereignty from Panama to Nootka sound on Vancouver. These pretensions covered the coasts, harbors, islands and fisheries, and extended themselves indefinitely inland, and even over the whole Pacific ocean, as then limited. These stupendous claims Spain based on discovery, under the papal bull of Alexander VI in 1493. This bull or decree gave to the government of the discoverer all newly discovered lands and waters. In 1513 Balboa, the Spaniard, discovered the Pacific ocean, as he came over the Isthmus of Panama, and so Spain came into the ownership of that body of water. Good old times, those were, when kings thrust their hands into the New World, as children do theirs into a grab-bag at a fair, and drew out a river four thousand miles long, or an ocean, or a tract of wild land ten or fifteen times the size of England.

At the Ryswick partition of the world, France held good positions in America for the mastery of the continent. Beginning on the Mississippi, where the Spanish line crossed it, that is, where Louisiana and Arkansas unite two of their corners on the Father of Waters, the French claimed east on the Spanish boundary, and north of it to the watershed between the head streams dividing for the Atlantic and the Mississippi. Their claim was bounded by this highland line, continuing north and east, and still separating Atlantic streams from those flowing into the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. Where this line reached the springs of the Penobscot it followed its waters to the ocean. It was the proud thought of France that from the mouth of the Penobscot along the entire seaboard to the unknown and frozen Arctic, no European power divided that coast, and the wild interior back of it, with her. So France claimed indefinitely north to the farther rim of Hudson Bay, and wildly west to the heads of the Mississippi and Missouri, and thence down to our two corners of Louisiana and Arkansas. This gave to France even the western parts of Virginia, Pennsylvania and New York, and a large portion of New England, as we now name those sections. Certain vague doubts hung over those French claims in the great north land after the convention of Ryswick, but were claims of little worth.

A constant warfare had been waged between France and Great Britain for supremacy in America. The latter was the winner in the contest, and, in 1762, France, apparently discouraged, ceded to Spain the province of Louisiana. By the treaty of February 10, 1763, which gave Great Britain the Canadas, it was agreed that the western boundary between England and Spanish possessions in America should be the Mississippi river, Great Britain renouncing all claim to the territory west of that boundary. In 1800 Spain retroceded Louisiana to France "with the same extent it has now in the hands of Spain, and which it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be according to the treaties subsequently made between Spain and other states."

As above stated the order for the formal delivery of the province to France was by the Spanish king, issued October 15, 1802. The United States succeeded to the title by treaty of April 30, 1803. The three ministers conducting the negotiations ceding Louisiana territory to the United States were Monroe and Livingston, representing the United States, and Barbe-Marbois, selected by Napoleon to represent France. In his well written and entertaining book, "First Across the Continent," Mr. Noah Brooks says: "The details of this purchase were arranged in Paris (on the part of the United States) by Robert R. Livingston and James Madison." This is entirely incorrect. James Madison was at the time secretary of state, and merely acted in an official capacity in the ratification of the treaty. James Monroe and Livingston, in Paris, working co-jointly with Barbe-Marbois, a minister of the French public treasury, arranged the details of this important "deal in real estate." At that period Marbois' relations with Napoleon were close and confidential, and the current traditions of Napoleon's attitude throughout the negotiations is a more or less inaccurate version of the report made by Marbois in his "Historie de la Louisiane," written after the Bourbon restoration and published in Paris by the Didots in 1829. The original edition, now rare in the United States, one of the earlier, if not the earliest, contains the French maps of "the territory added to the United States by the treaty." Still, interesting as all this is, it can not compare in importance with the summary of the situation then existing as Marbois gives it, and with his report of Napoleon's conversations and speeches on the subject.

The second part of this work, which is devoted to the treaty and its effects on the destinies of the world—which with surprising foresight he fully appreciated—opens with a valuable summary of the attitude of the United States toward France and England. He shows that the defeated Federalists were taking advantage of Jefferson's well-known French sympathies to press against France and against the administration of the United States the dangerous questions which had been raised by the attitude of the West in demanding assurances of the free navigation of the Mississippi. "Although a very active faction in Congress," he writes, "worked secretly to force a declaration of war against France by the United States, the chiefs of the administration desired sincerely to preserve the good understanding. On its side the Consular government (Napoleon personally) seemed to wish to follow toward the republic a course opposed to that of the directory. War between France and England seemed inevitable, and the American Cabinet easily understood that in case it was declared the French consul would be under the necessity of postponing the occupation of Louisiana."

He then quotes from the message of December 18, 1802, in which Jefferson called the attention of Congress to the importance of the reoccupation of Louisiana by France, and details the circumstances under which Monroe went forth to France to reinforce Livingston, who was already in Paris attempting to negotiate for the city of New Orleans and the territory which controlled the mouth of the Mississippi.

To understand the attitude of Napoleon it must be recalled that in becoming first consul he had announced himself as a pacificator of the world, and after attempting to conciliate the powers in the treaty of Amiens, had continued vigorously to attempt to reconstruct France in accordance with his own ideas. This he considered the object of paramount importance at the time, and whatever plans he had for extending the empire of France over Europe were to be postponed until he had firmly intrenched himself at home and completely reorganized France. For doing this he had, in a great measure, carried out his plans, when he saw that England was once more about to take the aggressive against him—this just at a time when he was preparing to cease to be first consul and to become "Napoleon the First."

This is the situation which Marbois defines, and it explains the stimulus under which Napoleon's genius acted in reaching the decision that there must be a radical change in the attitude of France toward the United States. After the Revolutionary War France had hoped to hold the United States as a ward under an informal French protectorate and had co-operated with Spain to that end. To keep the United States surrounded by French and Spanish territory was part of this plan. When Monroe sailed for France Napoleon seems to have reached a decision, foreshadowed in a conversation in the Tuileries, to abandon once for all the idea of controlling the United States, and by a sudden stroke to set them loose as a first-class power against England. He announced this decision in a conference at which Marbois was present, just before Monroe landed.

Before calling this conference he had denounced the claims of England to be "mistress of the seas," and had said "to free the world from the commercial tyranny of England it is necessary to oppose to her a maritime power which will one day become her rival. It must be the United States. The English aspire to dispose of all the riches of the world. I will be useful to the entire universe if I can prevent them from dominating America as they dominate Asia."

It appears that after announcing in the Tuileries that the United States might be thrust forward as a rival for England, Napoleon brooded over the matter, as was his habit; and then, after he had finally made up his mind, he called his advisers to him and addressed to them his request for advice in what was really a demand for their assent to his plans, "made with vehemence and passion," which did not invite argument. The first declaration of his purpose is thus given by Marbois:

"I know the worth of Louisiana, and I have wished to repair the error of the French negotiator who abandoned it in 1763. I have recovered it on paper through some lines in a treaty, but I have hardly done so when I am about to lose it again. But if it escapes me, it shall one day be at a dearer cost to those to whom I will surrender it. The English have successively taken from France Canada, the Isle Royal, Newfoundland, Arcadia and the richest territories of Asia. They are intriguing and disturbing in San Domingo. They shall not have the Mississippi, which they covet. Louisiana is nothing in comparison with their aggrandizement in all parts of the globe, but the jealousy they feel because of its return under the dominion of France warns me that they intend to seize it, and it is thus they will begin the war. They have already twenty vessels in the Gulf of Mexico—they swagger over those seas as sovereigns—and in San Domingo, since the death of Leclerc, our affairs are going from bad to worse. The conquest of Louisiana will be easy if they only take the trouble to descend upon it. I have not a moment to lose in putting it out of their power. I do not know but what they are there already. That is their usual way of doing things, and as for me, if I was in their place I certainly would not have waited. I wish to take away from them even the idea that they will ever be able to own this colony. I contemplate turning it over to the United States. I would hardly be able to say I had ceded it to them, for we are not yet even in possession of it. But even a short delay may leave me nothing but a vain title to transmit to the republicans, whose friendship I seek. They are asking me for but a single city of Louisiana, but I already consider the whole colony as lost, and it seems to me that in the hands of this rising power it will be more useful to the politics and even to the commerce of France than if I attempt to keep it."

"Tell me your opinion," said Napoleon, in conclusion, and his ministers made speeches, one for, the other against, the cession. He listened and asked questions. It was the next morning after this that he called them to him again and announced that England had broken faith in refusing to evacuate Malta, and that there was no time for further deliberation.

Marbois consulted with Livingston before Monroe's arrival, finding him full of suspicions and unable to believe it when told that the first consul would negotiate, not for New Orleans alone, but for the cession of the entire territory. He thought this merely another French device to gain time, and when Marbois met Monroe and Livingston together for the first time he discovered that both had doubts concerning his good faith. However, these doubts he soon removed, and the negotiations proceeded without friction or the slightest degree of unpleasantness, except over the price and the boundaries. The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical authorities at New Orleans had been claimed to the Pacific, but France was not willing to guarantee this, and the American envoys desired an exact definition of boundaries, because publicists had held treaties invalid in which such definitions were not clearly given. It was finally decided to accept the French view, and it was intimated that there was an understanding that this would be to the advantage of the United States in proceeding against England for the occupation of the western Pacific territory. Indeed the whole inference from Marbois' book is that, back of the purchase price, which was important at the time to give Napoleon money to prosecute the war against England, there was a much more important, if even wholly undefined, understanding that the cession involved, on the part of the United States, the assumption of the aggressive against England in support of France. This is strongly brought out in Marbois' report of Livingston's speech, made at the signing of the treaty.

When this important document had been actually signed, Marbois states that the three negotiators (Monroe, Livingston and himself), "felt a sentiment superior to glory. Never," he says, "had negotiators tasted a joy more pure than theirs." So soon as they had signed they rose, shook hands, and Livingston, expressing the satisfaction of all, said: "The treaty we have signed has not been brought about by finesse nor dictated by force.

"Equally advantageous to both the contracting parties, it will change vast solitudes into a flourishing country. To-day the United States take their place among the powers of the first rank. All exclusive influence in the affairs of the United States is lost to England forever. Thus is done away with one of the chief causes of European hatreds and rivalries. Moreover if wars are inevitable, France will have in the New World a friend, increasing year by year in power, which cannot fail to become puissant and respected on all the seas of the world. It is by the United States that there will be re-established for all the peoples of the earth maritime rights which are now usurped by a single country. Thus treaties will become a guarantee of peace and good will between commercial states. The instrument we have signed will cause no tears to flow. It will prepare centuries of happiness for innumerable generations of the human race. The Mississippi and the Missouri will see them prosper and increase in the midst of equality, under just laws, freed from the errors of superstition, from the scourge of bad government, and truly worthy of the regard and care of providence."

In closing his review of Napoleon's action throughout the negotiations, Marbois says that "the following words (spoken when the signing of the treaty was announced) are enough to demonstrate what thought then dominated the first consul: 'This accession of territory,' said he, 'assures (affermit) forever the power of the United States, and I have given England a maritime rival which sooner or later will humble her pride.'"

Exact boundaries had not been established at that time, but some idea of the extent of the purchase may be had when we remember that it extended from the present British line to the Gulf of Mexico and included what are now the states of Minnesota, North Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, South Dakota, Missouri, Arkansas and Louisiana, the Territory of Oklahoma, Indian Territory, more than three-fourths of Montana and Wyoming, also parts of Colorado and Mexico.

Thus an enterprise which had in its inception for its chief object the advancement of the commercial interests of the United States acquired a new purpose, namely, the extending of the geographical and scientific knowledge concerning our own domain. Upon Lewis and Clark a further duty devolved, that of informing the natives that obedience was now due to a new great father.

That portion of Lewis and Clark's expedition with which this history concerns itself must relate chiefly to the achievements of these intrepid captains after they had entered the territory known as "Oregon," and from which the states of Oregon, Washington and Idaho were carved. And what was this territory, at that period a terra incognita? Major Joshua Pitcher, early in 1800, contributed the following terse, if abbreviated description of it:

The form and configuration of the country is the most perfect and admirable which the imagination can conceive. All its outlines are distinctly marked; all its interior is connected together. Frozen regions on the north, the ocean and its mountainous coast to the west; the Rocky Mountains to the east; sandy and desert plains to the south—such are its boundaries. Within the whole country is watered by the streams of a single river, issuing from the north, east and south, uniting in the region of tidewater, and communicating with the sea by a single outlet. Such a country is formed for defense, and whatever power gets possession of it will, probably, be able to keep it.

This was published in Volume I, No. 39, senate documents, Twenty-first Congress, second session. A more extended description is sketched later by Mr. Parker, who says:

Beyond the Rocky Mountains nature appears to have studied variety on the largest scale. Towering mountains and wide-extended prairies, rich valleys and barren plains, and large rivers, with their rapids, cataracts and falls, present a great variety of prospects. The whole country is so mountainous that there is no elevation from which a person can not see some of the immense range which intersects its various parts. From an elevation a short distance from Fort Vancouver, five isolated, conical mountains, from ten to fifteen thousand feet high, whose tops are covered with perpetual snow, may be seen rising in the surrounding valley. There are three general ranges west of the Rocky chain of mountains, running in northern and southern directions; the first above the falls of the Columbia river; the second at and below the Cascades; the third toward and along the shores of the Pacific. From each of these branches extend in different directions. Besides these there are those in different parts which are large and high, such as the Blue Mountains, south of Walla Walla; the Salmon River mountains, between Salmon and Kooskooskie rivers, and also in the region of Okanogan and Colville. The loftiest peaks of the Rocky mountains have been found in about 52 degrees north latitude, where Mr. Thompson, astronomer of the Hudson's Bay Company, has ascertained the heights of several. One, called Mount Brown, he estimates at sixteen thousand feet above the level of the sea; another, Mt. Hooker, at fifteen thousand seven hundred feet. It has been stated, farther (though probably with some exaggeration) that he discovered other points farther north of an elevation ten thousand feet higher than these. This is probably an exaggeration. Between these mountains are widespread valleys and plains. The largest and most fertile valley is included between Deer Island in the west to within twelve miles of the Cascades, which is about fifty-five miles wide, and extending north and south to a greater extent than I had the means of definitely ascertaining; probably from Puget Sound on the north, to the Umpqua river on the south.

The Willamette river, and a section of the Columbia, are included in this valley. The valley south of the Walla Walla, called the Grande Ronde, is said to excel in fertility. To these may be added Pierre's Hole, and the adjacent country; also Recueil Amere, east of the Salmon River Mountains. Others of less magnitude are dispersed over different parts. To these may be sub-joined extensive plains, most of which are prairies well covered with grass. The whole region of the country west of the Salmon River Mountains, the Spokane woods and Okanogan, quite to the range of mountains that cross the Columbia at the Falls, is a vast prairie covered with grass, and the soil is generally good. Another large plain which is said to be very barren, lies off to the southward of Lewis, or Malheur river, including the Shoshone country; and travelers who have passed through this have pronounced the interior of America a great, barren desert, but this is drawing a conclusion far too broad from premises so limited.

Aside from Captains Lewis and Clark, the party of exploration consisted of nine young men from Kentucky, fourteen United States soldiers, who had volunteered their services, two French watermen (an interpreter and hunter), and a black servant employed by Captain Clark. Before the close of 1803 preparations for the voyage were all completed, and the party wintered at the mouth of the Wood river, on the east bank of the Mississippi.

The following is President Jefferson's opinion of Captain Lewis: "Of courage undaunted; possessing a firmness and perseverance of purpose which nothing but impossibilities could divert from its direction; careful as a father of those committed to his charge, yet steady in the maintenance of order and discipline; intimate with the Indian character, customs and principles; habituated to the hunting life, guarded, by exact observation of the vegetables and animals of his own country, against losing time in the description of objects already possessed; honest, disinterested, liberal, of sound understanding, and a fidelity to trust so scrupulous that whatever he should report would be as certain as if seen by ourselves; with all those qualifications, as if selected and implanted by nature in one body by express purpose, I could have no hesitation in confiding this enterprise to him."

The start was made May 4, 1804, and the first reach made on the 16th, was twenty-one miles up the Missouri. Of the many surprising adventures encountered in ascending this river to Fort Benton, it is not the province of this history to recount. It was toward the Northwest Coast—Oregon—that their faces were set, and the advent of these pioneers into the future "Oregon" becomes of material interest to present residents of this section.

August 18, 1805, fifteen months from the departure of this expedition, it had reached the extreme navigable point of the Missouri river, stated in Captain Lewis' journal to be in latitude 43 degrees, 30 minutes, 43 seconds north. The party was now, for a certain distance to proceed by land with pack horses. Tribe after tribe of strange Indians were encountered, a majority of whom met the explorers on friendly terms. The party endured hardships innumerable; game was scarce in certain localities, and at times the weather was inclement. They forded unknown streams, and christened many, Lewis river, Clark's Fork and others.

Particular inquiries were made concerning the topography of the country and the possibility of soon reaching a navigable stream. In answer to such questions an ancient chief, who, it was claimed, knew more about the geography of this section of the northwest than any one else, drew rude delineations of the various rivers, on the ground. But it soon developed that he knew very little concerning them. Yet some vague information was gained sufficient to show that the different streams converged in one vast river, the Columbia, running a great way toward the setting sun, "and at length losing itself in a great lake of water, which was ill tasted, and where the white men lived." Still another route was suggested, an analysis of which convinced Captain Clark that the rivers mentioned debouched into the Gulf of California. He then inquired concerning the route used by the Pierced-nose (Nez Perce) Indians who, living west of the mountains, crossed over to the Missouri. According to Captain Lewis' journal the chief replied, in effect, that this route was a very bad one; that during the passage, he had been told, they suffered excessively from hunger, being compelled to subsist for many days on berries alone, there being no game in that portion of the mountains, which was broken and rocky, and so thickly covered with timber that they could scarcely penetrate it.

Difficulties, also, surrounded all routes, and this one appeared as practicable as any other. It was reasoned that if Indians could pass the mountains with their women and children, no difficulties which they could overcome would prove formidable to the explorers. Lewis sets down in his journal: "If the tribes below the mountains were as numerous as they were represented to be, they would have some means of subsistence equally within our power. They had told us, indeed, that the natives to the westward subsisted principally on fish and roots, and that their only game was a few elk, deer and antelope, there being no buffalo west of the mountains."

It was decided by Captain Clark to ascertain what difficulty would be encountered, if any, in descending the river on which the party was then encamped. Continuing down the stream, which runs nearly northwest, through low grounds, rich and wide, they came to where it forked, the western branch being much larger than the eastern. To this stream, or rather the main branch, was given the name of Lewis river. The party followed it until confronted by insurmountable obstacles; it foamed and lashed itself through a narrow pass flanked by the loftiest mountains Captain Clark had ever seen. The Indians declared that it was impossible to descend the river or scale the mountains, snow-capped and repellent. The Indians had never been lower than the head of the gap made by the river breaking through the range. Captain Clark decided to abandon this route. It was determined to proceed on their course by land. On being questioned their guide drew a map on the sand, representing a road leading toward two forks of another river, where lived a tribe of Indians called Tushepaws. These people he said frequently came to Lewis river to fish for salmon. Through the broken, hilly country through which flow the tributaries of the Columbia the party pressed forward. On the 29th Captain Clark and his men joined the main party, under Captain Lewis, which latter had made a wide detour in order to gain information regarding a more feasible route. August was not yet passed, yet the weather was quite cold, and during the night ink froze in pen and frost covered the meadows. Still, the days were warm, and this peculiar atmospheric condition became more pronounced as they drew nearer the "Oregon" climate. Although they were then in Oregon territory, the locality afterward became a portion of the Territory of Washington.

The expedition began the passage across the mountains August 30, 1805. Accompanied by the old guide, his four sons and another Indian, the party began the descent of the Lemhi river. Three days later all the Indians deserted them, with the exception of the old guide. There being no trail leading across the mountains it became necessary for them to cut their way through the dense underbrush. Although the Indian guide appears to have lost his way, on September 4th, after most arduous labor in forcing a passage through the almost impenetrable brush, the party came upon a large camp of Indians. The following day a "pow-wow" was held, conducted in many languages, the various dialects suggesting a modern Babel; but it proved sufficient to inform the Indians of the main object of the expedition. These Indians were the Ootlashoots, a band of the Tushepaws, on their way to join other bands in hunting buffalo on Jefferson river, across the Rocky Mountains. Parting from them the toilsome journey was resumed. Game disappeared. September 14th they were forced to kill a colt, their stock of animal food being exhausted. And with frequent recurrence to the use of horseflesh they pressed on through the wilderness. An extract from Captain Clark's journal of September 18th, conveys an idea of the destitute conditions of the party:

We melted some snow and supped on a little portable soup, a few cannisters of which, with about twenty pounds' weight of bear's oil, were our only means of subsistence. Our guns are scarcely of any service for there is no living creature in these mountains, except a few small pheasants, a small species of gray squirrel and a blue bird of the vulture kind, about the size of a turtle dove or jay. Even these are difficult to shoot.

Arriving at a bold running stream on September 19th, it was appropriately named "Hungry Creek," as at that point they had nothing to eat. September 20th the party passed down the last foothill of the Bitter Root range and gained a comparatively level country. Here they found another band of strange Indians; people who had never looked upon the face of a white man. But they proved themselves hospitable and the explorers remained with them several days. The Indians called themselves Chopunnish, or Pierced-noses, the Nez Perces of to-day. And now the expedition was in the vicinity of Pierce City,—its site—at one period the capital of Shoshone county, Idaho. On a white elk skin the chief, Twisted Hair, drew a chart of the country to the west, to explain the geography and topography of the district beyond. Captain Clark translated it as follows:

"According to this the Kooskooskee forks (confluence of its north fork) a few miles from this place; two days toward the south is another and larger fork (confluence of Snake river), on which the Shoshone or Snake Indians fish; five days' journey further is a large river from the northwest (that is the Columbia itself), into which Clark's river empties; from the mouth of that river (that is, confluence of the Snake with the Columbia) to the falls is five days' journey further; on all the forks as well as on the main river great numbers of Indians reside."

September 23d the Indians were assembled and the errand of the party across the continent explained. The talk satisfied the savages; they sold their visitors provisions for man and beast and parted with amity. But immediate progress was somewhat delayed by illness of different members of the party. They had been nearly famished when they encountered the Nez Perces, and had eaten too heartily following their privation. September 27th they camped on Kooskooskee river and began the building of canoes. Gradually the health of the men was recruited, and the early days of October were passed in making preparations to descend the river. According to Lewis' journal the latitude of this camp was 46 degrees, 34 minutes, 56 seconds north. It should be remembered that the Kooskooskee is now the Clearwater, flowing into the Snake river which in turn, empties into the Columbia. October 8th the party began their long and adventurous voyage in five canoes, one of which served as an advance pilot boat, the course of the stream being unknown. They were soon assailed by disaster; one of the canoes struck a rock and sank. The river was found to be full of rocks, reefs and rapids. At the confluence of the Kooskooskee (Clearwater) and Snake rivers a night's camp was made near the present Idaho town of Lewiston, named in honor of one of the commanders of this expedition. And from this point the party crossed over into the territory now bounded by the limits of the State of Washington. Experience in this camp finds the following expression in Lewis' journal:

Our arrival soon attracted the attention of the Indians, who flocked from all directions to see us. In the evening the Indian from the falls, whom we had seen at Rugged Rapid, joined us with his son, in a small canoe, and insisted on accompanying us to the falls. Being again reduced to fish and roots, we made an experiment to vary our food by purchasing a few dogs, and after having been accustomed to horse flesh felt no disrelish for this new dish. The Chopunnish have great numbers of dogs which they employ for domestic purposes, but never eat; and our using the flesh of that animal soon brought us into ridicule as dog eaters.

The expedition found almost continual rapids from this point to the mouth of the Snake, which they reached October 16th. Here they were met by a regular procession of nearly two hundred Indians. They had a grand pow-wow, and both parties displayed a great affection for each other, the whites bestowing medals, shirts, trinkets, etc., in accordance with the rank of the recipient, and the Indians repaying the kindness with prolonged visits and accompanying gifts of wood and fish. On the next day they measured the rivers, finding the Columbia to be 960, and the Snake, 575 yards wide. They indulged in no poetic reveries as they stood by the river which had been one principal object of their toilsome search; but they appear to have seen pretty much everything of practical value. In the glimmering haze of that pleasant October morning they noticed the vast, bare prairie stretching southward until broken by the rounded summits of the Blue Mountains. They found the Sohulks, who lived at the junction of the rivers, a mild and happy people, the men being content with one wife, whom they actually assisted in the family work.

Let us at this point digress a trifle for the purpose of inquiring into the nature and habitat of the various tribes of Indians encountered by Lewis and Clark. In his wonderfully entertaining work, "Indians of North America in Historic Times," Cyrus Thomas, Ph. D., archæologist in the Bureau of American Ethnology, says:

"Passing into the great mountain range which divides the Atlantic from the Pacific area, we enter the territory of the Shoshonean family, an Indian group which, if judged by the area over which its various members have spread, is surpassed but by two families north of Mexico—the Algonquin and the Athapascan. It extended from the headwaters of the Missouri, in central Montana, to southern Texas, and from western Kansas to western Oregon, reaching the Pacific coast in southwestern California. The term 'family' is applied to this group in the sense in which it is used by Major J. W. Powell in his list of linguistic families; however, according to other authorities and as now generally conceded, it is but a large division of the great Nahuatlan stock which includes, also, the Peiman, Aztec, and related tribes of Mexico; a vast family which, including its outlying peoples, stretches from the banks of the Columbia river to Lake Nicaragua. What a long unwritten history of the past, of the formation, growth and disintegration of groups, and of the slow and gradual movements southward from the Arctic regions is sealed up in this fact! A seal that will, probably, never be broken.

"The principal members of the Shoshonean group are the Comanche, Bannock, Ute, Paiute, Gosiute, Paviotso, Shoshone (proper) and Hopi, (or Moqui) tribes. The natives of Oregon are usually grouped, in part, with those of California and, in part, with those further north. However, this grouping is based on the generally observed customs and physical characteristics, and not on strictly ethnic or linguistic data, though, exclusive of certain intrusive elements agreeing in a broad sense with the ethnic relations. Here, as in California, there is little Indian history save that in regard to intertribal relations, of which there are but meagre data, and the incidents of intercourse with the whites, which were chiefly in the early days with passing navigators and the agents of the Hudson's Bay and Northwestern Companies. The tribes, like those further south, were small and too much absorbed in their local prejudices and petty broils to unite in any great effort of resistance or aggression. No great leader—as Philip, Pontiac and Tecumseh, among the tribes of the Atlantic side—appears to have arisen among those Northwest Coast Indians.

"Our information regarding these tribes begins with the accounts given by the early European voyagers to this region. Bering came down from the more northern regions in 1741. In 1774-75 the Spanish navigators, Juan Perez and La Bodega y Quadra, coming from the south, explored the coast to the northward. In 1778 Captain Cook, having with him Vancouver as a midshipman, made his celebrated visit to this coast, perpetuating their names by applying them to islands and waters. Soon thereafter vessels of mercantile companies began to explore the coast in search of trade with the natives, as that under Captain Meares in 1786, and that under Dixon in 1787. From 1788 to 1803, several American ships representing a Boston company appeared on the coast. Some of the latter were unfortunate, as the Boston, whose officers and men, amounting to thirty-five persons, were murdered by the Indians at Nootka. In 1792 Captain Vancouver made his noted reconnaissance of the coast. From 1804 to the purchase of Alaska by the United States, the history of the coast north of the United States is largely the history of the Russian-American and Hudson's Bay Companies.

"The natives dwelling above the lower parts of the Columbia river consisted of four tribes, including the Chinooks and Clatsops belonging to the Chinookan family. These tribes, which are reported to have been more populous and influential, were greatly thinned by the smallpox, which spread havoc through this region for several years.

"The Flatheads or Salish Indians, who lived chiefly in the region stretching south of the lower Columbia, adjoining the country of the Chinooks, were described half a century ago as comparatively fair in complexion, well made and active, with oval faces and a mild and playful expression of countenance; generally honest in their dealings, brave in battle, amenable to their chiefs, of whom Comcomly, who died in 1831, was the most noted; fond of cleanliness and less given to theft and falsehood than was usual among the Indians of the northwest section. * * * The Walla Walla, of the Shahoptian family, appear to have been generally friendly to the whites so long as they were left in peaceable possession of their lands, and tried to imitate them in raising stock and cultivating the soil. But the rapid increase of settlers, had, by 1848, rendered the Indians of Oregon uneasy in regard to their lands, and they were further irritated by the failure of the United States government to pay them for the lands they had parted with, and for which official promise had been made. The Klikitata, also of the Shahoptian family, were troublesome through minor depredations committed in the settlements in Willamette valley in 1849 and 1850."

Let us now return to the stirring incidents and adventures of the Lewis and Clark party.

Captain Clark ascended the Columbia to the mouth of a large river coming from the west, which the Indians called the Tapteal. This was, of course, the Yakima. The people living at its mouth rejoiced in the euphonious name of Chinapum. Here Captain Clark shot what he called a prairie cock, the first he had seen. It was a sage hen, no doubt; a handsome bird, nearly as large as a turkey and very common along the river at the present time.

After two days of much needed rest, being well supplied with fish, dogs, roots, etc., and at peace with their own consciences and all the world, with satisfaction at the prospect of soon completing their arduous journey, they re-embarked. Think of this, ye Pullman tourists of the present day who skim the continent as the sea gull skims the ocean, dining sumptuously on the best viands which can be supplied by the markets of the world; cooked by the most artistic of professional chefs; and mark the difference between your touring and the long, dreary march, by foot and canoe and that exquisite bit of cuisine, dog meat! Truly, this contrast is most striking.

Sixteen miles below the mouth of the Kimooenim, which they now began to call the Lewis river, they descried, clearly cut against the dim horizon line of the southwest, a pyramidal mountain, "crowned with a diadem of snow,"—their first view of Mount Hood. The next day, being in the vicinity of Umatilla, they saw another snowy peak at a conjectured distance of one hundred miles. Near here, Captain Clark, having landed, shot a crane and a duck. Some Indians near were almost paralyzed with terror, but they subsequently recovered sufficiently to make the best possible use of their legs. Following them Captain Clark found a small cluster of huts. Pushing aside the mat door of one of them he entered, and in the bright light of the unroofed hut discovered thirty-two persons, all of whom were in the greatest terror, some wailing and wringing their hands.

Having by kind looks and gestures soothed their grief, he held up his burning glass to light his pipe. Thereat the consternation of the simple Indian people revived, and in the presence of this great mystery they refused to be comforted. But when the rest of the party arrived with the two Indian guides who had come with them from the Clearwater, terror gave way to pleasurable curiosity. These Pishqitpaws—such was their name—explained to the guides their fear of Captain Clark by saying that he came from the sky accompanied by a terrible noise, and they knew there was a bad medicine in it.

Being convinced now that he was a mortal after all, they became very affectionate, and having heard the music of two violins, they became so enamored of the strangers that they remained up all night with them and collected to the number of two hundred to bid them good bye in the morning. The principal business of these Indians appeared to be catching and curing salmon which in the clear water of the Columbia the explorers could see swimming about in incredible numbers. Continuing with no extraordinary occurrence they passed the mouth of the river now known as the John Day, but to which they applied the name Lapage. Mount Hood was now almost constantly in view, and since the Indians told them it was near the great falls of the Columbia, they called it the Timm (this seems to be the Indian word for falls) mountain.

On the next day they reached a large river coming in from the left, which thundered through a narrow channel into the equally turbulent Columbia. This river which Captain Lewis judged to contain one-fourth as much water as the Columbia (an enormous over-estimate), answered to the Indian name of Towahnahooks. It afterward received from the French its present name, Des Chutes. And now the party perceived that they were near the place hinted at by nearly every Indian with whom they had conversed since crossing the Rockies—the great Falls. And a weird, savage place it proved to be. Here the clenched hands of trachyte and basalt, thrust through the soil from the buried realms of the volcanoes, almost clutched the rushing river. Only here and there between the parted fingers can he make his escape.

Having made several portages they reached that extraordinary place (now known as The Dalles) where all the waters gathered from half a million square miles of earth are squeezed into a crack forty-five yards wide. The desolation on either side of this frightful chasm is a fitting margin. As one crawls to the edge and peeps over he sees the water to be of inky blackness. Streaks of foam gridiron the blackness. There is little noise compared with the shallow rapids above, but rather a dismal sough, as though the rocks below were rubbing their sides together in the vain effort to close over the escaping river. Here the stream is "turned" on edge. In fact its depth has not been found to this day. Some suppose that there was once a natural tunnel here through which flowed the river; and that in consequence of a volcanic convulsion the top of the tunnel fell in. Should there be any truth in this the width of the channel is, doubtless, much greater at the bottom than at the top. Lewis and Clark, finding that the roughness of the shore made it almost impossible for them to "portage" their boats over, and seeing no evidence of rocks in the channel, boldly steered through this boiling, "witches' cauldron." Though no doubt whirled along with frightful rapidity and flung like foam flakes on the crests of the boiling surges, they gained the end of the "chute" without accident. This feat excited great amazement in the Indians who had collected on the bluff to witness this daring experiment. Two more portages and the party safely entered the broad, still flood beginning where the town of The Dalles now stands. Here they remained two days hunting and caulking their boats. And here, too, they saw evidences, for the first time, of the white traders below, such as blankets, axes, brass kettles and other articles of civilized manufacture. The Indians, too, were more inclined to be arrogant and suspicious.

The Dalles appeared to be the dividing line between the Indian tribes. Those living at the falls, where Celilo now is, called the Eneeshurs, understood and "fellowshipped" with all the up-river tribes. But at the narrows and thence to The Dalles was a tribe called the Escheloots. They were alien to the Indians above, but on intimate terms with those below the cascades. Among the Escheloots the explorers first noticed the peculiar "cluck," or lock-stitch speech common to all down-river tribes. The flattening of the head, which above belonged to the females only, was now the common thing. The place where Lewis and Clark camped while at The Dalles was just below Mill Creek (called by the natives Quenett), on a point of rocks near the present location of the car shops. The next Indian tribe, extending apparently from the vicinity of Crate's point to the cascades, capped the climax of tongue-twisting names by calling themselves Chilluckittequaws.

Nothing of extraordinary character seems to have been encountered between The Dalles and the cascades. But the explorers had their eyes wide open, and the calm majesty of the river and savage grandeur of its shores received due notice. They observed and named most of the streams on their route, the first of importance being Cataract river (now the Klickitat), then Labieshe's river (Hood river), Canoe creek (White Salmon) and Crusatte's river. This last must have been Little White Salmon, though they were greatly deceived as to its size, stating that it was sixty yards wide. In this vicinity they were greatly struck with the sunken forest, which at that low stage of the water was quite conspicuous. They correctly inferred that this indicated a damming up of the river at a very recent time. Indeed, they judged that it must have occurred within twenty years. It is well known, however, that submerged trees or piles, as indicated by remains of old Roman wharves in Britain, may remain intact for hundreds of years; but it is nevertheless evident that the closing of the river at the cascades was a very recent event. It is also evident from the sliding, sinking and grinding constantly seen there now that a similar event is liable to happen at any time.

Having won their way to the cascades more portages were required. Slow and tedious though these were, our hardy explorers appeared to have endured them with unflinching patience. They were cheered by the prospect of soon putting all the rapids behind and launching their canoes on the unobstructed vastness of the lower Columbia. This was prosperously accomplished on the 2d of November. With the heavy verdure that now robed the gaunt nakedness of the frowning rocks they were greatly delighted. The island formed at the lower cascade by Columbia slough also pleased them greatly by its fertility and its dense growth of grass and strawberry vines. From this last circumstance they named it Strawberry island. At the lower part of that cluster of islands, that spired and turreted relic of the old feudal age of this majestic river, when the volcano kings stormed each other's castles with earthquakes and spouts of lava, riveted their attention. They called it Beacon rock, but it is now known as Castle rock. They estimated its height at eight hundred feet and its circumference at four hundred yards, the latter being only a fourth of the reality.

And now the tides became noticeable. This fact must have struck a chord of reflection similar to that experienced by Robinson Crusoe when he discovered the mysterious foot-print on the shingle of the ocean within whose bounds he was a prisoner. It was the first pluse-beat of the dim vast of waters which grasps half the circumference of the earth. And so, as this mighty heart-throb of the South Sea, rising and falling in harmony with all nature, celestial and terrestrial, pulsated through one hundred and eighty miles of river, it might have seemed one of the ocean's multiplied fingers outstretched to welcome them, the first organized expedition of the new republic to this westmost west. It might have betokened to them the harmony and unity of future nations, as exemplified in the vast extent, the liberty, the human sympathies, the diversified interests, industries and purposes of that republic whose motto yet remains, "One From Many."

The rest of their journey was a calm floating between meadows and islands from whose shallow ponds they obtained ducks and geese in great numbers. They thought the "quicksand river"—Sandy—to be a large and important stream. They noticed Washougal creek, which from the great number of seals around its mouth they called Seal river. But, strange to say they missed the Willamette entirely on their down trip. The Indians in this part of the river called themselves Skilloots. Dropping rapidly down this calm but misty stream, past a large river called by the Indians Cowaliske—Cowlitz—through the country of the Wahkiacums, at last, on the 7th of November, with which morning had enshrouded all objects, suddenly rose, and they saw the bold, mountainous shores on either side vanish away in front, and through the parted headlands they gazed into the infinite expanse of the Pacific ocean.

Overjoyed at the successful termination of their journey, they sought their first pleasant camping ground and made haste to effect a landing. The rain, which is sometimes, even now, observed to characterize that part of our fair state, greatly marred the joy of their first night's rest within the sound of the Pacific's waves breaking on the coast. Six days passed in mouldy and dripping inactivity at a point a little above the present Chinook. Then they passed nine much pleasanter days at Chinook Point. This, however, not proving what they desired for a permanent camp, they devoted themselves to explorations; this with a view to discovering a more suitable location.

The party wintered in a log building at a point named by them Fort Clatsop. March 23, 1806, they turned their faces homeward, first, however, having given to the chiefs of the Clatsops and Chinooks certificates of hospitable treatment, and posted on the fort the following notice: "The object of this last is that, through the medium of some civilized person who may see the same, it may be known to the world that the party consisting of the persons whose names are hereunto annexed and who were sent out by the government of the United States to explore the interior of the continent of North America, did penetrate the same by way of the Missouri and Columbia rivers, to the discharge of the latter into the Pacific ocean, at which they arrived on the 14th day of November, 1805, and departed on their return to the United States by the same route by which they had come."

Of this notice several copies were left among the Indians, one of which fell into the hands of Captain Hall, of the brig Lydia, and was conveyed to the United States. The Lewis and Clark party passed the following winter in camp at the mouth of the Columbia. Before the holidays Captain Clark carved on the trunk of a massive pine this simple inscription:

WM. CLARK,

December 3, 1805, By Land From the United States in 1805 and 6.

Of this notable achievement the Encyclopædia Britannica says: "They had traveled upwards of four thousand miles from their starting point, had encountered various Indian tribes never before seen by whites, had made scientific collections and observations, and were the first explorers to reach the Pacific coast by crossing the continent north of Mexico."

The closing statement of this article partially ignores the expeditions of Sir Alexander Mackenzie who, while he did not cross the continent from a point as far east as Washington, D. C., made a journey in 1789, from Fort Chipewyan, along the Great Slave lake, and down the river which now bears his name, to the "Frozen Ocean," and a second journey in 1792-3 from the same initial point, up the Peace and across the Columbia rivers, and thence westward to the coast of the Pacific, at Cape Menzies, opposite Queen Charlotte Island. Only to this extent is the statement of the Encyclopædia Britannica misleading, but it is quite evident that there is no pronounced inclination to do an injustice to the memory of Mackenzie.

And now came the return trip. The expedition made its way with no little difficulty up the Columbia river. They discovered, on their return a large tributary of that river (the Willamette) which had escaped their notice on their outward journey, and made careful inquiries of the Indians concerning it, the results of which were embodied in their map of the expedition.

At the mouth of the John Day river their canoes were abandoned. Their baggage was packed on the backs of a few horses they had purchased from the Indians, and traveling in this manner, they continued their homeward march, arriving at the mouth of the Walla Walla river April 27th. The great chief Yellept was then the leader of the Walla Walla nation, and by him the explorers were received with such generous hospitality that they yielded to the temptation to linger a couple of days before undertaking further journeyings among the mountain fastnesses. Such was the treatment accorded them by these Indians that the journal of the expedition makes this appreciative notation concerning them: "We may indeed justly affirm that of all the Indians that we have seen since leaving the United States, the Walla Wallas were the most hospitable, honest and sincere."

Of the return journey for the next hundred and fifty miles that venerable pioneer missionary, Dr. H. K. Hines, writes as follows:

Leaving these hospitable people on the 29th of April the party passed eastward on the great "Nez Perce trail." This trail was the great highway of the Walla Walla, Cayouses and Nez Perces eastward to the buffalo ranges, to which they annually resorted for game supplies. It passed up the valley of the Touchet, called by Lewis and Clark the "White Stallion," thence over the high prairie ridges and down the Alpowa to the crossing of the Snake river, thence up the north bank of Clearwater to the Village of Twisted Hair, where the exploring party had left their horses on the way down the previous autumn. It was worn deep and broad, and on many stretches on the open plains and over the smooth hills twenty horsemen could ride abreast in parallel paths worn by the constant rush of the Indian generations from time immemorial. The writer has often passed over it when it lay exactly as it did when the tribes of Yellept and Twisted Hair traced its sinuous courses; when Lewis and Clark and their companions first marked it with the heel of civilization. But the plow has long since obliterated it, and where the monotonous song of the Indian march was droningly chanted for so many barbaric ages, the song of the reaper thrills the clear air as he comes to his garner bringing in the sheaves. A more delightful ride of a hundred and fifty miles than this that the company of Lewis and Clark made over the swelling prairie upland and along the crystal stream between Walla Walla and the village of Twisted Hair, in the soft May days of 1806, can scarcely be found anywhere on earth.

To trace the journeyings of these explorers further is not within the province of this work, but in order to convey a general idea of the labors and extent of the voyage we quote the brief summary made by Captain Lewis himself:

The road by which we went out by the way of the Missouri to its head is 3,096 miles; thence by land by the way of Lewis river over to Clarke's river and down that to the entrance of Traveler's Rest creek, where all the roads from different routes meet; thence across the rugged part of the Rocky mountains to the navigable waters of the Columbia, 398 miles; thence down the river 640 miles to the Pacific ocean—making a total distance of 4,134 miles. On our return in 1806 we came from Traveler's Rest directly to the falls of the Missouri river, which shortens the distance about 579 miles, and is a much better route, reducing the distance from the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean to 3,555 miles. Of this distance 2,575 miles is up the Missouri to the falls of that river; thence passing through the plains and across the Rocky mountains to the navigable waters of the Kooskooskie river, a branch of the Columbia, 340 miles, 200 of which is good road, 140 over a tremendous mountain, steep and broken, sixty miles of which is covered several feet deep with snow, on which we passed on the last of June; from the navigable part of the Kooskooskie we descended that rapid river seventy-three miles to its entrance into Lewis river, and down that river 154 miles to the Columbia, and thence 413 miles to its entrance into the Pacific ocean. About 180 miles of this distance is tidewater. We passed several bad rapids and narrows, and one considerable fall, 268 miles above the entrance of this river, thirty-seven feet eight inches; the total distance descending the Columbia waters 640 miles—making a total of 3,555 miles, on the most direct route from the Mississippi at the mouth of the Missouri to the Pacific ocean.

The safe return of the explorers to their homes in the United States naturally created a sensation throughout that country and the world. Leaders and men were suitably rewarded, and the fame of the former will live while the rivers to which their names have been given continue to pour their waters into the sea. President Jefferson, the distinguished patron of the expedition, paying a tribute to Captain Lewis in 1813, said: "Never did a similar event excite more joy throughout the United States. The humblest of its citizens have taken a lively interest in the issue of this journey, and looked with impatience for the information it would furnish. Nothing short of the official journals of this extraordinary and interesting journey will exhibit the importance of the service, the courage, devotion, zeal and perseverance under circumstances calculated to discourage, which animated this little band of heroes, throughout the long, dangerous and tedious travel."

During the return of the expedition the Clark division came down the Yellowstone in Montana. On a mass of saffron sandstone, an acre in its base area, and four hundred feet high, called Pompey's Pillar, twenty miles above the mouth of the Big Horn river, about half way up the following is carved.

WM. CLARK,
July 25, 1806.

Following the Lewis and Clark expedition, a donation of land was made by congress to the members of the party. This was in 1807. Captain Lewis was appointed governor of our recently acquired territory of "Louisiana." But Lewis while on his way to Philadelphia to supervise the publication of his journal, in 1809, was stricken with death. Clark was governor of Missouri from 1813 to 1821, and died at St. Louis, Missouri, September 1, 1838.

CHAPTER III

WHAT JOHN JACOB ASTOR DID.

The limits of our volume must perforce render this first, or introductory part, somewhat characteristic of a summary. For a complete history, voluminous in detail and exhaustive in its treatment of non-essentials as well as essentials, we can only refer our readers to the many more pretentious works devoted mainly to special subjects. We must, however, in view of its effect upon subsequent history, revert briefly to those gigantic forces in the early annals of the north-west country—the great fur companies. At the outset it is pertinent to inquire into the motives that prompted the formation of these vast commercial organizations, whose plans were so bold, far-reaching and comprehensive, and whose theatre of action was world wide.

The profits of the fur trade were such as might well entice daring coupled with avarice to run the gauntlet of icebergs, starvation, ferocious savages and stormy seas. Great were the possibilities. Net returns from a single voyage might liquidate even the enormous cost of the original outfit. As an example, Ross, one of the clerks of John Jacob Astor's company and located at Okanogan, relates that one morning before breakfast he purchased from Indians one hundred and ten beaver skins at the rate of five leaves of tobacco per skin. Afterward a yard of cotton cloth, worth say ten cents, bought twenty-five beaver skins the value of which in the New York market was five dollars apiece. For four fathoms of blue glass beads, worth perhaps a dollar, Lewis and Clark obtained a sea otter skin, the market price of which varied from $45 to $60. The clerk, Ross, notes in another place that for $165 in trinkets, cloth, etc., he purchased peltries valued in the Canton market at eleven thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. Indeed, even the ill-fated voyage of Mr. Astor's partners proved that a cargo worth $25,000 in New York might be replaced in two years by one worth a quarter of a million, a profit of a thousand per cent. Who, then, should wonder at the eager enterprise and fierce, oftentimes bloody, competition of the fur traders?

Three in number were the fur-producing animals of especial value in the Oregon country. The first, the beaver, was found in great abundance in all the interior valleys, the Willamette country, as was discovered, being in this respect pre-eminent. The two others, the sea otter and the seal, were found on the coast. Most valuable was the sea otter fur, its velvety smoothness and glossy blackness rendering it first in the markets of the world of all furs from the temperate zones of North America, and inferior only to the ermine and sable, and possibly, to the fiery fox of the far north.

Such, then, was the prospect that prompted the formation of the Pacific Fur Company, which shall have the first place in our narrative as being the first to enter the Columbia river basin, though it was long antedated in organization by a number of other large fur-trading corporations. The soul, the vital principal, the prime mover in this enterprise was that historically famed commercial genius, John Jacob Astor. He was a native of Heidelberg; he had come to America poor; he had amassed a large fortune in successful trade. In his fertile brain was conceived a scheme which for complex and multitudinous designs and judicious arrangement of details was truly masterful—a scheme in which the looting, yes, downright swindling of ignorant savages, per examples given by Clerk Ross, was a far too prominent attribute to permit the name of Astor to go down to posterity sans criticism. But it developed into a case of the biter bitten—the cheater cheated. One grand mistake, coupled with overconfidence in his partners, wrecked his enterprise. He entrusted its development to men who were bitterly anti-American; men whose previous connection with a rival company affected their loyalty to Astor. Hence the comparative failure of this gigantic venture.

To prosecute the fur trade in very unsettled territory claimed by the United States; the trade with China and the supplying of the Russian settlements with trading stock, the goods to be paid for in peltries, were all embraced in the far-reaching scheme of Mr. Astor. At regular intervals a vessel was to be sent out from New York. It was to be laden with goods and supplies to be traded to the Indians at a profit of from all the way from five hundred to one thousand per cent. At a depot, or trading post, at the mouth of the Columbia river she was to discharge her cargo; then trade coastwise with the Indians and at the Russian settlements until another cargo had been secured in part. The vessel was then to return to the mouth of the Columbia, there complete her lading, sail thence to China, receive a return cargo of Canton silks, nankeens and tea, and thence to New York. For this vast "rounding up" it was estimated that two years would be required. One of the most important parts of this scheme was supplying the Russian posts at New Archangel. The object of this was twofold—first the profit accruing therefrom; secondly, to deflect competition from Mr. Astor's own territory, through the semi-partnership with the Russians in furnishing them with supplies. With the Russian government careful arrangements had been made to avoid a clash between the vessels of the two companies engaged in the coast trade. "It was," says Brewerton, "a colossal scheme and deserved to succeed; had it done so it would have advanced American settlement and actual occupancy on the Northwest Coast by at least a quarter of a century, giving employment to thousands and transferred the enormous profits of the Hudson's Bay and Northwest British fur companies from English to American coffers,"—Mr. Astor's coffers.

All this had been anticipated by Mr. Astor. The enmity and jealousy of the Northwest Company were aroused upon the entrance on the field of a new competitor in the enterprise of swindling ignorant barbarians. Yet at this period the Northwest Company had no trading posts west of the Rocky mountains and south of fifty-two degrees north. Astor, with his usual commercial perspicacity resolved to soften enmity by a display of frankness. To the directors of the British company he wrote, enclosing the details of his plan, and offering them a one-third interest in the enterprise. But there was no response. His display of ingeniousness had fallen on barren soil. It must be confessed that they met assumed candor with duplicity,—duplicity almost equal to that practiced by all the early fur-traders upon the Indians—a duplicity which to-day is sometimes practiced upon Indians by Indian agents of the United States government.

The Northwest Company sparred for wind. With Machiavellian diplomacy they replied that they "would take the matter under advisement." And immediately afterward they dispatched David Thompson, the astronomer and surveyor of their company, with instructions to "occupy the mouth of the Columbia; to explore the river to its headwaters; and above all to watch the progress of Mr. Astor's enterprise." And then they coolly declined the proposition.

But Mr. Astor proceeded with his project energetically and, as he thought, skillfully. As partners in the enterprise he associated with himself (and here was a fatal mistake) Donald Mackenzie, Alexander Mackay, who had accompanied Alexander Mackenzie on his trips of discovery, hence possessing invaluable experience, and Duncan MacDougal, all late of the Northwest Company, and though men of great skill and wide experience, schooled in the ingrained prejudices of the association with which they had so long maintained connection, they saw only through British eyes. Mr. Astor's hour of betrayal was at hand. To the partners already enumerated were subsequently added Wilson P. Hunt and Robert Maclellan, Americans, David and Robert Stuart and Ramsey Crooks, Scotchmen, and John Clarke, a Canadian, and others.

Thus it will be seen that the voting majority was largely with the Englishmen and Scotchmen.

Wilson P. Hunt was given the post of chief agent on the Columbia, his term of office being five years, and when he was obliged to be temporarily absent a substitute was to be elected by the partners who happened to be present, to act in his place. In the most solemn manner each partner obligated himself to go where sent and to faithfully execute the objects of the company. But before subscribing to this bond two of the British communicated to the British minister, Mr. Jackson, temporarily in New York, full details of Mr. Astor's plan and inquired of him concerning their status as British subjects trading under the American flag in the event of war. To them assurances were given that in case of war they would be protected as English subjects and merchants. Their scruples were dispelled; they entered into the compact.

The larger part of this expedition was to proceed via Cape Horn and the Sandwich (Hawaiian) islands to the mouth of the Columbia, there to await the arrival of the Hunt party, which was sent out by land. To convey them thence the ship Tonquin, a vessel of two hundred and ninety tons burden, was fitted out for sea. She was commanded by Captain Thorne, a lieutenant of the United States navy on leave, and had on board Indian trading goods, the frame timbers for a coasting schooner, supplies of all kinds and, in fact, everything essential to comfort.

But a British war vessel, acting on the very lines which had been suggested by the astute Napoleon, when he had advanced reasons for conveying the "Louisiana Purchase" to the United States, was then cruising off the coast for the purpose of intercepting the Tonquin and impressing the Canadian and British sailors who might be on board. This was a ruse of the Northwest Company, to delay the expedition in order that their emissary, Thompson, should arrive first at the mouth of the Columbia. Of this fact Mr. Astor had been apprised. With matchless sagacity he secured a convoy, the now famous and historical United States frigate, Constitution, commanded by the equally famous Captain Isaac Hull. Thus protected the Tonquin proceeded safely on her voyage. March 22, 1811, after a passage, the details of which will be found in Washington Irving's "Astoria," Franchere's narrative, or in some of the numerous publications based upon the latter work, the Tonquin arrived at her destination.

April 12th a portion of the crew crossed the river in a launch and established at Fort George a settlement to which was given the name of Astoria in honor of the projector of the enterprise. They at once addressed themselves to the task of constructing the schooner, the materials for which had been brought with them in the Tonquin. Mr. Mackay also made an expedition to determine the truth or falsity of the rumor that a party of whites were establishing a post at the upper cascades of the river (Columbia), but on reaching the first rapids this expedition was abandoned, the Indian crew positively refusing to proceed farther.

The ill-fated Tonquin started north June 1st. Mr. Mackay accompanied it. To their unfortunate conclusion we must now trace her fortunes. The chief authority for the story is M. Franchere, a Frenchman, one of Mr. Astor's clerks. With his account Irving appears to have taken some poetic license. According to that graceful writer, with a total force of twenty-three, and an Indian of the Chehalis tribe called Lamazee, as interpreter, the Tonquin entered the harbor of Neweetee. Franchere calls the Indian Lamãse, and the harbor, he says, the Indians called Newitv. We shall, doubtless, be safe in following Hubert Bancroft, who surmises that the place was Nootka sound, which was an exceedingly bad place for traders. It was here, as has been noted in another chapter, that the ship Boston, and her entire crew had been destroyed.

Let it be noticed, however, that these Indians, like all others on the coast, were at first disposed to be friendly; only the indignities and violence offered by the traders transformed their naturally pacific disposition to one of sullen treachery. Against trusting the Indians Captain Thorne had been repeatedly and urgently warned by Mr. Astor and his associates. One standing rule was to the effect that not more than four or five Indians should be allowed on deck at one time. And right here occurred an incident which showed the rapacious cupidity of the swindling-fur traders had met its match. The eyes of the long cheated Indians had been opened. Retribution was at hand. The choleric Captain Thorne treated with equal contempt the suggestions that had been made to him by Astor and his associates and the savage hucksters. A large quantity of the finest kind of sea otter skins had been brought on deck. To all appearance a most lucrative and amicable trade was before Mr. Astor's men. But they were too greedy; actuated by a too rank spirit of swindling commercialism. Twenty years of traffic with the whites and a long course of instruction from the diplomatic and successful chief, Maquinna, had rendered the Nootka Indians less pliable and less like easily captured gudgeons than Thorne had expected. His small stock of patience was soon exhausted. He was unable to secure something for, literally, nothing, as had been customary with white fur-traders. At one cunning and leering old chief, who appeared to be urging the others to hold out for fairer and more equitable prices, the avaricious captain began to scowl with particular rage. But the oily visage was scowl proof. The impatient sailor had the mortification to see that he was likely to be out-Jewed by one of those dirty and despised redskins. No longer could he control himself. In his most impressive and autocratic manner he bade the Indians leave. But the obnoxious chieftian remained motionless. From the captain's mind vanished sense and judgment. Seizing him by the hair he propelled him rapidly toward the ship's ladder. Then, with a convenient bundle of furs, snatched up furiously, he emphasized the Indian's exit. Nor is it likely that he spared a liberal application of boot-leather to the most accessible portion of the savage trader's anatomy. Instantly, as though under a spell of enchantment, the remaining Indians glided from the ship. It was on this date that Indian peltries took a slight rise in the market—at least the Nootka market. In place of the babel of jabbering traffickers were only the hairbrained captain and his astonished, silent crew—the most of them destined to become martyrs to commercial cupidity.

Wrathfully indignant was Mr. Mackay, the partner, on his return from a trip ashore, when he became apprised of the untimely cessation of trade. He assured Captain Thorne that he had not only spoiled their business, but had endangered all their lives. He therefore urged making sail from the place at once. The Chehalis Indian, Lamanze, also enforced Mr. Mackay's wish, asserting that further intercourse with the Indians could only result in disaster. But to no advice would the stubborn captain listen. So long as he had a knife or a handspike they couldn't scare him into running before a lot of naked redskins. The night passed quietly. Early the following morning a number of Indians, demure and peacable as can be imagined, paddled alongside. Bundles of furs held aloft signified their desire to trade. In great triumph Captain Thorne pointed out to Mackay the successful issue of his discipline. "That is the way to treat them," he said; "just show them that you are not afraid and they will behave themselves." Very respectful were the Indians; they exchanged their furs for whatever was offered.

And soon another large boat-load, well filled with the choicest peltries, asked permission to board the ship. To this request the now good-natured and complacent skipper gladly complied. Then came another canoe, a fourth and a fifth disgorged a perfect horde on board. But some of the more observant sailors noted with alarm that, contrary to custom, no women left the canoes; and that certain of the fur bundles the savages would not sell at any price, while as to others they were perfectly indifferent. Soon after it was observed that, moving as if by accident, the Indians had somehow become massed at all the assailable points of the vessel. When this fact became unmistakable Captain Thorne was, for the first time, startled. But masking his sudden fear, and putting on a bold front, he gave the order to up anchor and man the topmast, preparatory to sailing. Then he sternly ordered the Indians to return to their canoes. With a scarce perceptible flush darkening their listless faces they picked up their remaining bundles and started for the ladder. As they went, their cat-like tread scarcely audible in the oppressive stillness, their knotted fingers stole into their bundles. Out they came again, like a flash, and in them were long knives and cruel bludgeons.

And then upon the awful silence broke the wild war-yell. The peaceful Tonquin's deck was a scene of slaughter grim and pitiless. Lewis the clerk, and Mackay were almost instantly dispatched. Then a crowd, with fiendish triumph set upon the captain, bent on at once evening up the old score. The brawny frame and iron will of the brave, though fool-hardy old salt, made him a dangerous object to attack. Not until half a dozen of his assailants had measured their bleeding lengths on the slippery deck did he succumb.

With savage glee he was immediately hacked to pieces. Meanwhile four sailors, the only survivors besides the interpreter, Lamanzee, by whom the story is told, having gained access to the hold of the vessel, began firing on the triumphant Indians. With such effect did they work that the whole throng left the ship in haste and sought the shore. Lamanzee, meanwhile, was spared, but held in captivity for two years. The following day the four surviving sailors attempted to put to sea in a small boat, but they were pursued and probably murdered by the Indians. And then, like a band of buzzards circling around a carcass, the Indians' canoes began to cluster around the deserted ship. In savage mirth had the night been spent, and now the prospect of rifling an entire ship gave them joys that knew no bounds. The hideous tumult of the day before was succeeded by an equally hideous calm. Cautiously at first, and then emboldened by the utter lifelessness, in throngs the Indians clamored to the deck. Soon lost were their instinctive fears of strategem in gloating over the disfigured forms of their vanquished foes, and in rifling the ship's storehouses. Arrayed in gaudy blankets, and adorned with multiplied strands of beads, they strutted proudly over the deck. Five hundred men, women and children now swarmed the ship.

Then an awful thing occurred. A reverberating crash, and the luckless Tonquin, with all its load of living and dead, was flung in fragments around the sea. Her powder magazine had become a Samson among the Philistines, had made common ruin of herself and her enemies in the very scene of their triumph. Dismembered bodies, fragments of legs and arms, and spattered brains, stained those peaceful waters far and wide. According to Lamanzee, as quoted by Franchere, two hundred Indians, men, women and children, were thus destroyed. It was claimed by the same authority that no one knew who blew up the ship, although he believed it most likely that the four sailors left a slow powder train on board when they abandoned her. Washington Irving graphically describes Lewis as having been wounded, and, remaining on board after the four other survivors had departed for the purpose of enticing the savages on board and then firing the train so as to destroy himself and them in one awful, retributive catastrophe. Hubert Bancroft, however, finds no warrant for this in the narrative of Franchere, the only known authority, and he does not hesitate to accuse Irving of fabricating it.

Whatever may have been the authentic details the general fact, and the horrible results, soon spread abroad through the widely scattered set-lements, trading posts and "factories." With bated breath it was whispered among the Chinooks around Astoria. It there reached the ears of the fur traders. Totally unbelievably at first, it developed into painful certainty. A month had passed. There was no Tonquin in sight in the offing. Surely, there must be something in this ghastly story. Finally its floating fragments assumed an accepted form, yet this was not until the reappearance of Lamazee, two years after the event.

July 15, 1811, David Thompson, with eight white men arrived in Astoria. In searching for a pass through the Rocky mountains his expedition had been delayed. Desertions among his men also impeded his progress. Finally he was obliged to return to the nearest post and go into winter quarters. He hurried forward in the early spring. Among the Indians along the Columbia river the party distributed small flags (English colors), and built huts at the forks of the river and took formal possession of the country drained by the Columbia and its tributaries in the name of the King of Great Britain, and for the company which sent them out. But the main object of this expedition was not realized. They were unable to occupy the mouth of the Columbia; here the perfidy of the Northwest Company failed of its reward. Hostile to the projects of Mr. Astor was the expedition, yet it was received in Astoria—by the "wicked partners" of the old Dutch fur-king—with open-handed cordiality. MacDougal provided Thompson with supplies for the return journey. But this was against the urgent remonstrance of David Stuart. Such generosity to one's commercial enemy is, to say the least, a trifle unusual. But the magnanimity displayed on this occasion has not, for some reason, evoked the plaudits of historians. Treachery is despicable in the eyes, even, of those who materially benefit from it.

At the time of Mr. Thompson's arrival David Stuart was on the eve of starting for the Spokane country to establish a post. For a short period he delayed his departure that his and Mr. Thompson's parties might travel together. At the confluence of the Columbia and Okanogan rivers Mr. Stuart erected Fort Okanogan, the first interior post west of the Rocky mountains within the limits of the present state of Washington.

On January 8, 1812, a part of the Hunt expedition gained Astoria in a pitiable condition. We must here take a retrogressive step, chronologically, to pursue the fortunes of this ill-fated band of adventurers. While the Tonquin was making sail from New York harbor under the protecting guns of the Constitution, the second partner in the enterprise, Wilson Price Hunt, was organizing at St. Louis a land party. This was to cross the plains and co-operate with the division by sea. At St. Louis Hunt had, for some years, been actively engaged in merchandising. His principal trade was with trappers and Indians; he had become perfectly familiar with the requirements of the business. And in addition to this primary requisite he possessed a character, native and acquired, worthy of more frequent mention in our earlier annals and of more frequent emulation by his associates and successors. Brave, humane, cheerful and resolute, he has risen from the mists of history and reminiscence as the highest type of the Jasons who vied with those of ancient story in their search for the fleeces (this time seal and beaver fleeces instead of golden ones) of the far west. To a powerful physique and iron nerve, Hunt added a refinement and culture rare indeed among the bold, free spirits of the frontier.

Daniel Mackenzie, another partner in the Astor enterprise, was with Hunt. He was a man insensible to fear and inured by years of hardship to the vicissitudes of a trapper's life; renowned even on the border, for his marvellous accuracy with the rifle—the archaic flint-lock of the days of old. For Mackenzie and Hunt the first thing of moment was to secure men—bone, sinew and brains for a perilous adventure. All the tact and patience of Hunt was drawn upon. And here it becomes necessary to briefly describe the classes from which he was compelled to recruit his ranks.

There were, at this period, two distinct elements of trappers. The first, and by far the more numerous, were Canadians voyageurs; mainly of French descent—many of them half-breeds. These were the legacy of the old French domination over Canada. Cradley in the canoe or batteau, their earliest recollections were of the cold, blue lake or foaming river; almost amphibious by nature and training, gay and amiable of disposition; endowed with true French vivacity and ingenuity; gilding each harsh and bitter experience with laughter and song; their quick sympathies and humane instincts easily finding the best side of the savages, not broad in designing, but patient, courageous and indomitable in executing, these French voyageurs were the main dependence—the back-stay—of traffic in the wilderness.

The second class were free trappers—Boosh-aways they were sometimes called. Most of these were Americans, a large majority being natives of Kentucky and Virginia. They were the direct antipodes of the volatile voyageurs. Often with gigantic frames built up on prairie dew and mountain breeze, with buffalo steak and wild birds' flesh wrought into their iron sinews; with nerves of steel; mighty in braggadocio, yet quick to make good the voicing of their most egotistical moods; patient and indefatigable in their life-work of trapping; but given to wild dissipations in their annual visits to towns, "settlements" or "factories;" "sudden and rash in quarrel;" careless of each other's sympathies or companionship; harsh and cruel to Indians when in power over them, but bold and recklessly defiant when weaker than they; seizing without compensation the prettiest Indian woman and the best horses as their rightful loot; with blood in their eyes, thunder in their voices and rifles in their hands; yet underneath all this many of them possessing hearts as big as those of a buffalo, could they be reached—this now vanished race of Booshaways has gone to a place in history beside the ancient Spartans who boasted that their city required no wall save the army. Gone are these trappers of a hundred years ago, and at the head of their enthusiastic biographers stands James Fenimore Cooper!

This old streak of brutality and tyranny, originally cast into the Anglo-Saxon nature and manifested in its superior form in the savage grandeur of the Norse Valhalla, and in the overpowering energy—and vitality—of the Vikings, and at every great emergency bursting with volcanic fury through the thin crust of modern artificial culture, has in no way shown itself more notably than in the whole management of the Indians by the American government. With a swift, implacable vengeance the free trapper executed the not less real policy of our successive administrations. Humanity, and even shrewd diplomacy have little place in the thoughts and actions of most of them. After having been swindled by traders the Indian was simply to be stamped upon like a rattlesnake. The Gallic gentleness that enabled the Canadian voyageurs to wander almost anywhere unharmed among the Indians found no counterpart in the sterner composition of the great majority of trappers and fur-traders.

And from these two classes Hunt was to make up his little army. It was a vexatious assignment. The grand opportunity of the trappers came with the bitter rivalry of competing fur-companies. Exorbitant wages were demanded. Mr. Hunt discovered that at nearly every station where he had essayed to employ men that the active agents of the Missouri Fur Company, chief of whom was a Spaniard named Manuel Lisa, were neutralizing his best efforts by representing and exaggerating dangers from hostile tribes and barren wastes intervening between the Missouri plains and the Pacific. But the patient perseverance of Hunt was amply backed by the long purse of Astor. This combination overcame all obstacles. In April, 1811, the winter rendezvous at the mouth of the Nedowa (four hundred and eighty miles above St. Louis) was abandoned, and in four boats, one of large size and mounting a swivel and two howitzers, the party numbering sixty, set forth up the almost untraveled Missouri. With the company were five of Astor's partners; Hunt, Crooks, Mackenzie, Miller and Maclellan. There were, also, two English naturalists, Bradbury and Nuttall, and a clerk named Reed. Forty of the party were Canadian voyageurs, and on them devolved the duties of rowing, transporting, carrying, cooking and other general drudgery. Next in order of ascending succession came the American trappers and hunters. It was theirs to hunt and fight, plan and explore, and when the proper place was gained to cast themselves upon the mercy of savages and wild beasts; endure hunger and thirst and, despite every difficulty, establish trading posts. That was the great commercial end in view. The party thus bountifully supplied designed following, so nearly as possible, the route blazed by Lewis and Clark.

On the passage up the Big Muddy (Missouri) scenes thrilling and exciting were encountered. Especially was this the case on their way through the country of the Sioux Tetons. But they encountered no serious impediments; June 11th they reached a large village of the Arickaras, fourteen hundred and thirty miles above the mouth of the Missouri. At this point it had been determined to abandon the canoes and, securing horses, strike across the country south of Lewis and Clark's route, thus avoiding the ferocious Blackfeet, who, alike the terror of the other Indians, and of the whites, dominated all the region of the upper Missouri. So with eighty-two horses heavily loaded—the partners only, together with the family of Pierre Dorion being mounted—on the 8th of July they set out hopefully, despite the many gloomy prognostications from trappers remaining at the Arickara village, on their march across the Great American Desert and through the volcanic defiles of the great divide.

Day succeeded day; each morning's sun blazed its way from horizon to horizon above a scorching landscape. They did not seem, in fact, though taking a more direct route, to make so good time as had Lewis and Clark. Guided by the Crow Indians they penetrated each successive range to the final ridge, supposing each to be the last, only to wearily find, when it was surmounted that one yet higher succeeded. At last, on the 15th of September—the summer already gone—they ascended a lofty peak whence the boundless wilderness over which they had come as well as that which yet remained for them to traverse lay like a huge map in contour at their feet. To the westward their guide pointed out three shining peaks against the western sky, whose bases he assured the toil-worn party were washed by a tributary of the Columbia river. One hundred miles lay between this glittering goal and the travelers.

The verdant banks of Spanish river, a tributary of the Colorado, were passed, and then they laid in a large stock of buffalo meat; gave their jaded horses five days' rest and grateful grazing on the abundant grass, and on the 24th of September, crossing a narrow ridge, found themselves on the banks of a turbulent stream, recognized by their guide as one of the sources of the Snake river. From the name of their guide this stream was christened Hoback's river. The party descended the rugged promontories which flanked this stream, often in imminent danger of fatal falls, to its junction with a much larger one, which so much exceeded the first in fury of current that it received the name of Mad river. And now an important question arose; should they abandon the horses and build canoes with which to descend the stream? Although containing abundance of water for large boats, so impetuous was it that it rendered navigation a dangerous business. The amphibious Canadians insisted on making the attempt. Weary of the toilsome and rocky footpaths of the mountains; having implicit confidence in their skill in handling river craft, they longed to betake themselves once more to their favorite element and, paddle in hand, their gay French songs attuned and timed to the music of the paddles, they were ready to shoot another Niagara should it come in their way. To construct canoes the partners finally gave consent. The adjacent timber yielded its best woods for the projected boats. Meanwhile a party of three, of which the redoubtable John Day was one, voyaged down Mad river on a two days' journey of exploration. They returned with the dismal information that neither with boats nor with horses along the banks could the party possibly proceed.

Here was a calamitous set-back. The advice of Hoback to go to a trapping post which had been established the year before by Mr. Henry, of the Missouri Fur Company, was accepted. This post, Hoback said, was on the upper waters of the Snake and he was of the opinion that it was not very far distant. The Snake Indians who had come to their camp professed to know the location of Henry's post; they agreed to guide the party thither. October 4th they resumed their horseback march. Through four days of cold and blustering snow they journeyed only to gain a cluster of deserted log huts. This had been Henry's trading station, now utterly abandoned. Beside the huts flowed a beautiful river one hundred yards wide. To all appearances it was a fine, navigable stream. Two weeks of industry provided fifteen canoes; in these, hastily embarking, they pushed out into the stream. Two Snake Indians assumed the care of the abandoned horses. Nine men, also, including Mr. Miller, one of the partners, had been detached from the party at points between Mad and Henry rivers, as the new streams were called. These men were to divide into squads and trap on the neighboring streams. And thus, well provided with clothes, traps, horses and ammunition, they cheerfully set forth into the unknown and wintry recesses of the mountains, expecting to issue thence in the spring with a great stock of valuable peltries. With these they could make their best way to Astoria.

Rapidly on toward the sunset swept the canoes, the swift current aiding the skillful voyageurs, whose spirits rose to unwonted height so soon as they found themselves afloat. And soon they came to the mouth of a stream which they took for their old friend Mad river. They now considered themselves fairly embarked on the main body of the Snake; already in imagination they began to toss on the vast current of the Columbia, and even to smell the salt breeze of the smiling Pacific. For nine days they swept gaily on, with comparatively slight interruptions, making over three hundred miles from the place where they had first embarked. Then they encountered a most lamentable disaster. In the center canoe of the squadron were Mr. Crooks as bowman and Antoine Clappine as steersman. The first canoe passed a dangerous rapid; the second essayed to follow. The latter, with a sudden lurch, missed her course and the next instant split upon a rock. Crooks and three of his companions succeeded, after a hard struggle, in gaining land, but Clappine, one of the most popular and useful men in the company, was lost amid the boiling surges. They had now arrived at an unboatable chain of rapids and frightful bluffs, among which neither boats nor horses, nothing, in short, but wings, could be of any use. At the beginning of this tumultuous strait was one of those volcanic cracks peculiar to the rivers of this coast, in which the whole volume of the Snake is squeezed into a space thirty feet wide. This miniature maelstrom received from the disheartened boatmen the name "Cauldron Linn."

The entire squadron came to a halt. Here a portage was absolutely required. From the craggy, volcanic appearance about and below them, they had great fear that the obstructions extended a long distance. After a forty-mile tramp down the river Mr. Hunt discovered no prospect of successful navigation. Returning to the main body, therefore, and discovering that they had but five days' food and no prospect of getting more, he determined to divide the company into four parts, hoping that some of them might find abundant game and a way out of the lifeless, volcanic waste in which they were. One party, under Maclellan was to descend the river; another under Crooks was to ascend it, hoping to find game or Indian guides on the way but, if not, to keep on to the place where they had left their horses. Still another detachment under Mackenzie struck northward across the plains, having in view to reach the main Columbia.

Left in charge of the main body Mr. Hunt proceeded at once to cache a large portion of their goods. Nine caches having been made to hold the large deposit, they took careful notice of the land-marks of the neighborhood for future return, and then got themselves in readiness to move just as soon as the word should come from any of the scouting parties. Within three days Crooks and his party returned. Despairing of success on their doleful, retrograde march, they had determined to share with their companions whatever might await them on their onward trip. Five days later, the party meanwhile beginning to see ghastly famine staring them in the face, two of Maclellan's squad returned, bidding them abandon all thought of descending the river. For many miles it ran through volcanic sluice-ways, roaring and raging, at many places almost lost from sight underneath impending crags, generally inaccessible from its desert banks, so that, though within sound of its angry ravings, they had often laid down to their insufficient rest with parched and swollen tongues.

"Devil's Scuttle Hole" the half-famished travelers named this long volcanic chute that barred their progress. What now remained? Evidently nothing but to hasten with all speed, their lives being at stake, to some more habitable locality. Again the party was divided. Under Hunt one division passed down the north side of the river; the other under Crooks, took the opposite side. This course was pursued in order to increase the chances of finding food or meeting Indians. This dismal march was commenced November 9th, 1811. Until December they wandered on their course, cold, hungry, often on the verge of starvation. A few dogs were procured at an occasional Indian camp; once they got a few horses. Loaded down with baggage these animals, with scanty feed, soon became too weak for service; their attenuated carcasses, one by one, were devoured to appease the cruel hunger of these unfortunate people.

Around them all was desolation. No information could be secured from the few frightened, half-starved Snake Indians whom they encountered. However, the Indians claimed that the "Great River" was yet a long distance away. It was estimated by Hunt that they had now put about four hundred and seventy miles between them and Cauldron Linn. Evidently they were approaching something definite, for gigantic, snowy mountains, lifeless and almost treeless, seemed to bar their future way. But with the energy of despair they persisted; clamored painfully up precipitous, snow-crowned heights, until they gained elevation sufficient to command an extensive range of view.

With a wild waste of mountains in front, bitter winds whirling snow and sleet-pellets into their faces, they began to despair of forcing their way. The short winter's day shut in their despair, but they were compelled to camp in the snow. Timber was found in quantity sufficient to prevent freezing, but during the night another snow storm burst furiously upon them; sluggish daylight stealing through the snow-clogged atmosphere, found them in a perfect cloud. Far below them raved and plunged the river; yet that was their only guide to further progress. And to this repellant stream, down the wind-swept mountain side, they picked their painful way. And here the temperature was milder. They devoured one of their skinny horses; they crept a few miles along the rocky brink of the brawling flood; they made a cheerless camp. On the following morning (December 6th) they saw on the opposite bank a party of white men more forlorn and desolate than themselves. They proved to be Crooks and party. Hunt shouted across the raging stream; the other party discovered him and screamed for food. From the skin of the horse killed the night before Mr. Hunt constructed a canoe. In this crazy craft one of the daring Canadians successfully crossed the fearsome river, carrying with him a part of the horse and bringing back with him Crooks and Le Clerc.

The wasted forms and desponding looks of these two men were appalling. They gave a disheartening account of the insurmountable obstacles to a continuance down the river. To the last Indian camp they had passed Mr. Hunt determined to retrace his steps. Here he would make an effort to obtain guides and horses. On the following morning they took the back track. So weak were Crooks and Le Clerc that they greatly retarded the rest of the party. It was a moment of extremity; self-preservation is strong in human nature; some of the party besought Hunt to leave these two men to their fate. Hunt sternly refused to abandon his weakened partner. Gradually the men pushed ahead; at nightfall only five remained to bear him melancholy company. Of provisions they had none; nothing but four beaver skins. The morning following a bitter cold night found one of the men badly frostbitten. Hunt, finding Crooks entirely unable to travel, decided that his duty to the main column demanded his presence among them. He made the exhausted men as comfortable as possible, and leaving two of the men and all but one of the beaver skins with them, Hunt and the remaining three men hastened on. Another day and a night of famine and freezing brought them up to their companions. Vacant looks and tottering steps attested the ravages of hunger. For three days some of them had not tasted food. Toward evening of that distressing day they gazed with surprise and profound gratitude upon a lodge of Shoshones with a number of horses picketed around it.

Necessity knows no law. They descended on the camp, and seizing five horses, at once dispatched one of them. After a ravenous meal had satisfied their immediate necessities, they besought themselves of their deserted companions. A man was at once dispatched on horseback to convey food to them and to aid them in coming up. In the morning Crooks and the remaining three men made their appearance. Food must now be made accessible to the men on the opposite bank, but a superstitious terror seemed to have seized their companions as they gazed across the sullen river at them. Ghastly and haggard the poor wretches beckoning across with bony fingers, looked more like spectres than men. Unable to get any of the Canadians, overwhelmed as they were with ghostly fancies, to cross, one of the Kentucky hunters at last ventured the dangerous undertaking. Exerting all his strength he at last succeeded in landing a large piece of horse meat, and, encouraged by this, one of the Canadians also ventured over.

One of the starving crew, frantic by his long deprivations, insisted on returning in the canoe. Before they had reached shore the pleasant savor of the boiling meat so inspired him that he leaped to his feet and began to sing and dance. In the midst of this untimely festivity the canoe was overturned; the poor fellow was swept away in the icy current and lost.

John Day, considered when the expedition started the strongest man in the company, also crossed the river. His cavernous eyes and meagre frame showed well how intense had been the suffering of the detachment on the west bank of the river. Often the wild cherries, dried on the trees, together with their moccasins, were their only food.

The mountains which thus turned back this adventurous band were no doubt that desolate range bordering the Wallowa country near the mouth of the Salmon river. The detachments under Mackenzie and Maclellan, having reached these mountains before the heavy snows, and finding each other there, had stuck to that route until they had conquered it. After twenty-one days of extreme suffering and peril they had reached the Snake at a point apparently not far from the site of Lewiston, and building canoes there, descended the river with no great trouble, reaching Astoria about the middle of January.

Hunt and his men, saved from starvation by the discovery of the horses, hastened on to find Indian guides. But first Hunt, with his usual generosity, left at the lodge (for the occupants had fled at their coming) an amount of trinkets sufficient to pay for the horses they had taken. A few days later they reached a small village of Snake Indians. This, the largest village they had seen on this side of the mountains, they had observed on their down trip, but had not been able to secure any assistance from the inhabitants. Now, however, they demanded a guide. The Indians demurred; they represented that the distance to the river was so great that it would require from seventeen to twenty-one days of hard travel; the snow was waist deep and they would freeze. Quite hospitably they urged the party to stay with them, at the same time admitting that on the west side of the mountains was a large and wealthy tribe called the Sciatogas, from whom they might get food and horses. Hunt determined to push on if he could find a single Indian to accompany him. By a most bountiful offer Hunt gained his point. The party were informed that they must cross to the west bank of the river and enter the mountains to the west. Many of the company wanted to cast their lot with the band of Snakes, but with infinite tact and patience Hunt sustained their drooping spirits. But four of the Canadians, together with Crooks and John Day, were unable to go at all. At last in spite of doubt and weakness everything was got together (though they were compelled to desert their six sick companions), and in the bitter cold of the early evening (December 23), they crossed the river and at once struck for the mountains. They could make only about fourteen miles a day. Through the snow floundered their five jaded horses; their only food was one meal of horseflesh a day. On the 26th the mountains gave way to a beautiful valley, across which they journeyed twenty miles. This must have been Powder river valley. Leaving this attractive vale and turning again into the mountains a short but toilsome march brought them to a lofty height whence they looked down into a fair and snowless prairie, basking in the sunlight and appearing to the winter-worn travelers like a dream of summer. Soon they discerned six lodges of Shoshones well supplied with horses and dogs. With some flesh of the latter animals their hungry mouths were soon filled. It is apparent that this was Grande Ronde valley. The following morning the new year (1812) dawned upon them bright and cheerful; the Canadians must now have a holiday; not even famine or death could deprive them of their festivals. And so with dance and song and roasted dog meat, dog meat boiled, fried and fricasseed, they met the friendly overtures of the newly appointed potentate of time. Rested and refreshed they now addressed themselves to what the guides assured them was to be but a three-days' journey to the plains of the great river. Six days, however, passed ere the cloudy canopy which enswathed the snowy waste, hiding from sight both earth and sky, parted before a genial breath from some warmer clime. And wide below their snowy eyrie lay stretched the limitless and sunny plains of the Columbia. No more gladly did Cortez and his steel-clad veterans look from their post of observation upon the glittering halls of the Montezumas. Swiftly they descended the slopes of the mountains and emerged upon that diamond of the Pacific coast, the Umatilla plains.

Here were camped a tribe of the Sciatogas (Cayuses) or Tushepaws (Umatillas), comprising thirty-four lodges with two hundred horses. Well clad, active and hospitable, these Indians thawed out the well nigh frozen energies of the strangers. Rejoiced above all was Mr. Hunt to see the lodges, axes, kettles, etc., indicating that these Indians were in communication with the whites below. Answering eager questions the Indians replied that the "Great River" was two days distant, and that a party of white men had recently descended it. Concluding that these were Mackenzie and party Hunt was greatly relieved of one anxiety. After a thorough rest the wayfarers set forth across the broad plains and after a pleasant trip of two days duration on the horses obtained of the Tushepaws, they beheld before them a mighty stream, a mile wide, deep, blue, majestic, sweeping through the treeless plain—the Columbia. The toilsome, hazardous portion of their journey was at an end. But they had no timber for the manufacture of boats; the Indians were unwilling to sell them canoes. Thus they were compelled to wait until reaching The Dalles before they launched upon the bosom of the stream. In the vicinity of the present Rockland (they had come from Umatilla on the south bank of the river) they had a "hyas wa wa" with the redoubtable Wishram Indians. Sharpened by their location at the confluence of all the ways down stream, these Indians had clearly grasped the fundamental doctrine of civilized trade, to wit: Get the greatest possible return with the least possible outlay. To this end they levied a heavy toll on all unwary travelers. These levies were usually collected while the eyes of the taxed were otherwise engaged. In short, these Wishram Indians were professional thieves.

At first they endeavored to frighten Mr. Hunt into a liberal "potlatch." Then they represented the great service they had rendered the party in protecting them from the rapacity of other Indians; but finding no ready recognition of their claims save an occasional whiff at the pipe of peace, they gave up in disgust and contented themselves with picking up what little articles might be lying around loose. After no little haggling several finely made canoes were procured of these people and in these the last stage of the journey was begun. Nothing extraordinary marked the two-hundred-mile boat ride down the Columbia.

February 15th they rounded the bluffs at Tongue Point. And from here, with swelling hearts and moistened eyes they beheld the Stars and Stripes softly moving in undulating folds over the first civilized abode this side of St. Louis. Right beyond the parted headlands they recognized the gateway to the sun-kissed Pacific. Drawing near the shore they were greeted by the entire population of Astoria. First in the welcoming crowd came the party that had been led by Mackenzie and Maclellan. Until now these latter had entertained no hope that the Hunt division could escape the rigors of winter and death from famine. Truly affecting was their mutual joy; the Canadians, with French abandon, rushed into each other's arms, crying and hugging like long separated school girls. Even the hard-visaged Scotchmen and nonchalant Americans yielded to the unstinted gladness of the occasion. And the following day was devoted to feasting and story telling. Possibly, like the banqueting mariners exploited in the Aeneid, they discussed with prolonged speech the Amissos socios. As the reader will recall, these were Crooks and John Dav, with four Canadians, who had been left too ill to travel on the banks of the Snake. Of ever seeing them again but little hope was entertained. But their story is a natural sequel to what has gone before; it shall here be given:

The succeeding summer (1812) a party under Stuart and Maclellan, on their way from Okanogan to Astoria, saw wandering on the river bank near Umatilla, two naked beings, haggard and emaciated. Checking their canoes to investigate they discovered with glad surprise that these dejected objects were Day and Crooks. With abundant food and clothes their forlorn plight was quickly relieved; and while the canoes were flying down stream the two recent castaways related their pitiful tale. Left destitute of food and clothing they had sustained life by an occasional piece of beaver or horse meat given them by the Indians who, apparently struck with superstitious fear, refrained from molesting them. With rare heroism and self-abnegation Crooks had remained by the side of John Day until he was sufficiently recuperated to travel. Then, abandoned by three of the Canadians, they had plodded on amid Blue mountain snows, subsisting on roots and skins. March 1, 1812, having left the other Canadian exhausted at a Shoshone lodge Crooks and Day pressed on through a last mountain ridge and found themselves in the fair and fertile plains of the Walla Wallas.

They were received with that kindness which has ever marked the intercourse of these Indians with the whites. Having been fed and clothed they continued down the Columbia river with light hearts only to find at The Dalles that there are Indians and Indians—vast differences between the different tribes as well as between whites. The Eneeshurs, or Wishrams, as Washington Irving calls them, first disarming suspicion by a friendly exterior, perfidiously robbed them of the faithful rifles which thus far they had never lost sight of, and stripping them sent them forth into the wilderness. More wretched than ever they now turned toward friendly Walla Walla. And just as they were striking inland they providentially saw the rescuing party. And so, with increased gratitude, they all paddled away for Astoria. But John Day never recovered from the exposure and privations, through which he had passed during the winter of 1811-12. In insane frenzy, he once attempted suicide; prevented from this he soon pined away and died. The barren and bluff shores of John Day river possess added interest as we recall the melancholy story of the brave hunter who first explored them.

May 5, 1812, the Beaver, another of Astor's vessels, made the port of Astoria. Among those on board was Ross Cox, author of "Adventures on the Columbia River," a work of considerable historical value. About this period, also, Robert Stuart, while bearing dispatches by land to Mr. Astor, discovered the South Pass through the Rocky mountains; in later years this became the notable gateway to the Pacific for immigrant trains.

But now, above the little colony on the shores of the Pacific clouds began to darken. August 4th, with Mr. Hunt on board, the Beaver sailed northward for Sitka. Here he entered into an agreement with the Russian governor, Baranoff, the essential points of which were that the Russian and American companies should forbear interference with each other's territory and to operate as allies in expelling trespassers on the rights of either. The captain of the Beaver had been instructed to return to Astoria before sailing for Canton; but instead of doing so the vessel sailed direct; Mr. Hunt was carried to Oahu, there to await a vessel expected from New York, on which he should obtain passage to Astoria. But he did not arrive in time to avert the impending calamity which befel the Pacific Fur Company. War was declared between Great Britain and the United States. It was learned by Astor that the Northwest Company was preparing a ship mounting twenty guns, the Isaac Todd, with which to assault and capture Astoria. To the United States he appealed for aid, but his efforts were unavailing. Impending disaster was thickening around the American settlement. Mackenzie was unsuccessful at his post on the Shahaptan river, and had determined to press for a new post. He visited Clarke, and while the two were together John George MacTavish, of the Northwestern Company, paid them a visit and vauntingly informed them of the sailing of the Isaac Todd and of her mission, the capture or destruction of Astoria. At once Mackenzie returned to his post on the Shahaptan, broke camp, cached his provisions and set out in haste for Astoria, at which point he arrived January 16, 1813. In the absence of Hunt, MacDougal was agent-in-chief at Astoria. It was resolved by him and Mackenzie that they should abandon Astoria in the spring and recross the mountains. Mackenzie at once set off to recover his cached provisions and to trade them for horses for the journey. He also carried dispatches to Messrs. Clarke and David Stuart advising them of the intention to abandon Astoria and directing them to make preparations accordingly. Mackenzie met a party of the Northwest Company, with MacTavish as one of their leaders, and the parties camped, as Irving says, "mingled together as united by a common interest instead of belonging to rival companies trading under hostile flags."

Mackenzie reached his destination; there he discovered that his cache had been despoiled by Indians. He, Clarke and Stuart met at Walla Walla according to arrangement and together descended the Columbia, reaching Astoria June 12th.

Stuart and Clarke refused to break up their posts, provide horses or make any other preparations for leaving the country. Furthermore, Mackenzie's disappointment in finding his cache broken into and its contents stolen made it necessary that the departure should be delayed beyond July 1st, the date set by MacDougal for dissolution of the company. Treason was to be allowed time and opportunity to do its worst. MacTavish who was camped at the fort, began negotiations for the purchase of trading goods and it was proposed by MacDougal to trade him the post on the Spokane for horses to be delivered the next spring, which proposition was eventually accepted. An agreement for the dissolution of the company to take effect the next June was signed by the four partners, Clarke and Stuart yielding to the pressure much against their wills. Hunt, who arrived August 20th, also reluctantly yielded, the discouraging circumstances having been pictured darkly to him by MacDougal, the latter pretending to be animated by a desire to protect Mr. Astor's interests before the place should fall into the hands of the British whose war vessels were on their way to effect its capture. Hunt then sailed to secure a vessel to convey the property to the Russian settlements for safe keeping while the war lasted, first arranging that MacDougal should be placed in full charge of the establishment after January 1st should he fail to return.

While en route to advise Messrs. Clarke and Stuart of the new arrangement, Mr. Mackenzie and party met MacTavish and J. Stuart with a company of men descending the river to meet the Phoebe and the Isaac Todd. Clarke had been advised of the situation and was accompanying them to Astoria. Mackenzie decided to return also to the fort, and with Clarke attempted to slip away in the night and so reach Astoria before the members of the Northwest Company arrived; he was discovered and followed by two of MacTavish's canoes. Both MacTavish and Mackenzie reached their objective point October 7th, and the party of the former camped at the fort. Next day MacDougal, by way of preparation for his final coupe, read a letter announcing the sailing of the Phoebe and the Isaac Todd with orders "to take and destroy everything American on the Northwest Coast."

"This dramatic scene," says Evans, "was followed by a proposition of MacTavish to purchase the interests, stocks, establishments, etc., of the Pacific Fur Company. MacDougal then assumed sole control and agency because of the non-arrival of Hunt, and after repeated conferences with MacTavish, in which the presence of the other partners was ignored, the sale was concluded at certain rates. A few days later J. Stuart arrived with the remainder of the Northwest party. He objected to MacTavish's prices and lowered the rates materially. Mr. Stuart's offer was accepted by MacDougal and the agreement of transfer was signed October 16th. By it Duncan MacDougal, for and on behalf of himself, Donald Mackenzie, David Stuart and John Clarke, partners of the Pacific Fur Company, dissolved July 1st, pretended to sell to his British confreres and co-conspirators of the Northwest Company 'the whole of the establishments, furs and present stock on hand, on the Columbia and Thompson's rivers.'" Speaking of this transaction in a letter to John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, Mr. Astor said:

"MacDougal transferred all of my property to the Northwest Company, who were in possession of it by sale, as he called it, for the sum of fifty-eight thousand dollars, of which he retained fourteen thousand dollars as wages said to be due to some of the men. From the price obtained for the goods, etc., and he having himself become interested in the purchase and made a partner in the Northwest Company, some idea may be formed of this man's correctness of dealing. He sold to the Northwest Company eighteen thousand one hundred and seventy pounds of beaver at two dollars, which was at that time selling in Canton at five and six dollars per skin. I estimate the whole property to be worth nearer two hundred thousand dollars than forty thousand dollars, about the sum I received in bills on Montreal."

Of course this was a scandalous deal on the part of MacDougal, whose historical record shows him to have been a man bearing the hall mark of a consummate rascal. And yet had Mr. Astor gone a trifle farther with his figures he would have plumped against the fact that, even at MacDougal's ruinous discount on the furs, he was receiving a far greater proportion of their intrinsic value than he had allowed the ignorant, unlettered savages. In his complaint to Secretary of State Adams Mr. Astor did not come into court with clean hands.

Subsequent to the transfer of Mr. Astor's property by MacDougal the latter's conduct appears to have been "in studied and consistent obedience to the interests of the Northwest Company." On Mr. Hunt's return, February 28, 1814, in the brig Pedler, which he had purchased to convey Mr. Astor's property to a place of safety, he found his old partner whom he had left in charge of the fort still presiding over it, but now a dignitary in the camp of the enemy. No other course was open for him but to digest the venom of his chagrin with the best possible grace; take his diminutive drafts on Montreal and sail away in the Pedler for Manhattan Island. MacDougal had been given a full partnership in the Northwest Company. What was the consideration?

With the arrival of the British vessels Astoria became a British possession. On December 12th took place the formal change of sovereignty and the raising of the Union Jack. To obliterate all trace of Mr. Astor's operations the name of Astoria was changed to Fort George. The following spring the Isaac Todd arrived with a cargo of trading goods and supplies. These enabled the Northwest Company to enter vigorously in the prosecution of business in the territory of their former rival in the "pelt industry."

"Thus disgracefully failed," says Evans, "a magnificent enterprise which merited success for sagacity displayed in its conception, its details, its objects; for the liberality and munificence of its projector in furnishing means for its thorough execution; for the results it had aimed to produce. It was inaugurated purely for commercial purposes. Had it not been transferred to its enemies, it would have pioneered the colonization of the Northwest Coast by citizens of the United States; it would have furnished the natural and peaceful solution of the question of the right to the territory drained by the Columbia and its tributaries.

"The scheme was grand in its aim, magnificent in its breadth of purpose and area of operation. Its results were naturally feasible, not over-anticipated. They were but the logical and necessary sequence of the pursuit of the plan. Mr. Astor made no miscalculation, no omission; neither did he permit a sanguine hope to lead him into any wild or imaginary ventures. He was practical, generous, broad. He executed what Sir Alexander Mackenzie urged should be adopted as the policy of British capital and enterprise. That one American citizen should have individually undertaken what two mammoth British companies had not the courage to try was but an additional cause which had intensified national prejudice into embittered jealousy on the part of his British rivals, the Northwest Company."

By the first article of the Treaty of Ghent entered into between Great Britain and the United States, December 14, 1814, it was agreed that "all territory, places and possessions whatsoever taken by either party from the other, during or after the war, should be restored." Thus Astoria again became the possession of the United States, and in September, 1817, the government sent the sloop-of-war, Ontario, "to assert the claim of the United States to the sovereignty of the adjacent country, and especially to reoccupy Astoria or Fort George." The formal surrender of the fort is dated October 6, 1818.

The United States government had been urged by Mr. Astor to repossess Astoria, and he intended fully to resume operations in the basin of the Columbia, but the Pacific Fur Company was never reorganized, and never again did the great "pelt trader" engage in business on the shores of the Pacific.

CHAPTER IV

THE OREGON CONTROVERSY.

The struggle of five nations for possession of "Oregon," a domain embracing indefinite territory, but including the present states of Oregon, Washington and Idaho, and a portion of British Columbia, ran through a century and a half, culminating in the "Oregon Controversy" between England and the United States. Through forty years of diplomatic sparring, advances, retreats, demands, concessions and unperfected compromises the contest was waged between the two remaining champions of the cause, the United States and Great Britain. British parliamentary leaders came and went; federal administrations followed each other successively, and each in turn directed the talents of its able secretaries of state to that vital point in American politics, Oregon.

The question became all important and far reaching. It involved at different periods all the cunning diplomacy of the Hudson's Bay Company, backed by hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling; it brought to the front conspicuously the life tragedy of a humble missionary among the far western Indians, Dr. Marcus Whitman; it aroused the spirited patriotism of American citizenship from Maine to Astoria, and it evoked the sanguinary defi from American lips, "Fifty-four forty or fight."

It closed with a compromise, quickly, yet effectually consummated; ratification was immediate, and the "Oregon Controversy" became as a tale that is told, and from a live and burning issue of the day it passed quietly into the sequestered nook of American history.

To obtain a fairly comprehensive view of the question it becomes necessary to hark back to 1697, the year of the Treaty of Ryswick, when Spain claimed as her share of North America, as stated by William Barrows, in Chapter II. of this part of the general history. Nor was France left out at the Ryswick partition of the world. She claimed in the south and in the north, and it was her proud boast that from the mouth of the Penobscot along the entire seaboard to the unknown and frozen Arctic, no European power divided that coast with her, nor the wild territory back of it. At the date of this survey, 1697, Russia was quiescent. She claimed no possessions. But at the same time Peter the Great and his ministers were engaged in deep thought. Results of these cogitations were afterward seen in the new world, in a territory known for many years to school children as Russian America, now the Klondyke, Cape Nome, Dawson, Skaguay, Bonanza Creek, the Yukon—the places where the gold comes from. Russia entered the lists; she became the fifth competitor, with Spain, England, France and the United States, for Oregon.

Passing over the events of a hundred years, years of cruel wars; of possession and dispossession among the powers; the loss by France of Louisiana, and the tragedy of the Plains of Abraham, we come to the first claims of Russia. She demanded all the Northwest Coast and islands north of latitude 51 degrees and down the Asiatic coast as low as 45 degrees, 50 minutes, forbidding "all foreigners to approach within one hundred miles of these coasts except in case of extremity." Our secretary of state, John Quincy Adams, objected to this presumptuous claim. Emphatically he held that Russia had no valid rights on that coast south of the 55th degree. Vigorous letters were exchanged and then "the correspondence closed." Great Britain took sides with the United States. Our protest was emphasized by proclamation of the now famous "Monroe Doctrine," the substance of which lies in these words: "That the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for colonization by any European power."

Subsequently it was agreed between Russia and the United States, in 1824, that the latter country should make no new claim north of 54 degrees, 40 minutes, and the Russians none south of it. With Great Britain Russia made a similar compact the year following, and for a period of ten years this agreement was to be binding, it being, however, understood that the privilege of trade and navigation should be free to all parties. At the expiration of this period the United States and Great Britain received notice from Russia of the discontinuance of their navigation and trade north of 54 degrees, 40 minutes.

Right here falls into line the Hudson's Bay Company. Between Great Britain and Russia a compromise was effected through a lease from Russia to this company of the coast and margin from 54 degrees, 40 minutes, to Cape Spencer, near 58 degrees. Matters were also satisfactorily adjusted with the United States.

The final counting out of Russia from the list of competitors for Oregon dates from 1836. During a controversy between England and Russia the good offices of the United States were solicited, and at our suggestion Russia withdrew from California and relinquished all claims south of 54 degrees, 40 minutes. And now the contest for Oregon was narrowed down between Great Britain and the United States. But with the dropping of Russia it becomes necessary to preserve intact the web of this history.

May 16, 1670, the Hudson's Bay Company was chartered by Charles II. Headed by Prince Rupert the original incorporators numbered eighteen. The announced object of the company was the "discovery of a passage into the South Sea"—the Pacific Ocean. During the first century of its existence the company really did something along the lines of geographical discovery. Afterward its identity was purely commercial. Twelve hundred miles from Lake Superior, in 1778, the eminent Frobisher and others had established a trading post, or "factory," at Athabasca. Fort Chipewyan was built ten years later and Athabasca abandoned. From this point Mackenzie made his two overland trips to the Pacific, treated in the first chapter of this work. Commenting upon these expeditions, from a political view point, William Barrows in "Oregon: The Struggle for Possession," says:

"The point reached by Mackenzie on the Pacific is within the present limits of British Columbia on the coast (53 degrees, 21 minutes), and it was the first real, though undersigned step toward the occupation of Oregon by Great Britain. That government was feeling its way daringly, and blindly, for all territory it might obtain, and in 1793 came thus near the outlying region which afterward became the coveted prize of our narrative."

Between the United States and possession of Oregon stood, like a stone wall, the Hudson's Bay Company. It was the incarnation of England's protest against our occupancy. Such being the case it is a fortuitous opportunity to glance briefly at the complexion of this great commercial potentate of the Northwest Coast. Aside from Geographical discoveries there was another object set forth in the Hudson's Bay Company's charter. This was the "finding of some trade for furs, minerals and other considerable commodities." Moreover an exclusive right was granted by the charter to the "trade and commerce of all those seas, straits and bays, rivers, lakes, creeks and sounds, in whatsoever latitude they shall be, that lie within the entrance of the straits commonly called Hudson's Straits." The charter extended, also, to include all lands bordering them not under any other civilized government.

This ambiguous description covered a vast territory—and Oregon. And of this domain, indefinitely bounded, the Hudson's Bay Company became, monarch, tyrant and autocrat, rather an unpleasant trinity to lie adjacent to the gradually increasing and solidifying republic of the United States. Then, with the old company, was united the Northwestern Company, at one period a rival, now a component part of the great original "trust" of the Christian era. The crown granted to the new syndicate the exclusive right to trade with all Indians in British North America for a term of twenty years. Their hunters and trappers spread themselves throughout the entire northwest of North America. Their fur monopoly extended so far south as the Salt Lake basin of modern Utah. Rivals were bought out, under-sold or crushed. The company held at its mercy all individual traders from New Foundland to Vancouver; from the head of the Yellowstone to the mouth of the Mackenzie. With no rivals to share the field the extent of territory under the consolidated company seems almost fabulous—one-third larger than all Europe; larger than the United States of today—barring the Philippines and Hawaii—but Alaska included, by, as Mr. Barrows states, "half a million of square miles." And it was preparing, backed by the throne of England, to swallow and assimilate "Oregon." Concerning this most powerful company Mr. Barrows has contributed the following graphic description:

One contemplates their power with awe and fear, when he regards the even motion and solemn silence and unvarying sameness with which it has done its work throughout that dreary animal country. It has been said that a hundred years has not changed its bills of goods ordered from London. The company wants the same muskrat and beaver and seal; the Indian hunter, unimproved, and the half-breed European, deteriorating, want the same cotton goods and flint-lock guns and tobacco and gew-gaws. Today, as a hundred years ago, the dog sledge runs out from Winnipeg for its solitary drive of five hundred or two thousand or even three thousand miles. It glides silent as a spectre over those snow fields and through the solemn still forests, painfully wanting in animal life. Fifty, seventy, a hundred days it speeds along, and as many nights it camps without fire and looks up to the same cold stars. At the intervening points the sledge makes a pause, as a ship, having rounded Cape Horn, heaves to before some lone Pacific island. It is the same at the trader's hut or "factory," as when the sledge man's grandfather drove up the same kind of dogs; the same half-breeds or voyagers to welcome him; the same foul, lounging Indians, and the same mink-skin in exchange for the same trinket. The fur animal and its purchaser and hunter, as the landscape, seem to be alike under the same immutable law of nature:

"A land where all things always seem the same," as among the lotus-eaters. Human progress and Indian civilization have scarcely made more improvement than that central, silent partner of the Hudson's Bay Company—the beaver.

Originally the capital stock of this company at the time the charter was granted by Charles II, was $50,820. Through profits alone it was tripled twice within fifty years, going as high as $457,380, without any additional money being paid in by stock holders. The Northwest Company was absorbed in 1821 on a basis of valuation equal to that of the Hudson's Bay Company. Then the consolidated capital stock was $1,916,000, of which $1,780,866 was from profits. And during all this elapsed periods an annual dividend of ten per cent. had been paid to stockholders. One cargo of furs, leaving Fort George for London in 1836, was valued at $380,000. In 1837 the consolidated company organized the Puget Sound Agricultural Company. This was intended to serve as an offset to encroachments of colonists from the United States which settled in Oregon. In 1846 the English government conceded United States claims to Oregon, and at that period the Hudson's Bay Company claimed property within the territory said to be worth $4,990,036.67.

In 1824 the Hudson's Bay Company became the sole owner and proprietor of the trade west of the Rocky mountains, and of all the rights accruing under the license of trade of December 5, 1821. An extended narration of the methods and rules of this corporation would be quite interesting, but mindful of our assigned limits and province, we are compelled to be brief. The company has been aptly characterized by Evans as an "impetium in imperio," and such it was, for it was in possession of absolute power over its employes and the native races with whom it traded. It was constituted "The true and absolute lords and proprietors of the territories, limits and places, save always the faith, allegiance, and sovereign dominion due to us (the crown), our heirs and successors to the same; to hold as tenants in fee and common soccage, and not by knight's service, reserving as a yearly rent, two elks and two black beavers." Power was granted, should occasion rise, to "send ships of war, men or ammunition to any post, fort or place for the defense thereof; to raise military companies, and appoint their officers; to make war or conclude peace with any people (not Christian), in any of their territories," also "to seize the goods, estate or people of those countries for damages to the company's interest, or for the interruption of trade; to erect and build forts, garrisons, towns, villages; to establish colonies, and to support such establishments by expeditions fitted out in Great Britain, to seize all British subjects not connected with the company, or employed by them, or in such territory by their license, and send them to England." Should one of its traders, factors or other employes "contemn or disobey an order, he was liable to be punished by the president or council, who were authorized to prescribe the manner and measure of punishment. The offender had the right to appeal to the company in England, or he might be turned over for trial by the courts. For the better discovery of abuses and injuries by the servants, the governor and company, and their respective president, chief agent or governor in any of the territories, were authorized to examine upon oath all factors, masters, pursers, supercargoes, commanders of castles, forts, fortifications, plantations or colonies, or other persons, touching or concerning any matter or thing sought to be investigated." To further strengthen the hands of the company the charter concludes with a royal mandate to all "admirals, vice admirals, justices, mayors, sheriffs, constables, baliffs and all and singular other our officers, ministers, liegemen, subjects whatsoever, to aid, favor, help, and assist the said governor and company to enjoy, as well on land as on the seas, all the promises in said charter contained, whensoever required."

"Endowed with an empire over which the company exercised absolute dominion, subject only to fealty to the crown, its membership, powerful nobles and citizens of wealth residing near and at the court jealously guarding its every interest, and securing for it a representation in the government itself, is it to be wondered," asks Evans, "that this imperium in imperio triumphantly asserted and firmly established British supremacy in every region in which it operated?"

Something of the modus operandi of this company must now be given. The chief factors and chief traders were paid no salaries, but instead were given forty per cent of the profits, divided among them on some basis deemed equitable by the company. The clerks received salaries varying from twenty to one hundred pounds per annum. Below these again were the servants, whose term of enlistment (for such in effect it was), was for five years, and whose pay was seventeen pounds per annum without clothing. The servant was bound by indenture to devote his whole time and labor to the company's interests; to yield obedience to superior officers; to defend the company's property; to faithfully obey the laws, orders, etc.; to defend officers and agents to the extent of his ability; to serve in the capacity of a soldier whenever called upon so to do; to attend military drill; and never to engage or be interested in any trade or occupation except with the company's orders for its benefit. In addition to the pittance paid him the servant was entitled, should he desire to remain in the country after the expiration of his term of enlistment, to fifty acres of land, for which he was to render twenty-eight days' service per annum for seven years. If dismissed before the expiration of his term, the servant, it was agreed, should be transported to his European home free of charge. Desertion or neglect might be punished by the forfeiture of even the wretched pittance—by no means so liberal as modern United States homestead laws—he was to receive. It was, furthermore, the policy of the company to encourage marriage with the Indian women, the purpose being to create family ties which should bind the poor slave to the soil. By the time the servant's term of enlistment had expired, there was, therefore, usually no choice left him but to re-enlist or accept the grant of land. "In times of peace laborers and operatives were ever on hand at mere nominal wages; in time of outbreak they were at once transformed into soldiers amenable to military usage and discipline."

The Indian policy of the company was no less politic than its treatment of its employes, but it had much more in it that was truly commendable. Its purpose did not bring its employes into conflict with the Indian, nor require his expulsion, neither was there danger that the lands of the savage would be appropriated or the graves of their people disturbed. The sale of intoxicants was positively and successfully prohibited. Conciliation was the wisest policy for the company, and it governed itself according; but when punishment was merited it was administered with promptness and severity. When depredations were committed the tribe to which the malefactor belonged was pursued by an armed force and compelled to deliver up the guilty one to his fate. A certain amount of civilization was introduced, and with it came an increase of wants, which demands could only be supplied at the company's forts. Indians were sent on hunting and trapping expeditions in all directions, so that concentrations of tribes became difficult, and if attempted, easily perceived in time to prevent it. Thus the company secured an influence over the savage and a place in his affections, from which it could not easily be dislodged.

In its treatment of missionaries, civil and military officers and others from the United States, the company's factors and agents were uniformly courteous and kind. The poor and unfortunate rarely asked assistance in vain. But woe to the American who attempted to trade with the Indian, to trap, hunt or do anything which brought him into competition with the British corporation. All the resources of a company supplied with an abundance of cheap labor, supported by the friendship and affection of the aboriginal peoples, backed by almost unlimited capital and fortified by the favor of one of the wealthiest and most powerful nations of the earth, were at once turned to crush him. Counter-establishments were formed in his vicinity and he was hampered in every way possible and pursued with the relentlessness of an evil fate until compelled to retire from the field.

Such being the conditions, there was not much encouragement for American enterprise in the basin of the Columbia. It is not, however, in the American character to yield a promising prospect without a struggle, and several times efforts were made at competition in the Oregon territory. Of some of these we must speak briefly, having devoted an entire chapter to the unfortunate enterprise of John Jacob Astor. The operations of William H. Ashley, west of the Rocky mountains, did not extend to the Oregon country and are of importance to our purpose only because in one of his expeditions, fitted out in 1826, he brought a six-pounder, drawn by mules across the Rocky mountains, thereby demonstrating the feasibility of a wagon road. In 1826 Jedediah S. Smith, of the Rocky Mountain Fur Company, encouraged by some previous success in the Snake River district, set out for the country west of the Great Salt Lake. He proceeded so far westward that no recourse was left him but to push onward to the Pacific, his stock of provisions being so reduced and his horses so exhausted that an attempt to return was deemed unwise. He went south to San Diego for horses and supplies, and experienced no little difficulty on account of the suspicions of the native Californians, who were jealous of all strangers, especially from the United States. Eventually, however, he was able to proceed northward to the Rogue river, thence along the shores of the Umpqua, in which vicinity serious difficulty with the Indians was experienced. Fifteen of the nineteen who constituted the party were massacred, indeed all who happened to be in camp at the time except one were killed. This man, aided by friendly Indians, reached Fort Vancouver, and told his story to the chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, Dr. John McLoughlin, who offered the Indians a liberal reward for the safe return of Smith and his two companions. A party of forty men was equipped at once to go to the Umpqua country, but before they started Smith and his men arrived. McLoughlin took steps to secure the property stolen from Smith and so successfully did he manage the affair that peltries to the value of over three thousand dollars were recovered, and the murderers were severely punished by other Indians. Smith was conquered by kindness and at his solicitation the Rocky Mountain Fur Company retired from the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company.

Of various other expeditions by Americans into the Oregon country and of the attempts by American vessels to trade along the coast we cannot speak. Some reference must, however, be made to the work of Captain B. L. E. Bonneville, who in 1831, applied for a two years leave of absence from the United States army that he might "explore the country to the Rocky mountains and beyond, with a view to ascertaining the nature and character of the several tribes of Indians inhabiting those regions; the trade which might profitable be carried on with them; quality of soil, productions, minerals, natural history, climate, geography, topography, as well as geology of the various parts of the country within the limits of the territories of the United States between our frontier and the Pacific." The request was granted. While Bonneville was informed that the government would be to no expense in fitting out the expedition, he was instructed that he must provide himself with suitable instruments and maps, and that he was to "note particularly the number of warriors that may be in each tribe of natives that may be met with, their alliance with other tribes, and their relative position as to state of peace or war; their manner of making war, mode of subsisting themselves during a state of war and a state of peace; their arms and the effect of them; whether they act on foot or on horse back; in short, every information useful to the government." It would seem that a government which asked such important services ought to have been willing to make some financial return, at least to pay the expenses. But Captain Bonneville was compelled to secure financial aid elsewhere. During the winter an association was formed in New York which furnished the necessary means, and May 1, 1832, the expedition set out, the party numbering one hundred and ten men. They took with them in wagons a large quantity of trading goods to be used in traffic with the Indians in the basins of the Colorado and Columbia rivers. Bonneville himself went as far west as Walla Walla. Members of his expedition entered the valleys of the Humboldt, Sacramento and Colorado rivers, but they were unable to compete with the experienced Hudson's Bay and Missouri companies and the enterprise proved a financial failure. The expedition derives its chief importance from the fact that it forms the basis of one of Washington Irving's most entertaining works, which will preserve to latest posterity something of the charm and fascination of that wild, weird traffic.

Captain Nathaniel J. Wyeth, of Massachusetts, projected, in 1832, an enterprise of curious interest and some historical importance. His plan was to establish salmon fisheries on the Columbia river, to be operated as an adjunct to, and in connection with, the fur and Indian trade. He crossed overland to Oregon, dispatching a vessel with trading goods via Cape Horn, but this vessel was never again heard from; so the enterprise met defeat. The following year Captain Wyeth returned to Boston, leaving, however, most of his party in the country. Many of the men settled in the Willamette valley, and one of them found employment as an Indian teacher for the Hudson's Bay Company.

Not discouraged by one failure, Captain Wyeth, in 1834, fitted out another land expedition and dispatched to the Columbia another vessel, the May Dacre, laden with trading goods. On reaching the confluence of the Snake and Port Neuf rivers, Wyeth erected a trading post there to which he gave the name of Fort Hall. Having sent out his hunting and trapping parties and made arrangements for the season's operations, he proceeded to Fort Vancouver, where about the same time the May Dacre arrived. He established a trading house and salmon fishery on Wapato (now Sauvie's) island, which became known as Fort William. The fishery proved a failure and the trading and trapping industry could not stand the competition and harassing tactics of the Hudson's Bay Company and the constant hostility of the Indians. George B. Roberts, who came to Oregon in 1831 as an employe of the Hudson's Bay Company, is quoted as having accounted for the trouble with the red men in this way: He said "that the island was thickly inhabited by Indians until 1830, when they were nearly exterminated by congestive chills and fever. There were at the time three villages on the island. So fatal were the effects of the disease that Dr. McLoughlin sent a party to rescue and bring away the few that were left, and to burn the village. The Indians attributed the introduction of the fever and ague to an American vessel that had visited the river a year or two previously. It is not, therefore, a matter of surprise to any who understood Indian character and their views as to death resulting from such diseases, that Wyeth's attempted establishment on Wapato island was subject to continued hostility. He was of a race to whom they attributed the cause of the destruction of their people; and his employes were but the lawful compensation according to their code for the affliction they had suffered.

Wyeth eventually returned to Massachusetts disheartened. Fort Hall ultimately passed into the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company, and with its acquisition by them practically ended American fur trade west of the Rocky mountains. But though Wyeth's enterprise failed so signally, his account of it, published by order of congress, attracted the attention of Americans to Oregon, and did much to stimulate its settlement. Paradoxical though it may sound, the Hudson's Bay Company's success in this instance was its failure.

It will be readily seen, then, that whatever advantage the establishment of fur-trading enterprises might give in the final settlement of the Oregon question was with the British. While we shall attempt a brief and succinct account of the "struggle for possession," it is now necessary to determine in some measure what the political mission of the Hudson's Bay Company might be, and what part that association was playing in international affairs. In 1837 the company applied to the home government for a new license granting enlarged privileges. In enforcing its request it pointed boastfully to its efficient services in successfully crushing out American enterprise, and in strengthening the British title to the territory, contrary to the spirit and letter of the Joint-Occupancy treaties of 1818 and 1827.

In presenting the Petition the company's chief representative in England, Sir John Henry Pelly, called the attention of the lords to the service rendered in securing to the mother country a branch of trade wrested from subjects of Russia and the United States of America; to the six permanent establishments it had on the coast, and the sixteen in the interior, besides the migratory and hunting parties; to its maritime force of six armed vessels; to its large pasture and grain farms, affording every species of agricultural produce and maintaining large herds of stock. He further averred that it was the intention of the company to still further extend and increase its farms, and to establish an export trade in wool, hides, tallow and other produce of the herd and the cultivated field, also to encourage the settlement of its retired servants and other emigrants under its protection. Referring to the soil, climate and other conditions of the country, he said they were such as to make it "as much adapted to agricultural pursuits as any spot in America; and," said he, "with care and protection the British dominion may not only be preserved in this country, which it has been so much the wish of Russia and America to occupy to the exclusion of British subjects, but British interest and British influence may be maintained as paramount in this interesting part of the coast of the Pacific."

One might almost expect that Great Britain would utter some word of reproof to a company which could have the audacity to boast of violating her treaty compacts with a friendly power. Not so, however. She became a party to the breach of faith. Instead of administering merited reproof she rewarded the wrong-doer by promptly issuing a new license to extend and be in force for a period of twenty-one years.

With such gigantic and powerful competition for the territory of Oregon it is surprising that even so determined a government as that of the United States should have succeeded in ousting it from its trespass on our property. Nor could this have been accomplished had it not been for the pluck, skill, determination and indomitable energy of our hardy pioneers. While the sale of rabbit skins alone in London, in one year, ordinarily amounted to thirteen hundred thousand, the company found its profit also in the beaver, land and sea-otter, mink, fisher, muskrat, fox, racoon, sable, black, brown and grizzly bear and buffalo. And in search for these fur-bearing animals the hunters of the company braved every danger and spread themselves over the wild half of North America. So far from carrying out the provisions of its charter relating to geographical discovery, early in the nineteenth century the company threw every obstacle possible in the way of such discoveries. Evidently it feared rivals. Sir John Barrow, in his "History of Arctic Voyages," says: "The Northwest Passage seems to have been entirely forgotten, not only by the adventurers, who had obtained their exclusive charter under this pretext, but also by the nation at large; at least nothing more appears to have been heard on the subject for more than half a century."

And what of the darker deeds of this mysterious, silent, yet powerful commercial aggregation? In 1719 it refused a proposal from Mr. Knight that two vessels be sent by him to look up a rumored copper mine at the mouth of an arctic river. In 1741 the company showed signs of hostility toward a Mr. Dobbs, engaged in the same enterprise. The failure of Captain Middleton, commissioned by the Lords of Admiralty to explore northern and western waters of Hudson's Bay, is attributed to a bribe of five thousand pounds received from the company. The beacon light at Fort York was cut down in 1746 to insure the complete wreck of an exploring party then aground in that vicinity. Much of the information concerning auriferous deposits brought back by Mackenzie from his two journeys was suppressed. Thus the self-sufficient Hudson's Bay people missed the grand and astonishing produce of the Alaska regions—deposits more valuable than all the profits of their fur trade for a century. The Hudson's Bay Company had set its face steadily against mineral development. Even that industry was regarded as a rival. Following the assassination of Dr. Marcus Whitman by Indians, in 1847, one of the survivors of the massacre was refused the protection of Fort Walla Walla then under command of an agent of the Hudson's Bay Company. Taken as a whole this aggregation of English capital appears to have been as antagonistic to English enterprise as it was to American commerce, but all the time working like a mole underground.

Previously to the War of 1812 England had strenuously urged the Ohio as the western limit of the colonies. She seduced various Indian tribes to oppose western immigration. In 1811 General Harrison, afterward president, attempted to hold a friendly conference with the great Tecumseh. The meeting was disrupted by the latter, and it required the battle of Tippecanoe to teach the warriors a bloody object lesson. Then followed the War of 1812. In this Great Britain made an effort to recover the northwest, but failed signally. But the Hudson's Bay Company was the incarnation of England in North America. And when the nation failed the commercial syndicate succeeded—for a time. While the United States had legal, she had not, owing to the interference of this arrogant company, actual possession and occupancy.

Following the close of the Revolution and the treaty of 1783, an attempt was made to run a northern boundary for the United States. It looked well—on paper. It traversed wild, unexplored territory unknown to either party to the agreement. Says Barrows:

Thus the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods was assumed for one bound from which the line was to run, to the northwestern point of the lake, and thence "due west" to the Mississippi. The clause in the treaty reads thus: "To the said Lake of the Woods, and thence through the said lake to the most northwestern point thereof, and from thence on a due west course to the Mississippi." But the head of the river proved to be a hundred miles or more to the south. So that little prominence in our otherwise straight boundary is the bump of ignorance developed by two nations. The St. Croix was fixed by treaty as the boundary on the northeast, but a special "Joint Commission" was required in 1794 to determine "what river is the St. Croix," and four years afterward the commission called for an addition to their instructions, since the original ones were not broad enough to enable them to determine the true St. Croix.

In 1841 another commission ran a boundary from the head of the St. Croix, by the head of the Connecticut, to the St. Lawrence; thence through the middle of its channel and the middle of the lakes to the outlet of Lake Superior, occupying the whole of seven years. And yet the line had not been carried through Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods. Finally, in 1818, this was done, and an agreement reached, though this line was not on the 49th parallel, from the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky mountains, the line that was offered by Great Britain, accepted by one administration, refused by another, and finally adopted instead of "Fifty-four forty or fight." Still the English commission was loath to part with the Mississippi Valley. They asked for a right of way to the headwaters of that stream. At the same time the southern limits of their northern possessions did not come within one hundred miles of the source of the Mississippi from whence its waters flow more than three thousand miles to the Gulf of Mexico. The commission, however, abandoned this claim and turned, to stand resolutely on latitude 49 degrees. During negotiations with England in 1818, a compromise was effected which provided for a joint occupation of Oregon for ten years. In 1827 it was renewed to run indefinitely, with a provision that it could be terminated by either party by giving one year's notice. The Ashburton-Webster treaty of 1842 fixed the line between the St. Croix and St. Lawrence. In 1846 another commission failed to accomplish results in extending a line to the westward through their inability to agree on the "middle of the channel" between the mainland and Vancouver Island.

Not until 1872 was this latter question decided. It was submitted to the Emperor of Germany as final arbiter. He decided favorably to the claim of the United States. Thus the boundary question was prolonged eighty-nine years, under eight treaties and fifteen specifications, until final adjustment in its entirety. The Oregon boundary remained in dispute up to 1847. It may here be appropriately remarked that the Joint Boundary Commission of 1818, agreeing on the 49th parallel, might have carried the line to a satisfactory point had they not been stopped by fur traders. Two companies were then attempting to gain possession of the territory.

The expedition of Lewis and Clark, 1804-6, opened the eyes of England. Jealous lest Americans should gain an advantage, Laroque was sent by the Northwestern Company to sprinkle the Columbia river country with trading posts. But Laroque gained no farther westing than the Mandan Indian village on the Missouri. In 1806 Fraser, having crossed the mountains, made the first English settlement by erecting a post on Fraser Lake. Others soon followed and New Caledonia came into existence. It had remained for daring frontiersmen to open the dramatic contest for possession of Oregon. Diplomats and ministers had dallied and quibbled. Now the contest had become serious and earnest. The part that John Jacob Astor played we have detailed in another chapter.

The War of 1812 was declared on June 12, 1812; the treaty of peace was signed December 14, 1814. It contained this clause materially affecting our interests in Oregon: "All territory, places and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war * * * shall be restored without delay." Did this provision cover Astoria? Apparently the English thought not, for when, in 1817, an American vessel was put in readiness to occupy that post Mr. Bagot, the English minister at Washington, opposed it. Two points are noted in his protest: The post had been sold to the Northwest Company prior to the war; therefore never captured. Secondly, "the territory itself was early taken possession of in his majesty's name, and had since been considered a part of his majesty's domains." But repossession was granted despite the protest. In 1818 the Stars and Stripes again waved over Astoria and the name "St. George" was relegated to the limbo of the obsolete.

But the Oregon question was not dead; only hibernating. It sprang into life at the behest of the eloquent Rufus Choate. From his seat in the United States senate he said:

"Keep your eyes always open, like the eye of your own eagle, upon the Oregon. Watch day and night. If any new developments or policy break forth, meet them. If the times change, do you change. New things in a new world. Eternal vigilance is the condition of empire as well as liberty."

For twenty-seven years the threads of diplomatic delay and circumlocution were spun out concerning the status of Oregon. Theoretically Astoria had been restored to us; practically the Northwest's Company's fur traders thronged the land. The English company had built a stockade fort. It signified that they intended to hold possession of the mouth of the Columbia vis et armis. Indian tribes ranged themselves on the side of the English. Their minds had been poisoned; insidious words had been breathed into their ears to the effect that the Americans would steal their lands; the English wanted only to trade with them for furs. And for more than ten years following the treacherous sale of Astoria, there were scarcely any Americans in the country. Greenhow, in his "History of Oregon and California," declares that at the period when the Hudson's Bay Company was before parliament, in 1837, asking for renewal of its charter, they "claimed and received the aid and consideration of government for their energy and success in expelling the Americans from the Columbia regions, and forming settlements there by means of which they were rapidly converting Oregon into a British colony."

Astoria was restored to the United States by the Treaty of Ghent in 1814. Yet in that document there is no allusion to the Northwest Coast, or in fact, any territory west of the Lake of the Woods. Our instructions to the American plenipotentiaries were to concede nothing to Great Britain south of the forty-ninth parallel. Thus the question was left in abeyance with no defined boundary between English and American territory west of the Lake of the Woods. The southern boundary of Oregon was, also, in doubt. It was not definitely fixed until the Florida Purchase. Then it was decided that parallel forty-two, on the Pacific, running east from that ocean to the Arkansas, down the river to longitude one hundred; on that meridian south till it strikes the Red river; down the Red river to longitude ninety-four; due south on it to the Sabine river; and down the Sabine to the Gulf of Mexico, should define the southern and western boundaries of the Louisiana Purchase of 1803, which up to that date had remained indefinite. This act fixed, also, the southern boundary of Oregon.

Until 1820 congress remained dormant so far as Oregon interests were concerned. Then it was suggested that a marine expedition be dispatched to guard our interests at the mouth of the Columbia and aid immigration from the United States. Nothing resulted. In 1821 the same question was revived, but again permitted to relapse into desuetude. Mr. Barrows does not use too strong language when he says: "There appeared to be a lack of appreciation of the case, and there was a skepticism and lethargy concerning that half of the union, which have by no means disappeared."

In 1814 the question having been reopened in London Mr. Rush claimed for the United States from the forty-second to the fifty-first parallel. This section would embrace all the waters of the Columbia. Per contra the English demanded possession of the northern half of the Columbia basin. This would have given us, as the northern boundary of Oregon, the Columbia river from a point where it intersects the forty-ninth parallel to its mouth. It is well to examine, at this point, what such a boundary would have meant to Washington. Had it been accepted there would, probably, never have been any state of Washington, at least, not as subsequently defined.

Thus remained the status of dispute until 1828. Joint occupancy had now continued ten years. It must be conceded that the country, owing to this provision, was now numerically British. And English ministers were eager to avail themselves of the advantages of this fact. They said:

In the interior of the territory in question the subjects of Great Britain have had, for many years, numerous settlements and trading posts—several of these posts on the tributary streams of the Columbia, several upon the Columbia itself, some to the northward and others to the southward of that river. * * * In the whole of the territory in question the citizens of the United States have not a single settlement or trading post. They do not use that river, either for the purpose of transmitting or receiving any produce of their own to or from other parts of the world.

Yet why was this the condition of Oregon at that period? Simply because the aggressiveness of the Northwest Company had opposed American colonization and fought each and every advance made by our pioneers, commercially and otherwise. Nor can it be denied that for many years Oregon was unappreciated by the east. Today it appears to unreflecting minds, an extravagant boast to say that only one-fifth of the domain of the United States lies east of the Mississippi river. And yet the statement is true.

Only in 1854 did the initial railway gain the banks of the Father of Waters—at Rock Island. From there progress to the northwest was, for many years, slow, perilous and discouraging. Truly, it was a difficult matter for Oregon to assert herself. In 1828 an "Oregon wave" had swept over congress, amid considerable feverish interest and prolonged eloquence. Protracted debate was had on a bill to survey the territory west of the mountains between 42 degrees and 54 degrees, 40 minutes, garrison the land and extend over it the laws of the United States. The measure was defeated; again the question slumbered.

But the daring pioneers of the west were by no means idle. Unconsciously they were accomplishing far more toward a final settlement of the "Oregon question" than all the tape-bound documents reposing in the pigeon-holes of English parliamentary and American congressional archives. British ministers had impudently declared that Oregon had been settled by Englishmen; that Americans had no trading posts within its limits. And why not? Read the following from Mr. Wyeth's memorial to congress:

"Experience has satisfied me that the entire weight of this company (Hudson's Bay) will be made to bear on any trader who shall attempt to prosecute his business within its reach.

* * * No sooner does an American start in this region than one of these trading parties is put in motion. A few years will make the country west of the mountains as completely English as they can desire."

To the same congressional committee William A. Slocum, in a report, goes on record as follows: "No individual enterprise can compete with this immense foreign monopoly established in our waters. * * * The Indians are taught to believe that no vessels but the company's ships are allowed to trade in the river, and most of them are afraid to sell their skins but at Vancouver or Fort George."

Small wonder, then, that at this time there were less than two hundred Americans west of the Rockies. And Canadian law, by act of parliament, was extended throughout the region of the Columbia. Theoretically it was joint occupation; practically, British monopoly. So late as 1844 the British and Foreign Review said, brutally: "The interests of the company are of course adverse to colonization. * * * The fur trade has been hitherto the only channel for the advantageous investments of capital in those regions."

Truly, the Hudson's Bay Company had adopted a policy of "addition, division and silence." Because meat and beef conduced to pastoral settlements, so late as 1836 the company opposed the introduction of cattle. One of the missionaries stationed at Moose Factory has written this: "A plan which I had devised for educating and training to some acquaintance with agriculture native children, was disallowed.

* * * A proposal made for forming a small Indian village near Moose Factory was not acceded to; and instead permission only given to attempt the location of one or two old men, no longer fit for engaging in the chase, it being carefully and distinctly stated by Sir George Simpson that the company would not give them even a spade toward commencing this mode of life."

In 1836 when Dr. Marcus Whitman and his party were entering Oregon, J. K. Townsend, a naturalist sent from Philadelphia to collect specimens of fauna and flora, said to him at Walla Walla: "The company will be glad to have you in the country, and your influence to improve their servants and their native wives and children. As to the Indians you have come to teach they do not want them to be any more enlightened. The company now have absolute control over them, and that is all they require."

And right here is the crux of the differences between the United States and England concerning the territory of Oregon. It was the aim of the former to develop, improve and civilize the country; it was the expressed determination of the latter to keep it in darkness and savagery. For in North America the Hudson's Bay Company was England and English statesmen were under the complete domination of this company's abject commercialism. It has pleased modern English writers to describe America as a "nation of shopkeepers." But throughout the whole Oregon controversy the United States stood for progress and civilization; England for the long night of ignorance and barbarism—for profit. Summed up by Mr. Barrows the relations to Oregon of the two countries were as follows:

The Americans struck Oregon just where the English failed; in the line of settlements and civilization. One carried in the single man and the other the family; one his traps and snares, and the other his seed wheat and oats and potatoes; one shot an Indian for killing a wild animal out of season; and the other paid bounty on the wolf and bear; one took his newspaper from the dog-mail twenty-four or thirty-six months from date, and the other carried in the printing press; one hunted and traded for what he could carry out of the country, the other planted and builded for what he could leave in it for his children. In short, the English trader ran his birch canoe and batteaux up the streams and around the lakes to bring out furs and peltries, while the American immigrant hauled in with his rude wagon the nineteenth century and came back loaded with Oregon for the American union.

In 1840 the flow of American immigration into Oregon, especially the missionaries, Lee, Whitman and Parker, alarmed the Hudson's Bay Company. It strenuously opposed the advent of wagons and carriages. Immigrants were lied to at Fort Hall; were told that it would be impossible to proceed farther on wheels. It is recorded that on this account many of them reached Dr. Whitman's mission in a deplorably destitute condition. But all the artifices of the company could not check the hegira from the east. It is reserved for another chapter to relate the experiences of these pioneers. We have to do here mainly with the final settlement of the great "Oregon Question" between England and the United States—the political struggle for sovereignty.

The Edinburg Review for July, 1843, said: "One thing strikes us forcibly. However the political question between England and America, as to the ownership of Oregon may be decided, Oregon will never be colonized overland from the eastern states. * * * With those natural obstacles between, we cannot but imagine that the world must assume a new face before the American wagons make plain the road to the Columbia as they have to the Ohio."

In 1843 Sir George Simpson, governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, who had made a tour of the continent, challenged us in these words: "The United States will never possess more than a nominal jurisdiction, nor long possess even that, on the west side of the Rocky mountains. And supposing the country to be divided tomorrow to the entire satisfaction of the most unscrupulous patriot in the union, I challenge congress to bring my prediction and its power to the test by imposing the Atlantic tariff on the ports of the Pacific."

Thus the great international question of tariff was brought into the Oregon Controversy. But we must not jump to the conclusion that Sir George was without some foundation for his vaporous remarks. At that time the Hudson's Bay Company had twenty-three posts and five trading stations in the northwest; it had absorbed ten rival companies, not leaving one American or Russian, and had been the means of putting to rout seven immigrant expeditions seeking homes in Oregon.

The Oregon boundary question was still in dispute. But those Americans familiar with the subject were destined to temporary disappointment. In 1827 it had been referred, through a convention, to the King of the Netherlands as arbiter. Both parties to the dispute had rejected his decision in 1831. Five efforts had been made to adjust the boundary by President Jackson, and five failures had resulted. The administration of President Van Buren closed with the vexatious matter still unsettled. In 1842 Lord Ashburton came from London to negotiate a boundary treaty with Daniel Webster, secretary of state. A certain boundary treaty was negotiated, August 9, 1842, the two ministers signed it; it was ratified by the senate on the 25th; by the Queen soon after, proclaimed on November 10th, 1842—and the Oregon boundary was not in it. Nothing official whatever alluding to Oregon was found therein. The only boundary touched was one "beginning at the monument at the source of the river St. Croix," terminating at the Rocky mountains on the 47th parallel. Little wonder that sectional feeling developed in the far west.

Dr. Marcus Whitman, whose connection with the "Oregon Question" is treated in another chapter, had arrived in Washington, D. C., too late for any effectual pleas for consideration of the matter in the treaty just signed. Still, as Mr. Barrows says: "The pressure of Oregon into the Ashburton treaty would probably have done one of three things, prevented the treaty altogether, excluded the United States from Oregon, or produced a war. Delay and apparent defeat were the basis of our real success, and the great work of Marcus Whitman, by his timely presence in Washington, was in making the success sure."

With Oregon left out the Ashburton treaty had been ratified. The outlook was, indeed, gloomy. As a reflex of the insidious teachings of the Hudson's Bay Company the following extract from a speech delivered by Mr. McDuffie in the United States senate is interesting. He said:

What is the character of this country? Why, as I understand it, seven hundred miles this side of the Rocky Mountains is uninhabitable; where rain scarcely ever falls—a barren and sandy soil—mountains totally impassable except in certain parts, where there were gaps or depressions, to be reached only by going some hundreds of miles out of the direct course. Well, now, what are we going to do in a case like this? How are you going to apply steam? Have you made anything like an estimate of the cost of a railroad running from here to the mouth of the Columbia? Why, the wealth of the Indies would be insufficient. You would have to tunnel through mountains five or six hundred miles in extent. * * * Of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? I would not, for that purpose, give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory. I wish it were an impassable barrier to secure us against the intrusion of others. * * * If there was an embankment of even five feet to be removed, I would not consent to spend five dollars to remove that embankment to enable our population to go there. I thank God for his mercy in placing the Rocky Mountains there.

At the time this speech was being delivered Dr. Marcus Whitman was on his way from Oregon with "the facts in the case;" information destined to shed a flood of intelligence on a rather benighted congress. And, in reality, our country was rapidly nearing the end of this interminable controversy. An area of territory sixty-three times the size of Massachusetts and four times as large of Great Britain and Ireland was about to come under the protecting aegis of the United States government. The Hudson's Bay Company had declared, through its emissaries, that a wagon trip to Oregon was an impossibility. The same sentiment had been voiced in the United States senate. It remained for Dr. Whitman to prove the falsity of such an audacious statement. He led a party of two hundred wagons through to his mission, near the Columbia river, arriving in October, 1843. And this, too, against vigorous opposition from the Hudson's Bay Company, at Fort Hall. Then the people began to manifest a lively interest in the question. This interest had been stimulated in December, 1842, by a message from President Tyler, in which he said: "The tide of population which has reclaimed what was so lately an unbroken wilderness in more contiguous regions, is preparing to flow over those vast districts which stretch from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific Ocean. In addition to the acquirements of individual rights sound policy dictates that every effort should be resorted to by the two governments to settle their respective claims." January 8, 1843, congress received news that Dr. Whitman had made good his claim and reached his destination, with wagons, in Oregon. Party spirit, for there were two parties to the Oregon Controversy, aside from the British, ran high. Dr. Winthrop said: "For myself, certainly, I believe that we have as good a title to the whole twelve degrees of latitude," i. e., up to 54 degrees, 40 minutes. Senator Thomas Benton voiced the prevailing sentiment of the time in these words: "Let the immigrants go on and carry their rifles. We want thirty thousand rifles in the valley of the Oregon; they will make all quiet there, in the event of war with Great Britain for the dominion of that country. The war, if it comes, will not be topical; it will not be confined to Oregon, but will embrace the possessions of the two powers throughout the globe. Thirty thousand rifles on the Oregon will annihilate the Hudson's Bay Company and drive them off our continent and quiet the Indians."

Rufus Choate spoke for peace. He was followed by pacificatory utterances from others. Still there was sufficient vitality in the "Fifty-four forty or fight" to elect President Polk on such a campaign issue. The population of Oregon at the close of 1844 was estimated by Mr. Greenhow at more than three thousand. The Indian agent for the government, Mr. White placed it at about four thousand; Mr. Hines said: "In 1845 it increased to nearly three thousand souls with some two thousand to three thousand head of cattle." The west was warm with zeal and anticipation. In the house of representatives Mr. Owen, of Indiana, said: "Oregon is our land of promise. Oregon is our land of destination. 'The finger of nature'—such were once the words of the gentleman from Massachusetts (J. Q. Adams) in regard to this country, 'points that way;' two thousand Americans are already dwelling in her valleys; five thousand more * * * will have crossed the mountains before another year rolls round." It was the opinion of the senator from Illinois, Mr. Semple, that ten thousand would cross the Rocky mountains the following year.

At last a resolution was introduced in congress "affirming Oregon to be part and parcel of the territory of the United States from 42 degrees to 54 degrees, 40 minutes, and that notice should be given at once to terminate the joint occupancy of it." It was held on the floor of the house that "no doubts now remain in the minds of American statesmen that the government of the United States held a clear and unquestionable title to the whole of the Oregon territory."

In the region, at this time, the Hudson's Bay Company had about thirty "trading posts." Really they were forts and powerful auxiliaries to an internecine war. Seven thousand citizens of the United States were in the same country. The question of another war with England had become a live and important issue. To have stood solidly for 54 degrees, 40 minutes, would have meant war, and as one gentleman expressed it, "a war that might have given the whole of Oregon to England and Canada to the United States." During forty days the question of giving notice to England of discontinuance of joint occupancy was debated in the house. It was carried by a vote of one hundred and sixty-three to fifty-four. The struggle in the senate was longer. An idea of the engrossing nature of the Oregon topic may be gleaned from the fact that three score bills and resolutions were kept in abeyance on the calendar for future action. Daniel Webster prophesied that war would not result; that the incident would be closed by compromise and that the compromise would be on the boundary line of the forty-ninth parallel. The attitude of the two countries was this: We had offered forty-nine degrees from the mountains to the Pacific Ocean, not once, but several times; England had offered forty-nine degrees from the mountains to the Columbia, and by that stream to the sea. A comparatively narrow triangle of land only lay between the demands of England and concessions by the United States. Most excellent grounds for a compromise. April 23, 1846, the notice passed the house by a vote of 42 to 10, with important amendments strongly suggestive to both governments to adjust all differences amicably. No one longer feared war.

From the point on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude where the boundary laid down in existing treaties and conventions between the United States and Great Britain terminates, the line of boundary between the territories of the United States and those of her Britannic Majesty shall be continued westward along said forty-ninth parallel of north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of the said channel, and of Fuca's Strait, to the Pacific ocean: Provided, however, that the navigation of the whole of the said channel and straits south of the 49th parallel of north latitude, remains free and open to both parties.

Thus reads the first article of the final boundary treaty between England and the United States, so far as concerns Oregon. But to mold it into this form and sign the same, fifty-four years, two months and six days had been required by the two countries. July 17, 1846, the document, previously ratified, was exchanged in London between the two governments. But Captain Robert Gray, of Boston, had discovered the Columbia river May 11, 1792 and fully established a United States title to the country which it drains. It remained yet for a boundary commission, in 1857, to run the line. The first meeting of the commission was held July 27, of the same year.

CHAPTER V

THE TRAGEDY OF WHITMAN'S MISSION.

"Who will respond to go beyond the Rocky Mountains and carry the Book of Heaven?"

This was the startling question asked by President Fiske, of Wilbraham College. It was an editorial inquiry published in the Christian Advocate in March, 1833. Yet this ringing call for spiritual assistance was not initiative on the part of President Fiske. A Macedonian cry had been voiced by four Flathead Indians, of the tribe of Nez-Perces, or Pierced-noses. They had come down to St. Louis from the headwaters of the Columbia, the Snake, Lewis or Clark's rivers, far to the westward of the Rocky Mountains. Far up in the mountains of Montana, in one of the many valleys which sparkle like emeralds on the western slope of the "Stony" range, a handful of natives met to ponder over the unique tale repeated by some passing mountaineer of a magic "Book" possessed by the white man, which assured its owners of peace and comfort in this life and eternal bliss in the world to come beyond the grave. The Flatheads were a weak and unwarlike people; they were sorely beset by the fierce Blackfeet, their hereditary foes, through whose terrible incursions the Flatheads had been reduced in numbers and harrassed so continually that their state was most pitiable. To this remnant of a once proud race the trapper's story was a rainbow of promise; the chiefs resolved to see this "Book," and possess themselves of the white man's treasure. They chose an embassy of four of their wisest and bravest men, and sent them trustfully on the tribe's errand.

Alone and unassisted by government appropriation, they had followed a course down the Missouri and the Father of Waters three thousand miles to St. Louis. This was in 1832. The peculiar mission of these Indians was the opening act of the Whitman tragedy. Mr. Barrows says:

"The massacre ran riot through eight days, and Dr. Marcus Whitman and wife, of the American Board, and thirteen or more associates, were savagely killed on the 29th of November, 1847, and days following. It was the bloody baptism of Oregon, by the like of which the most of the American states have come into the union."

At the period of the arrival of these four

Nez-Perce chiefs Indians were not an uncommon sight in St. Louis. At certain seasons the suburbs of the city were fringed with teepees, or "wickiups." So, at first, but little attention was paid to them otherwise than to note their strange dress and unknown dialect. It is not difficult to gather how they had learned of the White Man's Book. Their own rude eloquence addressed to General William Clark at parting conveys this information. After a long time passed in the city, after two of them had gone to the happy hunting ground, the survivors made their desires known, and it appears their request was, perforce, denied. Translation of the Bible into an Indian dialect is not the work of a few days or months. The two remaining Indians decided to return home; their mission a failure. The pathos of their complaint is in the spirit, if not the words, of one of the chiefs in his farewell speech to General Clark:

I come to you over a trail of many moons from the setting sun. You were the friend of my fathers who have all gone the long way. I came with one eye partly opened for more light for my people who sit in darkness. I go back with both eyes closed. How can I go back blind to my blind people? I made my way to you with strong arms, through many enemies and strange lands, that I might carry back much to them. I go back with both arms broken and empty. The two fathers who came with us—the braves of many winters and wars—we leave here by your great waters and wigwam. They were tired in many moons and their moccasins wore out. My people sent me to get the White Man's Book of Heaven. You took me to where you allow your women to dance, as we do ours, and the Book was not there. You took me where they worshipped the great spirit with candles, and the Book was not there. You showed me the images of good spirits and pictures of the good land beyond, but the Book was not among them to tell us the way. I am going back the long, sad trail to my people of the dark land. You make my feet heavy with burdens of gifts, and my moccasins will grow old in carrying them, but the Book is not among them. When I tell my poor, blind people, after one more snow, in the big council, that I did not bring the Book, no word will be spoken by our old men or by our young braves. One by one they will rise up and go out in silence. My people will die in darkness, and they will go out on the long path to the other hunting ground. No white man will go with them and no White Man's Book to make the way plain. I have no more words.

Of this utter failure to secure a copy of the Bible Mr. Barrows says, pertinently:

In what was then a Roman Catholic city it was not easy to do this, and officers only were met. It has not been the policy or practice of that church to give the Bible to the people, whether Christian or pagan. They have not thought it wise or right. Probably no Christian enterprises in all the centuries have shown more self-sacrificing heroism, forseen suffering and intense religious devotion than the laborers of that church, from 1520, to give its type of Christianity to the natives of North America. But it was oral, ceremonial and pictorial. In the best of their judgment, and in the depths of their convictions, they did not think it best to reduce native tongues to written languages and the Scriptures to the vernacular of any tribe.

But the eloquence of this speech had fallen on appreciative ears. A young clerk in General Clark's office, who had heard the sad plaint of the chief, wrote to George Catlin, in Pittsburg, historian and painter, an account of the scene. Thereafter events moved rapidly; the seed was sown and the harvest was about to be fulfilled. One Indian only lived to return to his people, without the Book, yet it cannot be said that his mission was a failure. The editorial appeal of President Fiske produced results. Measures were at once taken by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and the Methodist Board of Missions to send missionaries to Oregon. Revs. Jason and David Lee were pioneers in this Scriptural crusade. They went under appointment of the Methodist Board. They were followed the next year by Revs. Samuel Parker and Marcus Whitman, M. D., sent by the American Board of Commissioners. In the summer of 1835 the latter arrived at the American rendezvous on Green river. Accompanied by a body of Nez Perces, from which people the four chiefs had gone to St. Louis, Rev. Mr. Parker went to Walla Walla and on to Vancouver. And with him he carried the "Book." Dr. Whitman returned to the states the same fall, married Narcissa Prentice, and organized an outfit with which he returned, with his bride, to Oregon, arriving at Walla Walla in September, 1836.

For the first time in any western history are presented in this volume authentic portraits of two of these Indians, Hee-Oh'ks-Te-Kin, the Rabbit's Skin Leggings, and H'co-a-H'Cotes-Min, No Horns on His Head. They are published by permission of the Smithsonian Institute, Washington. The following excerpt concerning them is from the Smithsonian Report, Part II, 1885. Mr. Catlin, the artist who painted these portraits, did not visit the Nez Perces until 1854-5, on his second journey through the west. Of them Mr. Catlin says:

These two men when I painted them were in beautiful Sioux dresses which had been presented to them in a talk with the Sioux, who treated them very kindly while they were passing through the Sioux country. These two men were a part of a delegation that came across the Rocky Mountains to St. Louis a few years since to inquire for the truth of a representation which they said some white men had made among them "that our religion was better than theirs, and that they would all be lost if they did not embrace it."

Two old and venerable men of this party died in St. Louis, and I traveled two thousand miles, companionship with these two young fellows toward their own country and became much pleased with their manners and dispositions. No Horns on His Head died near the mouth of the Yellowstone river on his way home. The other one, The Rabbit's Skin Leggings, I have since learned arrived safely among his friends. * * * When I first heard of the report of the object of this extraordinary mission across the mountains I could scarcely believe it; but in conversing with General Clark on a future occasion I was fully convinced of the fact.

To this the editor of the Smithsonian report adds: "No more romantic incident than this can be found in Northwestern history—the four Nez Percés traveling thousands of miles in search of the Book, looking for the white man's Deity. Still the Jesuits had been missionaries among these same Indians for scores of years prior to that time. Lewis and Clark found many of the Black Gowns with the Indians."

The question as to whether or no Dr. Whitman "saved Oregon to the United States" will remain forever a question of casuistry. Events might have shaped themselves as they subsequently did, had Whitman not made his long midwinter ride to Washington, D. C., to lay his facts and fears before the president. Everything might have resulted in the retention by the United States of all of Oregon south of the 49th parallel, had no warning cry come from the far northwest; a culverin shot announcing the attempt of England to seize the country, not only by force of majority colonization, but through artifices of the Hudson's Bay Company. At a dinner at Waiilatpu, attended by Dr. Whitman, news was received that a colony of English one hundred and forty strong was then near Fort Colville, three hundred and fifty miles up the Columbia. A young priest leaped to his feet, threw his cap into the air and cried, "Hurrah for Oregon! America is too late and we have got the country!"

This was but one of the many significant signs witnessed by Whitman. He was a man of foresight; he had seen and realized the wealth, position and future possibilities of Oregon as had no other American at that period. And he rode on to Washington and told his story. It will be read in the preceding chapter that not until he had done so did the American congress act. Of the personality of Dr. Whitman one who knew him contributes the following picture:

Marcus Whitman once seen, and in our family circle, telling of his one business—he had but one—was a man not to be forgotten by the writer. He was of medium height, more compact than spare, a stout shoulder and large head not much above it, covered with stiff, iron-gray hair, while his face carried all the moustache and whiskers that four months had been able to put on. He carried himself awkwardly, though perhaps courteously enough for trappers, Indians, mules and grizzlies, his principal company for six years. He seemed built as a man for whom more stock had been furnished than worked in symmetrically and gracefully. There was nothing peculiarly quick in his motion or speech, and no trace of a fanatic; but under control of a thorough knowledge of his business, and with deep, ardent convictions about it, he was a profound enthusiast. A willful resolution and a tenacious earnestness would impress you as making the man.

Sordid motives have been attributed to Dr. Whitman's efforts in behalf of Oregon. One writer has assumed that his sole object was to secure continuance of his little mission at Waiilatpu. But there is abundance of evidence that his ideas were of a broader scope than this. Let it be noted that efforts to depreciate Whitman suddenly ceased as late as 1891. That year was found in the archives at Washington, D. C., a letter from him proposing a bill for a line of forts from the Kansas river to the Willamette. In the Walla Walla Union-Journal of August 15, 1891, the letter was first published to the world. It has been reproduced in Dr. O. W. Nixon's work, "How Marcus Whitman Saved Oregon:"

To the Hon. James W. Porter, Secretary of War: Sir—In compliance with the request you did me the honor to make last winter while at Washington, I herewith transmit to you the synopsis of a bill, which, if it could be adopted, would, according to my experience and observation, prove highly conducive to the best interests of the United States, generally; to Oregon, where I have resided for more than seven years as a missionary, and to the Indian tribes that inhabit the intermediate country.

The government will doubtless for the first time be apprised through you, and by means of this communication, of the immense migration of families to Oregon, which has taken place this year. I have, since our interview, been instrumental in piloting across the route described in the accompanying bill, and which is the only eligible wagon road, no less than ——— families, consisting of one thousand persons of both sexes, with their wagons, amounting in all to one hundred and twenty-six; six hundred and ninety-four oxen and seven hundred and seventy-three loose cattle.

Your familiarity with the government's policy, duties and interests, render it unnecessary for me to more than hint at the several objects intended by the enclosed bill, and any enlargements upon the topics here suggested as inducements to its adoption would be quite superfluous, if not impertinent. The very existence of such a system as the one above recommended suggests the utility of postoffices and mail arrangements, which it is the wish of all who now live in Oregon to have granted them, and I need only add that the contracts for this purpose will be readily taken at reasonable rates for transporting the mail across from Missouri to the mouth of the Columbia in forty days, with fresh horses at each of the contemplated posts. The ruling policy proposed regards the Indians as the police of the country, who are to be relied upon to keep the peace, not only for themselves, but to repel lawless white men and prevent banditti, under the solitary guidance of the superintendents of the several posts, aided by a well-directed system to induce the punishment of crimes. It will only be after the failure of these means to procure the delivery of or punishment of violent, lawless and savage acts of aggression, that a band or tribe should be regarded as conspirators against the peace, or punished accordingly by force of arms.

Hoping that these suggestions may meet your approbation and conduce to the future interests of our growing country, I have the honor to be, honorable sir, your obedient servant,

MARCUS WHITMAN.

Certainly it is reasoning from slender, unsubstantial premises to assert that the great influence exerted on President Tyler and Secretary Webster by Whitman was founded on so slight a pretext as saving to him, personally, the humble mission at Waiilatpu. Whitman must have been a man with "an idea" larger than that to have commanded respect from the ablest statesmen of the day; to have crystalized public sentiment into a desire for the whole of Oregon; to have smelted patriotism into the heraldic proclamation of defiance to all England, "Fifty-four forty or fight."

Had Whitman been purely selfish, why should he have announced his intention, in 1843, of personally conducting a large train across the mountains? Security of his mission did not depend on this. On the contrary the advance of civilization, with attendant churches, would tend to do away entirely with missions for the Indians.

As we approach the melancholy close of Dr. Whitman's varied career as explorer, missionary and patriotic statesman, one can not fail to be impressed with a feeling that less devotion to a patriotic sense of duty would have conduced to his personal safety. Two antagonists were arrayed against him and his political as well as his spiritual plans; primarily the Hudson's Bay Company, and the Indians, indirectly influenced by the same commercial corporation. The policy of the company was to keep the country in the condition of a vast game preserve for the purpose of breeding fur-bearing animals. Naturally this pleased the Indians. It was directly in line with their hereditary mode of life. The policy of American colonization was symbolized by the axe and the plow; complete demolition of profitable hunting grounds. And of this latter policy Dr. Whitman was high priest and propogandist.

Since the discovery of America Indian wars have been like—

"Freedom's battle, once begun, Bequeathed by bleeding sire to son."

In a letter written by Washington to Jay, in 1794, the first president says: "There does not remain a doubt in the mind of any well-informed person in this country, not shut against conviction, that all the difficulties we encounter with the Indians, their hostilities, the murders of helpless women and innocent children along our frontiers, result from the conduct of the agents of Great Britain in this country." Historical justice demands, however, that we assign the primary cause of the Whitman massacre to the entangling circumstances of the Indians on the Columbia, under two rival peoples and conflicting policies. Also the general character of the Indians as uncivilized and superstitious, must be duly considered. Before the tragedy, as since, many Americans were cruel, deceitful and aggressive in their treatment of the unsophisticated savage. Those who have philosophically watched the trend of current events in the past twenty-five years need not be told that more than one Indian outbreak can be directly traced to low cupidity and speculation among our government officials. To a certain extent this cruelty and deception had been practiced upon the Indians by lawless white men prior to the Whitman massacre. Today we cannot come into court with clean hands for the purpose of accusing the English pioneers of Oregon. If their policy was one designed to check the march of western civilization it was certainly devoid of the sometimes Satanic cruelty shown by Americans toward the Indians.

We now come to the savage details of the Whitman tragedy and the immediate cause of the outbreak. Undoubtedly this will be found to lie in the innate superstition of the savage, educated or uneducated. Following the return of Whitman from Washington, in 1843, the Indians in the vicinity of the mission of Waiilatpu were restless and insubordinate. There is evidence that at this period Whitman scented danger. He contemplated removal to The Dalles for safety, and had even gone so far as to arrange for the purchase of the Methodist Mission at that point. Two personal enemies were arrayed against him; Tamsuky, a Cayuse chief, and Joe Lewis. The latter was a sullen, revengeful half-breed, one who had wandered to the mission, been befriended by the doctor, and secretly became the headcenter of a murderous plot.

Measles became epidemic among the Indians during the summer of 1847, introduced among the Cayuse tribe by immigrants. It was Indian medical practice to treat all fevers by placing the patient in a sweat house, followed by a bath in ice-cold water. Under such ignorant ministrations many of the patients, of course, expired. They died, too, under the medical attendance of Dr. Whitman, whose utmost vigilance could not save his patients from the sweat-house and the fatal douche. It was at this critical period that the treacherous Lewis circulated reports that the doctor was poisoning instead of healing his patients. Lewis affirmed that he had overheard Whitman and Rev. Henry Harmen Spalding plotting to obtain possession of the country. It was finally decided by some of the influential chiefs of the tribe to demand of Dr. Whitman a test case of his professional skill. An Indian woman afflicted with the measles was given in his charge. The terrible alternative, secretly decided upon, was this: Should the woman recover, all would be peace; should she die the Indians were to kill all the missionaries.

Of this direful plot Whitman was apprised by Istikus, a Umatilla friend. The doctor treated the story with levity. Not so Mrs. Whitman. With the sensitive intuition of woman, she fully comprehended the dread significance of Istikus' story, and though intrepid by nature, the heroine of a dangerous pioneer journey across the continent, she became alarmed, and was in tears for the first time since the death of her child, eight years before. Dr. Whitman reassured her the best he could, and renewed his promise to move down the river. It was too late. On the fatal 29th of November, 1847, great numbers of Tamsuky's adherents were in the vicinity of Waiilatpu. Their sinister presence added to the alarm of Mrs. Whitman. Survivors of the massacre said that the hills were black with Indians looking down upon the scene. About one o'clock in the afternoon of the 29th, while Dr. Whitman was reading, a number of Indians entered his room and, having attracted his attention, one of them, said to have been Tamchas, buried his hatchet in the head of his benefactor. Another savage, Telaukait, one who had received nothing but kindness, beat his face to a pulp. Bloody work thus began was speedily followed with relentless brutality. None of the white men, scattered and unsuspecting, could offer adequate assistance. They were quickly shot down with the exception of such as were remote. Five men escaped. After incredible suffering they finally reached a place of safety. Mrs. Whitman was the only woman who suffered death. Other women were outraged, and children, boys and girls held in captivity several days. William McBean, the Hudson's Bay Company's agent at Fort Walla Walla, refused to harbor Mr. Hall, who had escaped as far as the fort, and he subsequently perished. A courier was dispatched by McBean to Vancouver, but this man did not even warn the people at The Dalles of danger. Happily they were unmolested. So soon as James Douglas, then chief factor in the place of Dr. McLaughlin, heard of the massacre, he sent Peter Skeen Ogden, with a force, to reach the survivors. Ogden exhibited a commendable zeal and efficiency and by the expenditure of several hundred dollars, ransomed forty-seven women and children.

Following are the names of the victims of this outbreak; the people slaughtered during the eight days of murderous riot: Marcus Whitman, Narcissa Whitman, John Sager, Francis Sager, Crockett Bewley, Isaac Gillen, James Young and Rogers, Kimball, Sales, Marsh, Saunders, Hoffman and Hall. Afterward there was found on the site of the massacre a lock of long, fair hair, which was, undoubtedly, taken from the head of Mrs. Whitman. Among the relics of this tragedy, in Whitman College, it is now preserved. An account of the escape of Mr. Osborne was published a number of years ago. It is a graphic description of the horrors of the event and from it we take the following extracts:

As the guns fired and the yells commenced, I leaned my head upon the bed and committed myself and family to my Maker. My wife removed the loose floor. I dropped under the floor, with my sick family in their night clothes, taking only two woolen sheets, a piece of bread and some cold mush, and pulled the floor over us. In five minutes the room was full of Indians, but they did not discover us. The roar of guns, the yells of the savages and the crash of clubs and knives, and the groans of the dying continued until dark. We distinctly heard the dying groans of Mrs. Whitman, Mr. Rogers and Francis, till they died away, one after the other. We heard the last words of Mr. Rogers in a slow voice, calling, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Soon after this I removed the floor and we went out. We saw the white face of Francis by the door. It was warm as we laid our hand upon it, but he was dead. I carried my two youngest children, who were sick, and my wife held on to my clothes in her great weakness. We had all been sick with measles. Two infants had died. She had not left her bed for six weeks till that day, when she stood up a few minutes. The naked, painted Indians were dancing a scalp dance around a large fire at a little distance. There seemed no hope for us and we knew not which way to go, but bent our steps toward Fort Walla Walla. A dense, cold fog shut out every star and the darkness was complete. We could see no trail and not even the hand before the face. We had to feel out the trail with our feet. My wife almost fainted, but staggered along. Mill Creek, which we had to wade, was high with late rains and came up to the waist. My wife in her great weakness came nigh washing down, but held on to my clothes. I braced myself with a stick, holding a child in one arm. I had to cross five times for the children. The water was icy cold and the air freezing some. Staggering along about two miles Mrs. Osborne fainted and could go no further, and we hid ourselves in the brush of the Walla Walla river, not far below the lodges of Tamsuky, a chief who was very active at the commencement of the butchery. We were thoroughly wet, and the cold, fog-like snow was about us. The cold mud was partially frozen as we crawled, feeling our way into the dark brush. We could see nothing, the darkness was so extreme. I spread out one wet sheet on the frozen ground; wife and children crouched upon it. I covered the other over them. I thought they must soon perish, as they were shaking and their teeth rattling with cold. I kneeled down and commended us to our Maker. The day finally dawned and I could see Indians riding furiously up and down the trail. Sometimes they would come close to the brush, and our blood would warm and the shaking would stop from fear for a moment. The day seemed a week. I expected every moment my wife would breathe her last. Tuesday night we felt our way to the trail and staggered along to Sutucks Nima (Dog Creek), which we waded as we did the other creek and kept on about two miles when my wife fainted and could go no farther. Crawled into the brush and frozen mud to shake and suffer on from hunger and cold and without sleep. The children, too, wet and cold, called incessantly for food, but the shock of groans and yells at first so frightened them that they did not speak loud. Wednesday night wife was too weak to stand. I took our second child and started for Walla Walla; had to wade the Touchet; stopped frequently in the brush from weakness; had not recovered from measles. Heard a horseman pass and repass as I lay concealed in the willows. Have since learned it was Mr. Spalding. Reached Fort Walla Walla after daylight; begged Mr. McBean for horses to go to my family, for food, blankets and clothing to take to them, and to take care of my child till I could bring my family in should I live to find them alive. Mr. McBean told me I could not bring my family to his fort. Mr. Hall came in on Monday night, but he could not have an American in his fort, and he had him put over the Columbia river; that he could not let me have horses or anything for my wife or children, and I must go on to Umatilla. I insisted on bringing my family to the fort, but he refused; said he would not let us in. I next begged the priest to show pity, as my wife and children must perish and the Indians, undoubtedly, kill me, but with no success.

There were many priests at the fort. Mr. McBean gave me breakfast, but I saved most of it for my family. Providentially, Mr. Stanley, an artist, came in from Colville, and narrowly escaped the Indians by telling them he was "Alain," H. B., meaning that his name was Alain and that he was a Hudson's Bay Company employe. He let me have his two horses, some food he had left from Revs. Ellis and Walker's missions; also a cap, a pair of socks, a shirt and handkerchief, and Mr. McBean furnished an Indian who proved most faithful, and Thursday night we started back, taking my child, but with a sad heart that I could not find mercy at the hands of God. The Indian guided me in the thick darkness to where I supposed I had left my dear wife and children. We could see nothing and dared not call aloud. Daylight came and I was exposed to Indians, but we continued to search till I was about to give up in despair, when the Indian discovered one of the twigs I had broken as a guide in coming out to the trail. Following this he soon found my wife and children still alive. I distributed what little food and clothing I had and we started for the Umatilla, the guide leading the way to a ford.

Mr. Osborne and family went to Willamette Valley where they lived many years, as honored members of the community, though Mrs. Osborne never entirely regained her health from the dreadful experiences incident to the massacre and escape.

The most ingenious casuistry will fail to palliate the utter heartlessness of Mr. McBean. The Indian guide exhibited more humanity to Mr. Osborne. At the present day when charity, chivalry, nay, self-sacrifice to aid the suffering meet with heartiest approval from nearly all civilized nations, it is difficult to conceive of such base motives as appear to have actuated him. That he reflected the baser qualities of the Hudson's Bay Company's policy, no one can reasonably deny. It seemed necessary to him to show the Indians that so far from reproving their conduct the representative of the company was in somepathy, if not in actual collusion, with the savage conspirators. McBean's attitude on this occasion stands forth as one of the darkest chapters in the history of the Hudson's Bay Company's "joint occupancy" with Americans, of the territory of Oregon.

If further proof were wanted of the apparent understanding between the Indians and the company the case of the artist who gave his name as Alain, representing himself as connected with the interests of the Hudson's Bay Company is before us—most damning testimony of the company's secret alliance with the hostile red-skins. Refusal of assistance to Mr. Osborne by the priests at Fort Walla Walla is readily understood. Their tenure of spiritual office was dependent on the company. Their heartless action was not based on theological antagonism. No difference of creed entered into the matter. They were guided simply by personal interest; they were but another form of the abject creatures to which the Hudson's Bay Company sought to reduce all of their dependents. But in the annals of American history there is no more pathetic recital than the story of Osborne's and Hall's rejection at the English fort to which they had fled for shelter.

On the day following the massacre McBean sent a messenger to Fort Vancouver, as has been stated, to apprise the chief factor, James Douglas, of what had transpired. This messenger stopped at The Dalles and procured a boat from Mr. Alanson Hinman, missionary at that place, with which to continue his journey. But, carrying out the policy of the Hudson's Bay Company, of which McBean had set him an example, this treacherous messenger neglected to inform Mr. Hinman of the massacre and the danger in which they were. December 4th he reached Vancouver and Chief Factor Douglas sent, on the morning of the second day thereafter, a letter to Governor Abernethy at Oregon City, informing him of what had taken place at the Whitman mission. December 7th Peter Skeen Ogden, of the Hudson's Bay Company, started from Vancouver with a force of men to the scene of the tragedy, and on leaving The Dalles advised the Americans—Americans, let the reader note—at that place to abandon the mission and seek safety in the Willamette Valley. This they did.

The following day Governor Abernethy informed the legislature of the catastrophe and called for volunteers to rescue the prisoners and punish the Indians. A company of soldiers was immediately organized and sent to The Dalles at as outpost in case the Indians had hostile intentions against the Willamette settlements.

The legislature pledged the credit of the provisional government to pay the expenses for the outfit of the company, and appointed a committee to visit Vancouver and negotiate for the same from the Hudson's Bay Company; but they were compelled to become personally responsible for the amount involved. It was evident that the company did not believe, at that time, that the provisional government would stand long. December 10th the company reached Vancouver, received their supplies and pushed on to The Dalles, where they arrived December 21st.

In the meantime the legislature entered with great energy on a series of resolutions and enactments, with a view to organizing a sufficient military force to punish the Indians; and the citizens, by private subscription and enlistments warmly seconded the efforts of the provisional government. Many of the more ardent were for pushing forward into the Indian country at once with a formidable force; but more prudent counsels prevailed, and nothing was done likely to prevent the Indians from surrendering their captives to Mr. Ogden, of the Hudson's Bay Company, who had gone among them for that purpose.

Ogden reached Fort Walla Walla December 19th, called a council of the chiefs at the Catholic mission on the Umatilla river, just above Pendleton, in which the Indians signed the following declaration of their wishes:

First—That the Americans may not go to war with the Cayuses.

Second—That they may forget the lately committed murders, as the Cayuses will forget the murder of the son of the great chief of Walla Walla, committed in California.

Third—That two or three great men may come up to conclude peace.

Fourth—That as soon as these great men have arrived and concluded peace, they may take with them all the women and children.

Fifth—They give assurance that they will not harm the Americans before the arrival of these two or three great men.

Sixth—They ask that Americans may not travel any more through their country, as their young men might do them harm.

This document was signed, "Place of Tawatowe, Youmatilla, twentieth of December, 1847.

(Signed.) Tilokaikt, Camaspelo, Tawatowe, Achekaia.

On the 23d of December the chiefs assembled at the Fort to hear what the Hudson's Bay factor had to say to them, and the following speeches by Factor Ogden and three of the Indian chiefs, made on the occasion, explain the situation. Mr. Ogden said:

I regret to observe that all the chiefs whom I asked for are not present—two being absent. I expect the words I am about to address you to be repeated to them and to your young men on your return to your camps. It is now thirty years since we have been among you. During this long period we have never had any instance of blood being spilt, until the inhuman massacre, which has so recently taken place. We are traders, and a different nation from the Americans. But recollect, we supply you with ammunition not to kill the Americans. They are of the same color as ourselves, speak the same language, are children of the same God, and humanity makes our hearts bleed when we behold you using them so cruelly. Besides this revolting butchery, have not the Indians pillaged, ill-treated the Americans, insulted their women, when peacefully making their way to the Willamette? As chiefs, ought you to have connived at such conduct on the part of your young men? You tell me your young men committed the deeds without your knowledge. Why do we make you chiefs, if you have no control over your young men? You are a set of hermaphrodites and unworthy of the appellation of men as chiefs. You young, hot-headed men, I know that you pride yourselves upon your bravery, and think no one can match you. Do not deceive yourselves. If you get the American to commence once, you will repent it, and war will not end until every one of you are cut off from the face of the earth. I am aware that a good many of your friends and relatives have died through sickness. The Indians of other places have shared the same fate. It is not Dr. Whitman that poisoned them, but God has commanded that they should die. We are weak mortals and must submit, and I trust you will avail yourselves of the opportunity. By so doing it may be advantageous to you, but at the same time remember that you alone will be responsible for the consequences. It is merely advice that I give you. We have nothing to do with it. I have not come here to make promises or hold out assistance. We have nothing to do with your quarrels; we remain neutral. On my return, if you wish it, I shall do all I can for you, but I do not promise you to prevent war.

If you deliver me up all the prisoners I shall pay you for them on their being delivered, but let it not be said among you afterward that I deceived you. I and Mr. Douglas represent the company, but I tell you once more we promise you nothing. We sympathize with these poor people and wish to return them to their friends and relations by paying you for them. My request in behalf of the families concerns you; so decide for the best.

To this the young chief, Tawatowe, replied:

I arise to thank you for your words. You white chiefs command obedience with those that have to do with you. It is not so with us. Our young men are strong-headed and foolish. Formerly we had experienced, good chiefs. These are laid in the dust. The descendants of my father were the only good chiefs. Though we made war with the other tribes, yet we always looked, and ever will look, upon the whites as our brothers. Our blood is mixed with yours. My heart bleeds for so many good chiefs I had known. For the demand made by you the old chief, Tilokaikt, is here. Speak to him. As regards myself, I am willing to give up the families.

Then upspoke Tilokaikt.

I have listened to your words. Young men do not forget them. As for war, we have seen little of it. We know the whites to be our best friends, who have all along prevented us from killing each other. That is the reason why we avoid getting into war with them, and why we do not wish to be separated from them. Besides the tie of blood, the whites have shown us convincing proofs of their attachment to us by burying their dead alongside with ours. Chief, your words are weighty. Your hairs are gray. We have known you a long time. You have had an unpleasant trip to this place. I can not, therefore, keep these families back. I make them over to you, which I would not do to another younger than yourself.

Yellow Serpent (Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox) spoke as follows:

I have nothing to say. I know the Americans to be changeable. Still, I am of the opinion of the young chief. The whites are our friends and we follow your advice. I consent to your taking the families.

Mr. Ogden then addressed two Nez Perce chiefs at length in behalf of the Rev. H. H. Spalding and party, promising he would pay for their safe delivery to him. The result was that both chiefs, James and Itimimipelp, promised to bring them, provided they were willing to come, and immediately started to Clearwater with that purpose, bearing a letter from Chief Factor Ogden to Mr. Spaulding. The result of this conference was the delivery, on the 29th of December, to Mr. Ogden (for which he paid to the Cayuse Indians five blankets, fifty shirts, ten fathoms of tobacco, ten handkerchiefs, ten guns and one hundred rounds of ammunition), the following captives:

Missionary children adopted by Dr. Whitman—Miss Mary A. Bridger; Catherine Sager, aged thirteen years; Elizabeth Sager, ten; Martha J. Sager, eight; Henrietta N. Sager, four; Helen M. Meek.

From Du Page county, Illinois—Mr. Joseph Smith, Mrs. Hannah Smith; Mary Smith, aged fifteen years; Edwin Smith, thirteen; Charles Smith, eleven; Nelson Smith, six; Mortimer Smith, four.

From Fulton county, Illinois—Mrs. Eliza Hall; Jane Hall, aged ten years; Mary C. Hall, eight; Ann E. Hall, six; Rebecca Hall, three; Rachel M. Hall, one.

From Osage county, Mississippi—Mr. Elam Young; Mrs. Irene Young; Daniel Young, aged twenty-one years; John Young, nineteen.

From La Porte county, Indiana—Mrs. Harriet Kimball; Susan M. Kimball, aged sixteen years; Nathan M. Kimball, thirteen; Byron M. Kimball, eight; Sarah S. Kimball, six; Mince A. Kimball, one.

From Iowa—Mrs. Mary Sanders; Helen M. Sanders, aged fourteen years; Phebe L. Sanders, ten; Alfred W. Sanders, six; Nancy L. Sanders, four; Mary A. Sanders, two; Mrs. Sally A. Canfield; Ellen Canfield, sixteen; Oscar Canfield, nine; Clarissa Canfield, seven; Sylvia A. Canfield, five; Albert Canfield, three.

From Illinois—Mrs. Rebecca Hays; Henry C. Hays, aged four years; Eliza Spalding, Nancy E. Marsh; Lorrinda Bewley.

On New Year's Day, 1848, Rev. H. H. Spalding, with ten others, being all the Americans from his mission, arrived at Fort Walla Walla under escort of fifty Nez Perce Indians, to whom Mr. Ogden paid for their safe delivery twelve blankets, twelve shirts, twelve handkerchiefs, five fathoms of tobacco, two guns, two hundred rounds of ammunition and some knives. Three days later Mr. Ogden started for Vancouver with the captives in boats. Shortly after he had left the fort at Walla Walla fifty Cayuse warriors dashed up to the place to demand the surrender of Mr. Spalding, to be killed, as word had reached them of the arrival of American soldiers at The Dalles, to make war upon them, and they held him responsible for that fact.

We have described the Whitman Mission, Whitman's mid-winter journey, his work for Oregon and the massacre. It remains to speak of the Cayuse war which followed as a natural sequence. But before entering into the details of this act of retributive justice on the part of the Americans, it might be well to glance at the leading members of the sparse Oregon population at that period. In his "History of Oregon" W. H. Gray says:

At this point, perhaps, a statement of all the names of persons I have been able to collect and recollect, and the year they arrived in the country, will not be uninteresting to the reader.

In the year 1834 Rev. Jason Lee, Rev. Daniel Lee, Cyrus Shepard and P. L. Edwards, connected with the Methodist mission; Captain N. Wyth, American fur trader, and of his party in 1832, S. H. Smith, Burdet Greeley, Sergeant, Bull, St. Clair and Whittier (who was helped to or given a passage to the Sandwich Islands by the Hudson's Bay Company), Brock, a gunsmith; Tibbets, a stonecutter; Moore, killed by the Blackfeet Indians; Turnbull, who killed himself by over-eating at Vancouver. There was also in the country a man by the name of Felix Hathaway, saved from the wreck of the William and Ann. Of this number Smith, Sergeant, Tibbets and Hathaway remained. Of the party in 1834, James A. O'Neil, T. J. Hubbard and Courtney M. Walker remained in the country, making six of Wyth's men and one sailor. C. M. Walker came with Lee's company. With Ewing Young, from California, came, in this year, John McCarty, Carmichael, John Hauxhurst, Joseph Gale, John Howard, Kilborn, Brandywins and George Winslow, a colored man. By the brig Maryland, Captain J. H. Couch, G. W. Le Breton, John McCadan and William Johnson. An English sailor by the name of Richard McCary found his way into the settlement from the Rocky mountains.

In the year 1835 it does not appear that any settlers arrived in the country. Rev. Samuel Parker visited it and explored it under the direction of the American Board of Foreign Missions.

In the year 1836 Rev. H. H. Spalding, Dr. Marcus Whitman, W. H. Gray, Mrs. Eliza Spalding and Mrs. Narcissa Whitman, missionaries of the American Board, and Rev. Mr. Beaver, Episcopal chaplain at Vancouver, and Mrs. Beaver. There appear to have been no settlers this year; at least, none known to us. In 1837 Mrs. A. M. Lee, Mrs. S. Shepard, Dr. E. White, Mrs. M. White, A. Beers, Mrs. R. Beers, Miss E. Johnson, W. H. Wilson, Mr. J. Whitcomb, members of the Methodist Episcopal Mission. Second reinforcement this year: Rev. H. K. W. Perkins, Rev. David Leslie, Mrs. Leslie, Misses Satira, Mary and Sarah Leslie, Miss Margaret Smith, Dr. J. Bailey, an Englishman, George Gay and John Turner.

In 1838 Rev. Elkanah Walker, Mrs. Mary Walker, Rev. Cushing Eells, Mrs. Elvira Eells, Rev. A. B. Smith, Mrs. E. Smith and Mrs. Mary A. Gray, missionaries of the American Board. As laborers under special contract not to trade in furs or interfere with the Hudson's Bay Company's trade, James Connor, native wife and one child, and Richard Williams, both from the Rocky mountains. Jesuit priests: Rev. F. N. Blanchet, Rev. Demerse, located at Vancouver and French Prairie.

In 1839 Rev. J. S. Griffin, Mrs. Griffin, Asael Munger, Mrs. Mary Munger, Independent Protestant Mission; Robert Shortess, J. Farnam, Sidney Smith, Mr.

Lawson, Rev. Benjamin Wright (Independent Methodist), William Geiger, Mr. Keiser, John Edmund Pickernel, a sailor.

In 1840 Mrs. Lee, second wife of Rev. Jason Lee; Rev. J. H. Frost and wife; Rev. A. F. Waller, wife and two children; Rev. W. W. Kone and wife; Rev. G. Hines, wife and sister; Rev. L. H. Judson, wife and two children; Rev. J. L. Parish, wife and three children; Rev. G. P. Richards, wife and three children; Rev. A. P. Olley and wife. Laymen: Mr. George Abernethy, wife and two children; Mr. H. Campbell, wife and one child; Mr. W. W. Raymond and wife; Mr. H. B. Brewer and wife; Dr. J. L. Babcock, wife and child; Rev. Mrs. Daniel Lee; Mrs. David Carter; Mrs. Joseph Holman; Miss E. Phillips, Methodist Episcopal Protestant Mission; Rev. Henry Clark and wife; P. B. Littlejohn and wife, Independent Protestant Mission; Robert Moore, James Cook and James Fletcher, settlers; Jesuit priest: P. G. De Smet; Flathead Mission.

Ebbets, William M. Dougherty, John Larison, George Wilkinson, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Algear and William Johnson, the latter the author of the novel. "Leni Leoti, or The Prairie Flower." The subject of this work was first written and read before the Lyceum, at Oregon City, in 1843.

In the above list I have given the names of all the American settlers as near as I can remember them, the list of names I once collected having been lost. I never was fully informed of the different occupations of all these men. It will be seen that we had in the country in the fall of 1840 thirty-six American settlers, twenty-five of them with native wives; thirty-three American women; thirty-two children; thirteen lay members of the Protestant missions; nineteen ministers (thirteen Methodist; six Congregational), four physicians (three American and one English), three Jesuit priests and sixty Canadian-French—making, outside of the Hudson's Bay Company, one hundred and thirty-seven Americans and sixty-three Canadians, counting the three priests as Canadians.

CHAPTER VI

THE CAYUSE WAR.

Friends of Mr. McBean have come forward with an explanation of his treatment of the refugees from the Waiilatpu massacre. It was claimed that his reluctance to do any act which might have appeared like befriending Americans was through fear of the Cayuse Indians and a belief that they were about to begin a war of extermination upon Americans, their friends and allies. Therefore it would be dangerous to assist such Americans as were then seeking refuge from massacre, outrage and torture.

Such reasoning is pitiful and contemptible enough to excite the scorn of the whole world. But it was reserved for the Americans, however, to take the initiative in this war. News of the Whitman massacre stirred the hearts of genuine men; men in whose veins ran the milk of human kindness instead of ice-water. On the day following the massacre Vicar General Brouillet visited Waiilatpu mission. He found the bodies of the victims unburied; he left them with such hasty interment as was possible, and soon after he met Mr. Spalding whom he warned against attempting to visit the mission. This was, indeed, a friendly act on the part of the Vicar General, for the horrors of this tragedy did not come to a close on the first day. While it was safe for Brouillet, in close touch with the Hudson's Bay Company, to repair to that sad scene of desolation, it was not considered safe for any Americans to visit the spot. On Tuesday Mr. Kimball, who had remained with a broken arm in Dr. Whitman's house, was shot and killed. Driven desperate by his own and the suffering of three sick children with him, he had attempted to procure water from a stream near the house. The same week Mr. Young and Mr. Bulee were killed. Saturday the savages completed their fiendish work by carrying away the young women for wives.

December 7, 1847, from Fort Vancouver, James Douglas sent the following letter to Governor Abernethy:

Sir—Having received intelligence last night by special express from Walla Walla, of the destruction of the missionary settlement at Waiilatpu, by the Cayuse Indians, of that place, we hasten to communicate the particulars of that dreadful event, one of the most atrocious which darkens the annals of Indian crime.

Our lamented friend, Dr. Whitman, his amiable and accomplished lady, with nine other persons, have fallen victims to the fury of these remorseless savages, who appear to have been instigated to this appalling crime by a horrible suspicion which had taken possession of their superstitious minds, in consequence of the number of deaths from dysentery and measles, that Dr. Whitman was silently working the destruction of their tribes by administering poisonous drugs under the semblance of salutary medicines.

With a goodness of heart and a benevolence truly his own, Dr. Whitman had been laboring incessantly since the appearance of the measles and dysentery among his Indian converts to relieve their sufferings; and such has been the reward of his generous labors.

A copy of Mr. McBean's letter herewith transmitted will give you all the particulars known to us of this indescribably painful event. Mr. Ogden with a strong party will leave this place as soon as possible for Walla Walla to endeavor to prevent further evil; and we beg to suggest to you the propriety of taking immediate measures for the protection of the Rev. Mr. Spalding who, for the sake of his family, ought to abandon the Clearwater mission without delay, and retire to a place of safety, as he cannot remain at the isolated station without imminent risk in the present excited and irritable state of the Indian population.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES DOUGLAS.

The reception of this letter was followed by intense excitement among people in the Willamette settlement. The governor was authorized to mobilize a company of riflemen not exceeding fifty in number, the objective point being The Dalles, which they were instructed to garrison and hold until such time as they could be reinforced. Three commissioners were chosen to carry out such provisions. The commissioners addressed a circular letter to the superintendent of the Methodist Mission, the "merchants and citizens" of Oregon and the Hudson's Bay Company. This document is valuable as explaining conditions in Oregon at that date, December 17, 1847:

Gentlemen—You are aware that the undersigned have been charged by the legislature of our provisional government with the difficult duty of obtaining the necessary means to obtain full satisfaction of the Cayuse Indians for the late massacre at Waiilatpu, and to protect the white population of our common country from further aggression. In furtherance of this object they have deemed it their duty to make immediate application to the merchants and citizens of the country for the requisite assistance.

Though clothed with the power to pledge to the fullest extent the faith and means of the present government of Oregon, they do not consider this pledge the only security to those who, in this distressing emergency, may extend to the people of this country the means of protection and redress.

Without claiming any special authority from the government of the United States to contract a debt to be liquidated by that power, yet from all precedents of like character in the history of our country, the undersigned feel confident that the United States government will regard the murder of the late Dr. Whitman and his lady as a national wrong, and will fully justify the people of Oregon in taking such active measures to obtain redress for that outrage, and for their protection from further aggression.

The right of self defense is tacitly acknowledged to every body politic in the confederacy to which we claim to belong, and in every case similar to our own, within our knowledge, the general government has assumed the payment of all liabilities growing out of the measures taken by the constituted authorities to protect the lives and property of those who reside within the limits of their districts. If the citizens of the States and Territories east of the Rocky mountains are justified in promptly acting in such emergencies, who are under the immediate protection of the general government, there appears no room for doubt that the lawful acts of the Oregon government will receive a like approval.

Though the Indians of the Columbia have committed a great outrage upon our fellow citizens passing through the country, and residing among them, and their punishment for these murders may, and ought to be, a prime duty with every citizen of Oregon, yet as that duty more particularly devolves upon the government of the United States, we do not make this the strongest ground upon which to found our earnest appeal to you for pecuniary assistance. It is a fact well known to every person acquainted with the Indian character, that by passing silently over their repeated thefts, robberies and murders of our fellow citizens, they have been emboldened to the commission of the appalling massacre at Waiilatpu. They call us women, destitute of the hearts and courage of men, and if we allow this wholesale murder to pass by as former aggressions, who can tell how long either life or property will be secure in any part of the country, or what moment the Willamette will be the scene of blood and carnage.

The officers of our provisional government have nobly performed their duty. None can doubt the readiness of the patriotic sons of the west to offer their personal services in defense of a cause so righteous. So it now rests with you, gentlemen, to say whether our rights and our firesides shall be defended or not.

Hoping that none will be found to falter in so high and so sacred a duty, we beg leave, gentlemen, to subscribe ourselves,

Your servants and fellow citizens,

JESSE APPLGATE,

A. J. LOVEJOY,

GEO. L. CURRY,

Commissioners.

This patriotic communication produced a certain effect, though not, perhaps, financially commensurate with the hopes of its authors. The amount secured was less than five thousand dollars, but this sufficed to arm and equip the first regiment of Oregon riflemen.

The ransomed prisoners from Waiilatpu, Lapwai and Tchimakain reached the Willamette Valley in safety. Concerning those from Lapwai and Tchimakain, it may be said here to the credit of certain Indians that though one band, the Cayuses, were murderers, two bands, the Nez Perces and Spokanes, were saviors. Few things more thrilling ever came under human eye than the narration by Fathers Eells and Walker of the council of the Spokanes at Tchimakain to decide whether or not to join the Cayuses. The lives of the missionaries hung on the decision. Imagine their emotions as they waited with bated breath in their mission house to know the result. After hours of excited discussion with the Cayuse emissaries the Spokanes announced their conclusion: "Go and tell the Cayuses that the missionaries are our friends and we will defend them with our lives." The Nez Perces made the same decision. Bold though those Cayuses were—the fiercest warriors of the inland empire—their hearts must have sunk within them as they saw that the Umatillas, the Nez Perces and the Spokanes, and even the Hudson's Bay Company were all against them and that they must meet the infuriated whites from the Willamette. For as soon as tidings reached there the provincial government had at once entered upon the work of equipping fourteen companies of volunteers by an act of December 9th. These volunteers mainly provided their own horses, arms and ammunition, without a thought of pecuniary gain or even reimbursement.

Cornelius Gilliam, father of W. S. Gilliam, of Walla Walla, was chosen colonel of the regiment, and with great energy pushing all necessary arrangements, he set forth from the rendezvous at The Dalles on February 27, 1848. Several battles occurred on the way, the most severe at Sand Hollows in the Umatilla country.

The battle of Sand Hollows began on a plain where depressions in the sand made convenient natural rifle pits. These were occupied by the Indians in force. The baggage train, protected by the company of Captain Lawrence Hall, formed the center of the white forces. The left flank consisting of the companies of Captain Philip F. Thompson and Captain H. J. G. Maxon, were on the north side of the road, and the companies of Captain Levi N. English and Captain Thomas McKay constituted the right of the command. The first onset of the Indians fell upon McKay's company which was at the extreme right.

The forces of the Indians were composed of Umatilla, Cayuse and Walla Walla braves, who were in arms, not so much for the protection of the Whitman murderers as for the defense of their country from a general white invasion. They feared, and with reason, that if they permitted a regiment of white soldiers to invade their territory severe reprisals would be made and the innocent suffer with the guilty. Their principal leaders were Five Crows, the general chief of all three tribes and a recent Protestant convert, and War Eagle, also a Cayuse. Five Crows flamboyantly claimed that by his wizard powers he could stop all bullets, while War Eagle's gasconade was couched in the boastful statement that he would agree to swallow all missiles fired at him. This same spirit of braggadocio has, throughout all historical times, animated pagan soldiers. During the war with the Filipinos the natives were solemnly told by their priests that all bullets fired by American soldiers would turn to water before reaching them.

Mark the result of the engagement between the avengers of Dr. Whitman and the superstitious Cayuses. At the first onset the "Swallow Ball" was killed, and the "wizard" was so seriously wounded that he was compelled to retire from the war.

This unexpected disaster and the accompanying disillusion of the Indians as to their chiefs' invulnerability operated as a wet blanket on the ardor of the Indians, though they contested the advance of the troops stubbornly until evening put an end to the engagement. Once during the afternoon Captain Maxon's company advanced beyond supporting distance and being surrounded, was extricated with great difficulty, eight of his men being wounded. Eleven soldiers were wounded in the battle, but no one was killed. The Indian loss was severe though, as usual, they carried off most of their dead and wounded. The next day the troops continued their advance, reaching the Whitman mission the third day after the engagement. The scene of this battle was on the emigrant road, eight miles west of the Well Springs.

At the mission the troops paused several days to recuperate and give a reverent burial to the remains of the martyrs, which had been hastily covered with earth when Ogden ransomed the captives, but were afterward partially exhumed by coyotes.

The Indians had now fallen back to Snake river. Following them thither the whites were somewhat outgeneraled. They surprised and captured a camp of Indians, among whom were, as was afterward discovered, some of the murderers themselves. But the wily Cayuses professed great friendship and pointing to a large band of horses on the hill, said that the hostiles had abandoned them and crossed the river. Completely deluded the whites surrendered the camp and rounding up the horses, started on the return. And now the released captives, mounting at once, began a furious attack which proved so harrassing that the volunteers were obliged to retreat to the Touchet, and finally, although they repelled the Indians, they turned loose the captured horses. These the Indians seized, vanishing with them over the plains.

In the struggle on the Touchet, when the retiring volunteers reached its banks, William Taylor was fatally shot by an Indian who sprang up in the bushes near by. Nathan Olney, who was afterward agent of the Umatilla Indian reservation, avenged the deed by rushing upon Taylor's assailant, snatching from his hand a war club in which was fastened a piece of iron, and dealing him such a blow on the head as to cause the iron to split the club, and yet without killing him. In the hand-to-hand struggle which then ensued Olney finally succeeded in finishing the Indian with a knife.

But the Indians in general had no wish to fight, and finding that the whites insisted on a surrender of the murderers, the tribe scattered in various directions; Tamsuky with his friends going to the headwaters of the John Day. There they remained for two years. In 1850 a band of Umatillas undertook to capture them and after a severe fight killed Tamsuky and captured a number. Of the captives five were hanged at Oregon City, June 3, 1850. Just previous to their execution they signed the following declarations of innocence:

Kilokite—I am innocent of the crime of which I am charged. Those who committed it are dead, some killed, some died; they were ten, two were my sons; they were killed by the Cayuses. Tamsuky, before the massacre, came to my lodge; he told me they were going to hold a council to kill Dr. Whitman. I told him not to do so; that it was bad. One night seven Indians died near the house of Dr. Whitman, to whom he had given medicines. Tamsuky's family were sick; he gave them roots and leaves; they got well. Other Indians died. Tamsuky came often. I talked to him, but his ears were shut; he would not hear; he and others went away. After a while some children came into my lodge and told me what was going on. I had told Tamsuky over and over to let them alone; my talk was nothing; I shut my mouth. When I left my people the young chief told me to come and talk with the big white chief and tell him who it was that did kill Dr. Whitman and others, my heart was big; 'tis small now. The priest tells me I must die tomorrow. I know not for what. They tell me that I have made a confession to the marshal that I struck Dr. Whitman. 'Tis false. You ask me if the priests did not encourage me to kill Dr. Whitman? I answer, no, no. I am innocent, but my heart is weak since I have been in chains, but since I must die I forgive them all. Those who brought me here and take care of me, I take them all in my arms; my heart is opened.

Quiahmarsum (Panther-Skin.)—I was up the river at the time of the massacre, and did not arrive until the next day. I was riding on horseback; a white woman came running from the house. She held out her hand and told me not to kill her. I put my hand upon her head and told her not to be afraid. There were plenty of Indians all about. She, with the other women and children went to Walla Walla to Mr. Ogden's. I was not present at the murder, nor was I in any way concerned in it. I am innocent. It hurts me to talk about dying for nothing. Our chief told us to come down and tell all about it. Those who committed the murder are killed and dead. The priest says I must die tomorrow. If they kill me, I am innocent. I was sent here by my chief to declare who the guilty persons were; the white chief would then shake hands with me; we would have a good heart. My young chief told me I was to come here to tell what I know concerning the murderers. I did not come as one of the murderers for I am innocent. I never made any declaration to any one that I was guilty. This is the last time that I may speak.

Kloakamus—I was there at the time; but I had no hand in the murder. I saw them when they were killed, but did not touch or strike any one. I looked on. There were plenty of Indians. My heart was sorry. Our chief told us to come down and tell who the murderers were. There were ten; they are all killed. They say I am guilty, but it is not so; I am innocent. The people do not understand me. I can't talk to them. They tell me I must die by being hung by the neck. If they do kill me I am innocent, and God will give me a big heart. I have no reason to die for things I did not do. My time is short. I tell the truth. I know that I am close to the grave; but my heart is open and I tell the truth. I love every one in this world. I know that God will give me a big heart. I never confessed to the marshal that I was guilty, or to any other person; I am innocent. The priests did not tell us to do what the Indians have done. This is my last talk.

Siahsaluchus (Wet Wolf)—I say the same as the others; the murderers are killed, some by the whites, some by the Cayuses and some by others. They were ten in number. I have nothing more to say; I thank God and forgive all men; I love them. The priest did not tell us to do this.

Temahas—I did not know that I came here to die. Our chief told us to come and see the white chief and tell him all about it. The white chief would then tell us all what was right and what was wrong; learn us how to live when we returned home. Why should I have a bad heart after I am showed and taught how to live? My eyes were shut when I came here. I did not see but now they are opened. I have been taught; I have been showed what was good and what was bad. I do not want to die; I know now that we are all brothers. They tell me the same Spirit made us all. Tamahas joined with Kilokite. My heart cries my brother was guilty, but he is dead. I am innocent. I know I am going to die for things I am not guilty of, but I forgive them. I love all men now. My hope, the priest tells me, is in Christ. My heart shall be big with good.

The Cayuse Indians, however, admit that one of those condemned was really guilty, namely, Tamahas, who struck Dr. Whitman the first blow. Their claim that the others were innocent is very likely true and if so is but another instance of the lamentable failure to apply either punishment or mercy accurately, which has characterized all Indian wars on both sides. The innocent have borne the sins of the guilty in more ways than one.

Many men afterward famous in Oregon and Washington history took part in the Cayuse wars. Among them we may name James W. Nesmith, afterward United States senator from Oregon, and father of the wife of Levi Ankeny, present United States senator from Washington; Joel Palmer, late speaker of the house of representatives of Oregon; Captain William, who was sheriff and county judge of Umatilla county for sixteen years, and who died full of years and honors at Pendleton, in 1899; Captain Thomas McKay, First Lieutenant Charles McKay and Second Lieutenant Alexander McKay, all of whom were conspicuous for their important services during the campaign. The last three named were the sturdy sons of that Alexander McKay, partner of Astor, who was murdered on the ill-fated ship Tonquin in 1812. As before related, when Jason Lee crossed the continent, in 1834, he traveled from Fort Hall with Thomas McKay and his band of hunters. The two men became close friends, and when Lee returned to the states in 1838 he was accompanied by McKay as far as Bear river, where the latter's infant son, Donald was baptized by Mr. Lee. This infant was the same Donald McKay who afterward gained fame as an Indian scout, and was, at the time of his death, several years ago, the government interpreter on the Umatilla reservation. As Thomas McKay was unable to go all the way east, he turned three of his sons over to Mr. Lee to take to the states to be educated. Mr. Lee entered the boys in the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Massachusetts. One of them, the late Dr. William C. McKay, of Pendleton, afterward finished his studies at the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Connecticut.

Colonel Gilliam, who had shown himself a brave and capable commander, was accidentally killed on the return trip, a most melancholy end of a career which was full of promise to this section of the country.

In taking leave of this stirring historical epoch, the pursuit, capture and punishment of the principals and instigators of the murder of Dr. Whitman and his associates in missionary work, it may be said in the way of retrospection that, grievous as was the end of Whitman's career, no doubt it will ultimately be seen to have produced greater results for this region of the world than if he had survived to have enjoyed a well-merited rest from his labors. Subsequent development of this section, the founding of Whitman College, and the whole train of circumstances arising from American occupation of Oregon may be seen, in some measure, to have grown out of the tragedy at Waiilatpu. Here, as elsewhere, martyrdom appears a necessary accompaniment to the most brilliant progress in civilization.

While the offense of these Indians cannot be condoned, charity and justice compel the admission that the ignorant creatures were scarcely more responsible than the wild beasts who, also, disputed the territory with civilized man. The very superstition which it should be the duty of every missionary to eradicate from pagan minds as speedily as possible, is primarily to blame for the undoing of Dr. Whitman. Steeped in this barbaric superstition, pampered by the Hudson's Bay Company, treacherously deceived by agents and emissaries of the great octopus of the Northwest Coast, we cannot hold these savages to a higher degree of responsibility than the source from which they drew their grewsome inspiration. But in 1848 the progress of western civilization demanded their suppression, if not ultimate removal, along with the coyote and rattlesnake.

We cannot close this chapter more consistently than by giving an account of the various Indian tribes and their condition a few years previous to the Whitman tragedy and the war immediately following. For this purpose we append an extract from "Ten Years in Oregon," written by Missionaries Daniel Lee and J. H. Frost in 1844. These gentlemen lived among the Indians in different parts of the Northwest for a number of years and enjoyed ample opportunity to study the Indian character. The extract relates to the Indians, giving the number in Oregon at that time; the different tribes, their places of residence, occupations, modes of living, dress, superstitions, etc.

We now proceed to give as accurately as possible the number of Indians in the Oregon territory, their character, manners and customs.

The Rev. Samuel Parker, whose "Journal of an Exploring Tour Beyond the Rocky Mountains" is now before us, estimates the number of Indians in that territory in the lower country, between California and the forty-seventh degree of north latitude, at 50,000; and those of the upper country at 32,585, and then observes that "we might more than double this (the last number and probably still come below the population of the upper country."

Dr. Bangs, in his "History of Methodism" supposes their number to amount to probably 150,000. And Mr. Thomas J. Farnham, professedly, gives an extract from the report of Lieutenant Wilkes to the secretary of the navy, in which the numbers of the Indians in the Oregon territory are estimated at 19,199. What a contrast. And yet this last number is the most accurate, being, as the writer believes, not many hundreds wide of the mark; but in this estimate there are, to his certain knowledge, two errors. He passed through the Killamook country, while the exploring squadron, under the command of Lieutenant Wilkes was in the Columbia, and ascertained the number of the Killamook clan to amount to no more than 200, whereas in this "extract" it is estimated at 400. And the numbers of The Dalles Indians are underated at least one-half. This last statement the writer makes upon the authority of a gentleman who resided there for the space of five years, which embraced the time when the above mentioned squadron made their surveys in the country.

And now, with these very different and contradictory statements, the writer will leave the world to guess at the exact number of Indians in that territory, while he will proceed to give a brief description of their character, manners and customs, and in so doing he will have occasion to refer once more to the journal of the Rev. Mr. Parker. When speaking of the character of "the Indians of the plains of the upper country," this gentleman states that "they are scrupulously honest in all their dealings and lying is scarcely known," and says, "They fear to sin against the Great Spirit and, therefore, have but one heart, and their tongue is straight and not forked." He further adds, "And so correctly does the law written upon their hearts accord with the written law of God, that every infraction of the seventh commandment of the decalogue," that is, the commandment which prohibits the commission of adultery, "is punished with severity."

I know not how to apologize for these mis-statements only by stating, which is no doubt the fact, that this gentleman was not in the country a sufficient length of time to become acquainted with the Indian character. With reference to their honesty and integrity our readers may judge when we assure them from personal observation, and from information received from gentlemen and ladies who have resided among these Indians, that they are both thieves and liars; and they will also judge their virtuous dispositions when they learn that in two instances attempts were made upon white ladies who resided among them. Surely, these were virtuous Indians!

The gentleman further states, "The Indians west of the great chain of mountains have no wars among themselves, and appear to be adverse to them, and do not enter into battle except in self-defense, and then only in the last extremity." See Journal, page 236. Now the facts in the premises lie upon the opposite side of this "rail." There are perpetual feuds existing between the different clans. They do not often come forth in battle array, as did the armies of the Kings of Israel and Philistia; but whenever they get a sly chance they pounce upon their foe like the panther upon his prey, and as many of their enemies as do not fall before the arrow, the rifle ball or the knife, are driven away and sold into perpetual slavery.

The Chinooks, who reside on the north side of the Columbia, in plain sight and hearing of the writer while he resided on the south side of the river, during the summer of 1842, were at war among themselves, and they were not at peace when he left the country. During the summer referred to one could hear the muskets and rifles firing, some days, from morning till night; and that clan will soon be in the condition of the Killkenny cats of whom it is reported that they continued to fight until they devoured each other all but their tails.

This dispute and consequent war arose among them in precisely the same way that most irreconcilable disputes and exterminating wars have arisen in other hereditary monarchies among their Christian neighbors. Chenamus, their chief, was called upon by death to abdicate the ancient throne upon which Comcomly once sat in dignity and pomp when his white son-in-law bore rule at Astoria; and now, as it generally goes, his son, the "heir apparent," would needs ascend the seat of honor; but in this he found a rival, for another salmon-eater, who perhaps felt a drop of "royal blood" running through his veins, would be chief, also, which was, of course, a sufficient cause for war.

After enumerating a number of vices to which these Indians are addicted, such as gambling, etc., he adds: "It is not to be supposed that their virtue, any more than that of other tribes, would be invulnerable if exposed to temptation." No, for actual experience has long since proved to a demonstration that the slightest temptation has completely overcome their long-cherished virtuous principles. But still, the writer is very much inclined to join with his Christian brother in saying: "The moral disposition," that is, the natural disposition, "of these Indians is very commendable, certainly as much as any people," in their natural state, "that can be named." For since he had reached his own Christian nation, he finds it important and absolutely necessary to keep things under lock and key to prevent them from taking to themselves legs and walking away.

Perhaps, before dismissing these Indians it should be observed that in general appearance they resemble each other from The Dalles to the Rocky Mountains. The men are generally above the middling in size, and the women are of common stature and both are well formed. Their complexion may be a little lighter than that of other Indians. Their hair and eyes are black, their cheekbones high, and very frequently they have aquiline noses. Their hands, feet and ankles are small and well-formed, and their movements are easy, if not graceful. They wear their hair long, part it upon their foreheads and let it hang in tresses down behind. Their dress is much the same throughout the different clans, which consists of a shirt worn long, close leggings, with moccasins. There are of dressed skins of the deer, antelope, mountain goat and sheep. They use many ornaments, such as feathers, beads buttons and painted porcupine quills. The dress of the women and men is much the same, except, instead of the shirt the women wear a kind of frock, which comes nearly to the feet. Many of them wear a large cap made of dressed skins, ornamented with beads. They have an abundance of horses and are excellent riders. Their arms consist of the bow and arrow, musket, rifle and knife.

We will now dismiss the Indians of the upper country, and when we come to speak of the missionary operations at The Dalles, we will exhibit some more particular traits in their character. The character of those who inhabit the lower country, between The Dalles and the coast, now demands our attention.

The Chinooks inhabit the north side of the Columbia, their summer residence being immediately on the banks of the river during salmon season, and upon the Chinook river, a few miles to the north, where they take a second run of salmon, which are of an inferior quality. These are preserved for their winter food. To the north of the Chinooks we meet with the Checaldish clan, who also reside on the Columbia during summer and times of peace. To the north of these is another clan called the Quintiles. These sometimes visit the Columbia, but not generally. The Cowlitz are the next to be met with on the north side of the river and between them and The Dalles the country is inhabited by scattering bands of Chinooks and Klickitats. The south side of the Columbia, immediately on the coast is inhabited by the Clatsops, and to the south of them is the Killamook country. A clan called the Claskanios lived upon the streams which empty into the head of Young's Bay, which clan is very nearly extinct. Further up the river we meet with a remnant of a clan called Ne Coniaks. From this to The Dalles again we meet with only a few wandering bands of Klickitats and Chinooks.

The natives of the Willamette Valley consist principally of the Calapooyas; and here we are under the necessity of correcting another mistake recorded in the journal of Rev. Mr. Parker: This gentleman represents the Calapooyas as "being divided into seventeen different tribes, and number about 8,780 persons, who speak the same language, radically with only a little difference in dialect," etc. See page 262, third edition. Now the fact is this: There never was but one tribe of Calapooyas, and of that tribe there are only a few most miserable remnants left (which is the condition of all the tribes in the lower country), and are scattered over the most part of the Willamette Valley, and they will not number more than from 500 to 800. To prevent mistake I will here observe the Yamhills, of whom previous mention has been made, are a remnant of this nation; which band consists of two or three families, and is, perhaps, one of Mr. Parker's tribes.

As regards the Umpquahas, of whom Mr. Parker says, "they are divided into six tribes," it will be well for the reader to understand that in the year 1840 Revs. Jason Lee and G. Hines made a tour through their country for the purpose of selecting a location for a missionary post among these supposed "six tribes," but after passing through their country from the Willamette country through deep, dark ravines and over high, rugged and precipitous mountains, and finally down the whirling Umpqua river to the coast, they found a few miserable fish-eaters who were as savage of the bears, their neighbors, from among whom, as they were informed by their guide and guardian, an Indian woman, the wife of the man who had charge of the company's trading post in that region, they did well to escape with their lives for, while there, she had watched the movements all night, while the missionaries slept, and had expected an attack from them before morning. The brethren decided that it was "not expedient to establish a missionary post there." in which decision the writer most heartily concurred.

These Indians of the lower country resemble each other in person and manners and, with some slight exceptions in dress also, and the exceptions must be very slight, unless it be this, that some have very little covering and some none at all, and the best have but three changes, as it is said, that is, to put on, take off and-go without, and the latter change is frequently preferred. The writer does not attempt a particular description of their wardrobe, but he will venture to say that the men wear a shirt, and when it is cold a blanket—if they can get it; but there are a few immediately on the river who dress as Europeans sometimes, which clothes they obtain from trading vessels and the Hudson's Bay Company for salmon and furs. The dresses of the females are entirely inexpressible except that they sometimes wear a blanket over their shoulders made of small skins sewed together with sinews of elk or deer, or such as they obtain from the traders.

They are very fond of ornaments, such as beads, rings, bracelets, feathers and shells. One kind of shells in use among them is obtained on the Northwest Coast, which is a small, white, spiral shell called by them the "ta-cope-to-cope," or "Hiaqua." A fathom of these, when strung upon a string, are worth a good, three-point blanket, and these are their currency. It is not unfrequently the case that one may meet with an Indian with a bunch of these, say ten or fifteen tied together and hung in each ear, and one sticking through a hole in the ligament which divides the nostrils, with the face and parts of the body daubed with a kind of red clay, and a rude cap adorned with feathers upon his pancake-shaped head, with long hair queued up behind, upon which must be suspended a bunch of shells and some feathers, and a short, dirty shirt. After spending much time in thus richly and genteely attiring himself, he comes out a "perfect beau." And it can be easily ascertained when their young ladies are considered fit for market by the profusion of the like ornaments with which their persons are adorned. And yet it is with them as with other nations, ornaments do not constitute beauty, for neither sex can boast of this gift of nature. Their noses are generally broad and rather flat at the top, and fleshy at the end, with large nostrils. They have wide mouths, thin lips, and very good teeth. They are frequently, however, in aged persons, worn away to the gums by eating so much sand with their food. The men carefully eradicate every vestige of beard, which they consider a deformity, except a few individuals who have what is called a "goatée" under the chin. Their hair is black and coarse and both sexes wear it at full length. In size they are generally below five feet, five inches, with crooked legs and thick ankles, a deformity caused by their passing so much of their time sitting or squatting upon their heels in the bottom of their canoes, a favorite position which they retain even when on shore. The women increase the deformity by wearing tight bandages around the ankles, which prevents the circulation of the blood and causes a swelling in the muscles of the leg.

While in infancy their heads are flattened by compression from the eyebrows to the crown, and the flatter they can be made the more beautiful they are in their own estimation. One of the females came into the house of the writer one day with a child, the head of which was exquisitely flat. On being asked how she succeeded in making it so flat the woman said that she had put a bag of sand on it in the first instance, but as that proved too light she removed it and put the axe in its place, which effected the work to perfection. The slaves, however, are not allowed to enjoy the benefits of this deformity, consequently their heads are left in their natural state.

The following anecdote will show that they are not wanting in intellect, or at least shrewdness. When the Rev. Jason Lee visited the United States in 1839, he brought with him two boys of the Chinook nation. One of them being asked by a gentleman of the states the reason why their people flattened their heads, asked in return: "Why do your ladies made themselves so small about the waist?" And now, having committed myself by mentioning "slaves," I shall be under the necessity of saying something more on the subject. Their slaves and their women constitute the greatest part of their property. What! Their women? Yes, but hold, I must speak of slavery first. Their slaves are such as are taken prisoners in time of war, or perhaps, more properly speaking, such as are stolen from other tribes. For instance, a band of Kollamooks go to the south, and falling in with a weaker clan of their southern neighbors, they make no further ado, but fall on them, gun and knife in hand; some they kill, the remainder they take prisoners and convey them to the north and sell them to their Clatsop, Chinook and Checallish neighbors, when they and their children become slaves for life. What they call a "good man" slave is worth as much as a horse; that is, from ten to twelve blankets, and so on, according to the size and qualifications. The female slaves are worth less, from the fact that they are not able to perform much drudgery.

But in what sense are their women their property? Why, the more wives a man has the more work he can have done; and every man has a right, according to their view of things, to have as many wives as he is able to purchase. And do parents sell their daughters? Yes, in the following manner. When a young beau, or an old beau—and the latter circumstance is just as likely to happen there as in the civilized world—makes overtures for the hand of one of his neighbor's daughters, he approaches the parents, or in case the girl has no parents, the proposal is made to the nearest relative. The parent or relative then breaks the subject to the girl, and if the suit proves favorable, the terms are settled, which may require the swain to produce so many canoes, horses, blankets, kiaquas, or other articles of property upon the day the nuptials are to be celebrated. This property is divided among the relatives of the bride; and after the ceremony—marriage-ceremonies, however, have become nearly obsolete in the lower country—the bridegroom receives the bride's dowery, which is generally of much less value than the goods paid down by him.

One girl in the Clatsop clan refused to tender her much desired hand to a Chinook of some rank, alleging as a reason for her denial that her parents would require a high price for her, and as but little would be given in return if she acceded to the proposition, she would be obliged to work very hard to make her husband's heart good; so, embracing a favorable opportunity, she hid herself in the woods until this storm of love had measurably subsided when she returned to enjoy the bliss of a single squaw's life. In respect to their moral character I cannot, in justice to them, and to myself, say that it is blacker than that of thousands and tens of thousands of their white brethren in the civilized world. And for a full description of both I will refer the reader to the first chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, from the 19th verse to the close of the chapter.

Their superstitions are almost endless and very deeply rooted, and are manifested more and more as we become acquainted with them. To enumerate and describe them would require considerable labor, and such a description would necessarily take up a number of our pages, and when done the benefit derived therefrom would not quit cost; consequently we deem it our duty to pass this subject by, and proceed to notice those things in connection with the history which will be calculated to render this work more valuable. These Indians are the most degraded human beings that we have met with in all our journeyings, taking them as a whole. There is not one among them that can be considered virtuous. And in consequence of disease, which cleaves to them from their birth, and the many murders committed among them, they are rapidly wasting away, and the time is not far distant when the last death-wail will proclaim their universal extinction. It is truly heartrending to see, as we have, how the "last enemy" chases them "from the cradle to the grave."

CHAPTER VII

THE INDIAN WARS OF THE 'FIFTIES.

In a previous chapter we have read of the struggle for possession with England. America won. Her home-builders outmatched the fur traders. But there was, as there always has been in our national history, another inevitable struggle for possession. This was with the Indians. The so-called Christian nations have never stopped to consider the rights of the native claimants of the land. The thing greatly to be deplored in all Indian wars, however, has been the general practice on both sides of inflicting punishment upon any innocent persons who might happen along. Some drunken and ferocious savages, as devoid of humanity as the wild beasts about them, would plunder, outrage and kill some family of immigrants or settlers, and forthwith a band of the brave, manly, yet harsh and intolerant frontiersmen who have made our early history, would rush forth impetuously and kill some poor Indian wretches who had never heard of the outrage and had not the remotest conception of having committed any offense. In like manner when some avaricious white had swindled the ignorant Indians out of land or some other valuable property, or some lustful and conscienceless white desperado had outraged Indian women or murdered unoffending braves, a band of Indians, inflamed with whiskey purchased of some post trader, and armed with weapons from the same source, would go on the war-path and torture, mutilate and murder some innocent helpless women and children who had never thought of injuring a living thing. No one who has ever lived on the frontier can wonder at the bitter and intolerant hatred of the whites for the Indians. But if we, the civilized and victors, could put ourselves in the place of the natives and view life with their eyes, none of us would wonder that they had hated us with the fury and frenzy of wild beasts. For it is safe to say that for every pang suffered by whites a score have been suffered by Indians. And we, the higher race, must admit that we know better than they, and have less excuse for inhumanity and intolerance.

Yet in the final summary there can be no other conclusion than that the extermination of the majority of the Indians and the total destruction of their claims as owners of this country was "writ down in the book of fate." It was a part of the irrepressible conflict of life. Moreover by reason of the necessities of existence the early settlers could not wait to argue abstract questions of right. They had obeyed the fundamental law to subdue and replenish the earth, and in pursuance of that condition of all progress they could not stop to philosophize on the principles of human brotherhood. They had to live, and with a tomahawk over their heads they were obliged to repel. And if the right to repel existed, the right to counter attack followed as a matter of course; extermination of their enemies was, generally speaking, the only effectual means of repelling. It was sad, but inevitable. And though we have lived a "Century of Dishonor," it is much easier now to condemn than it would have been then to improve.

And so, by reason of these conditions we find the history of our Indian wars the subject of bitter controversy. Hardly any two writers or witnesses give the same version of supposed facts. One has a bias in favor of the pioneers and exploits his statements according to his opinions. Hence he represents the pioneers as always justifiable and the Indians as always to blame. Another gives the reverse impression. Nor are pioneers generally much disposed to blame or smooth either their opinions or expressions. It is apt to be all one thing or all the other with them. Compromise does not, for it cannot, flourish in pioneer conditions.

After the Cayuse war had ended in 1850, by the execution of the supposed murderers of Dr. Whitman, there was a lull along the bunch grass plains and sage-brush banks of the Columbia and Snake rivers. A few adventurous explorers and ranchers began to seek locations on the streams hallowed by martyrdoms. The most considerable settlement was at Frenchtown, ten miles below Walla Walla. According to the best information obtainable there were eighty-five persons, the men entirely of French origin, and former Hudson's Bay Company employes, with Indian wives and a good stock of half-breed children, living in the vicinity. Among these were the following: ——— Pacquette, Indian wife and two children; ——— Poirer, and Indian wife; ——— Tellier, Indian wife and six children; E. Beauchemir, Indian wife and six children; A. La Course, Indian wife and three children; Narcises Remond, Indian wife and two children; Lewis Dauny, Indian wife and three children; L. Rocque, Indian wife and three children; T. Morissette, Indian wife and three children; ——— Brancheau, Indian wife and four children; Oliver Brisbois, Indian wife and one child; A. D. Pambrun; William H. McBean, Indian wife and eleven children; J. B. Ignace, Indian wife and one child; Mignan Findlay, Indian wife and three children; ——— Etteyne, Indian wife and one child; Father Chirouse, and two brothers; Father Pondosa, temporarily.

Frank T. Gilbert says: "To the foregoing add James Sinclair with several employes, who had charge of the Hudson's Bay fort at Wallula, and it includes the inhabitants living within the region already hostile or liable to immediately become so."

Besides the miners, there were living east of the Cascades at that time the following persons, whose lives would be endangered by a general outbreak:

Henry M. Chase, who came in the latter part of 1851, with William McKay to Umatilla river, where he wintered. The next summer he joined William Craig in the Nez Perce country, wintered in 1852 at The Dalles, returned to the Nez Perce country in 1853, where he remained with his stock, purchased from immigrants, until 1855, when he became a resident of what is now Dayton, in Columbia county, Washington.

Louis Raboin, an American of French extraction, who had been living in the country east of the Cascades since 1851.

P. M. Lafontain, a neighbor of Mr. Chase in 1855, adjoining whom he had taken up a claim.

Lloyd Brooke, George C. Bumford and John F. Noble were partners and had occupied the Whitman mission since 1853. They had come to the country and selected that point for headquarters in the fall of 1852, intending to make it the center of a grazing region over which their stock could range; they still occupied the place in 1855.

A. P. Woodward first came to the region east of the Cascades in 1852, and though temporarily absent, was a resident of the Walla Walla valley in 1855.

W. A. Tallman was working for Brooke, Bumford and Noble in 1855.

William Craig, an old mountaineer, had been living at Lapwai among the Nez Percés since 1845, and the friendship of that tribe for the Americans was largely due to his influence among them. He died there in October, 1869.

John Owens, also a mountaineer, had been living in what is now Montana, since 1850.

Dr. William McKay had been living on the Umatilla river since 1851.

There were three transient men working for H. M. Chase, and some for Brooke, Bumford & Noble.

March 3, 1853, Washington was taken from "Oregon" and made a separate territory. Major Isaac I. Stevens was appointed governor, and in the following summer he set out for his domain. Gold had been discovered in the Colville country and there were many adventurers moving across the plains in that direction. The Indians were very restive. These explorations they regarded with well-grounded suspicion as the entering wedge of the establishment of white sovereignty.

There were at that time two remarkable Indian chiefs, chiefs who belonged to that line of remarkable red men of which Philip, Pontiac, Red Jacket and Tecumseh were more illustrious specimens; whose qualities of mind and character contain a hint of what Indians might have been had they had any wide or long continued opportunity. These two Columbia Valley chiefs were Kamiakin, of the Yakimas, and Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, of the Walla Wallas. Like all the Indian chiefs they perceived the handwriting on the wall revealed by the entrance of the whites, and they determined to make a desperate effort to burst their tightening bonds while there was yet a chance of success.

There was a general outburst of all the tribes of Oregon and Washington in 1853 and 1854 which led up to the great war centering in Walla Walla in 1855. This series of troubles began in the summer of 1853 in the Rogue river valley in southern Oregon. The usual bitter controversy raged as to who was to blame for this. It appears as though whites and Indians were equally so. In 1854 occurred the horrible "Snake River Massacre," in which a number of immigrants who had offered no provocation whatever, were butchered in the most fiendish manner. Norman Ward, of Pendleton, then a boy of thirteen, was the only survivor. That massacre occurred on the Boise a few miles above Fort Boise. Great excitement ensued in the Willamette Valley when this atrocity became known, and Major Haller was sent by General Wool, then commanding the department of the Pacific, to the scene. Having partially punished the supposed perpetrators of the outrage, the command returned to The Dalles. All these incidents, with many other smouldering causes of discontent, prepared the Indians for war.

The great war of 1855 comprised three fields of operation; one was southern Oregon, another Puget Sound, a third Yakima and Walla Walla valleys. In all there were probably four thousand Indians under arms, and many have believed that nothing but lack of intelligent co-operation among these prevented the annihilation of all the smaller settlements. But the various petty feuds and conflicting purposes invariably characteristic of barbaric wars, prevented such co-operation. Indian fought against Indian; the whites profited thereby.

In May, 1855 Governor Stevens and General Joel Palmer met the representatives of seventeen tribes at Walla Walla, in an endeavor to make treaties for the cession of their lands. The council ground was on and around the identical spot now occupied by Whitman College. The immemorial council ground of the Walla Walla and other tribes of this country lay between the college brook and the one north of it, and around the place now known as Council Grove. The tents of the great chiefs were pitched, as nearly as can be ascertained, on the spot now occupied by the house of Mrs. E. H. Baker.

The treaties negotiated at Walla Walla, June 12, (though dated June 9th), provided for the surrender by the Yakimas of the vast area of 29,000 square miles, being substantially Chelan, Yakima, Kittitas, Franklin, Adams and the most of Douglas and Klickitat counties. The Yakimas, it may be said, constituted a "nation" composed of fourteen tribes extending from the Cascade summits to the Palouse river. The Nez Perces agreed to relinquish almost as large an area, embracing what is now a good part of Whitman, Garfield, Columbia and Asotin counties, in Washington; Union and Wallowa counties in Oregon; and Washington, Idaho and Nez Perce counties in Idaho. A very large reservation was provided by the treaty for the Nez Perces; being, in addition to that now embraced in the Nez Perces reservation, large tracts between the Alpowa and Snake rivers and the Wallowa valley. The retention of the Wallowa was insisted on by Chief Joseph and seems to have been the key to the ratification of the entire plan; and it is the more to be deplored that the modification of the treaty in 1863, afterward precipitated the Nez Perce war of 1877. That change in 1863 involved the surrender of the Wallowa and the reduction of the Nez Perce reservation to what it was prior to its recent opening. But few Indians appear to have been consulted. Young Joseph, son of the Joseph who took part in the treaty of 1855, insisted on their claim to the country, and this difficulty led to the memorable war of 1877.

The Umatillas, Cayuses and Walla Wallas, under the terms of this treaty relinquished their right to another magnificent territory, embraced substantially in the present limits of Walla Walla county in Washington, and Umatilla, Morrow and part of Union and Gilliam counties in Oregon. Their reservation was essentially that now known as the Umatilla reservation. Which of these superb domains was the best would puzzle a good judge to decide. Any one of them is larger than most of the Atlantic states, and in point of opulence of natural resources surpasses equal areas in most parts of the world.

For their concession the Indians were to receive what seems a just and even liberal compensation, though to the mind of civilized man, ridiculously small; for the whole vast area of probably 30,000,000 acres outside of reservations was relinquished for about $650,000; in all, perhaps, roughly estimated, two cents per acre. It is, probably, worth today, with its improvements nearly a quarter of a billion dollars.

The compensation of the Yakima nation was $200,000, paid in annuities, with salaries for the head chiefs of $500 for twenty years, also some special agreement concerning houses, tools, etc. The compensation of the Nez Perces was the same. The Umatillas, Cayuses and Walla Wallas were to receive $100,000; each of the head chiefs to have an annuity of five hundred dollars for twenty years, and also to have the usual special donations for houses, tools, etc. Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, whose favor was especially courted, was granted the unique privilege of beginning to draw his salary at once, without waiting for the formal ratification by congress. His remaining son was to receive an annuity of $100 a year, a house and five acres of land, plowed and enclosed. Peu-peu-Mox-Mox was also to be given three yoke of oxen, three yokes and chains, one wagon, two plows, twelve hoes, twelve axes, two shovels, a saddle and bridle, a set of wagon harness and one set of plow harness.

Having completed this great work, Governor Stevens passed on to the north and east to continue the same line of negotiations with the Indians there. We may say in brief that he succeeded in making a treaty with the Blackfeet, but was unsuccessful with the Spokanes. Meanwhile, during his absence, the great Walla Walla and Yakima war had burst with the suddenness of a cyclone upon the Columbia plains. And not only here but throughout the Sound country the storm of war had burst on all sides.

That the outbreak of hostilities should have occurred almost simultaneously at places so remote from each other as Walla Walla, Puget Sound and Rogue river, has led many to suppose that there was a definite and widespread conspiracy. Others have believed that there was simply an identity of causes and that these produced like results at like times. While it is altogether likely that there may have been hints of outbreak in the air which spread from tribe to tribe, it is more likely that the second is the true solution.

Kamiakin, the Yakima chief, and Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, the Walla Walla chief, were the animating force of the movement on this side of the mountains. Kamiakin was a natural general and diplomat. He appears to have signed the treaty at Walla Walla only under great pressure and with mental reservation that he would break it at the first opportunity. Hardly had the ink dried on the treaty when he was rounding up the warriors over the wide domain of the Yakima nation. These chiefs seem to have seen, as did Philip and Pontiac, that the coming of the whites, if not checked, meant the destruction of Indian rule. If they were to struggle against fate at all they must do it then. From their viewpoint they were adopting the only possible policy. As some of the Nez Perces told Governor Stevens, they were not afraid of explorers or trappers, or soldiers, but they were afraid of men with wagons and axes. They had now been watching for fifteen years a steady stream of immigrants passing down to the Willamette. Steamboats were running on the Columbia and Willamette rivers. Towns were springing up. For them it was now or never. One Indian only, and that was Lawyer, the Nez Perce, perceived the impossibility of the Indians ever coping with the whites, and that therefore the only wise course for them was to yield to the inevitable as easily as possible and adopt the white man's mode of life and live on terms of amity with him. Though Looking Glass and Eagle-From-the-Light had dissented very strongly from the first, they had finally yielded to Lawyer's powerful influence and the treaty resulted. Now in the midst of the fury of war they remained true to their agreement. Kamiakin had gathered a great council of the disaffected at a point north of Snake river. The fierce and intractable Cayuses were the most active in the movement of any except Kamiakin himself and his immediate friends. Young Chief and Five Crows were the Cayuse chiefs leading the war. Stechus alone, with a very small following, holding aloof.

The war broke out rather prematurely in September by the murder of miners traversing the Yakima valley. Agent Bolon, having gone courageously into the valley to investigate the matter, was murdered and burned to ashes on September 23d. It is said that Quelchen, son of Owhi and nephew of Kamiakin, committed this crime.

Tidings of the outbreak of hostilities having reached The Dalles, Major Haller with a hundred men at once started north and Lieutenant Slaughter went from Steilacoom across the Natchez pass to the Yakima to co-operate with Haller. But on October 6th the Indians burst upon Haller with such energy that he was obliged to retreat with a loss of a fourth of his men, besides his howitzer and baggage. At this stage of affairs Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox fell upon old Fort Walla Walla, now Wallula, and as it had no garrison the Indians plundered the fort of a considerable quantity of stores. The Walla Walla valley was swept of settlers. The regions bordering Puget Sound were also ravaged by the Indians. At this period General Wool was commander of the Department of the Pacific. It is not possible here to enter into any examination of the bitter and rancorous dispute that has arisen as to General Wool's conduct of this war. It was intensely unsatisfactory to the settlers. Wool seems to have decided that the whites in southern Oregon were more to blame than the Indians and he felt disposed, in consequence, to allow them to meet the results of their own acts.

Discovering from experience that there was little to be hoped for from the regulars, Governor Curry and the Oregon legislature speedily equipped a strong force under Colonel J. W. Nesmith. The latter having gone to the Yakima country with four companies under general charge of Major Raines, of the regulars, on what proved to be a fruitless expedition, Lieutenant-Colonel J. K. Kelly, in command of five hundred men, marched to Walla Walla.

There occurred the famous battle of Walla Walla, on the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th of December, 1855. The force of Oregon volunteers having reached Wallula December 2d, found that the Indians whom they had hoped to meet there had eluded them, leaving the fort in ruins. Setting forth in two divisions on December 5th, the volunteers proceeded up the Walla Walla river to the Touchet. Turning up the latter stream they had proceeded about ten miles when there suddenly appeared with a flag of truce no less a personage than Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox himself. Captain Cornoyer, who was in the vanguard, entered into a parley with the Walla Walla chieftian in which the chief stated that he and his people were anxious to make peace. He told Nathan Olney, the Indian agent with whom he conversed, that he had at first intended to make war on the whites, but on reflection had decided that it would not be good policy. While the conference was in progress the troops as well as the Indians had gradually gathered around in considerable numbers and finally passed on in the direction of an Indian village near at hand. Perceiving that they were approaching a dangerous canyon, Colonel Kelly became suspicious that the Indians were meditating treachery, and he determined to return a short distance back upon the trail and camp without supper for the night. It was a cold, wretched night. Snow began to fall. Colonel Kelly in his anxiety to make a forced march, had given orders to travel light and they were so very light that they had no supplies. Much difference of opinion developed as to the wisdom of pausing and camping on the trail. Captain Cornoyer held the opinion, which he afterward stated to Colonel Gilbert, that Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox was acting in good faith and that if the army had gone on with him, he being entirely in their power, they would have reached the village in safety and would have found plenty of food, passed a comfortable night, and that the war would have ended then and there. Colonel Kelly believed otherwise and has left on record the following reasons for his opinion. He writes that Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox

* * * Stated that he did not wish to fight and that on the following day he would come and have a talk and make a treaty of peace. On consultation with Hon. Nathan Olney, Indian agent, we concluded that this was simply a ruse to gain time for removing his village and preparing for battle. I stated to him that we had come to chastise him for the wrongs he had done to our people, and that we would not defer making an attack on his people unless he and his five followers would consent to accompany and remain with us until all difficulties were settled. I told him that he might go away under his flag of truce if he chose, but that if he did so we would forthwith attack his village. The alternative was distinctly made known to him, and to save his people he chose to remain with us a hostage for the fulfillment of his promises, as did also those who accompanied him. He at the same time said that on the following day he would accompany us to his village; that he would then assemble his people and make them deliver up their arms and ammunition, and restore the property which had been taken from the white settlers, or pay the full value of that which could not be restored, and that he would furnish fresh horses to remount my command and cattle to supply them with provisions to enable us to wage war against other hostile tribes who were leagued with him. Having made these promises we refrained from making the attack, thinking we had him in our power; that the next day his promise would be fulfilled. I also permitted him to send one of the men who accompanied him to his village to apprise the tribes of the terms of the expected treaty, so that they might be prepared to fulfill it.

I have since learned from a Nez Perce boy who was taken at the same time with Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, that instead of sending word to his people to make a treaty of peace he sent an order for them to remove their women and children and prepare for battle. From all I have since learned I am well persuaded that he was acting with duplicity and that he expected to entrap my command in the deep ravine in which his camp was situated, and make his escape from us.

This singular move of the "Yellow Serpent" was hard to explain logically. Strange it appeared that he should place himself in the hands of his enemies unless he really meant to act in good faith. Moreover, it is not easy to see how he could have expected to gain anything by leading the whites into a trap so long as his own life was certain to be the instant forfeit of any treachery. On the other hand it is passing strange that, were he perfectly honest, the Indians should have made an attack on the following day. However it may have been it was plain that things were not going just according to program; during the night Indians had gathered in great numbers about on the hills, and were evidently watching in great anxiety to see what might be the fate of Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox. Subsequent events proved that the Indians had made a change of policy during the night. They shouted words in the Cayuse language evidently intended for the ears of the captive chief alone.

Morning dawned on a bleak, December day. Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox was anxious to obtain a stay of proceedings. He said that his people required time to prepare provisions, etc., in order to give the whites a fitting reception. It was nearly noon before the cold, hungry, disgusted command started, and after passing through the canyon in safety they reached the Indian village. Alas, no warmth or food or welcome awaited them. The village was deserted. Scouts were seen on the surrounding hills and finally, after much shouting and gesticulating, one Indian was induced to come to the camp. He proved to be the son of Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox. Having entered into conversation with his son, the old chief directed him to notify the people to come in and make peace. The son told they were only awaiting the arrival of Five Crows to do so. But they waited a long time; the famished and exhausted volunteers saw that they must return to the mouth of the Touchet and join those who had been left with provisions and baggage. Night found them on the banks of that stream.

Early in the morning the force was on the march with baggage and all available resources. They moved toward Whitman mission, where Colonel Kelly planned to make a winter camp. Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, with several companions, still remained with them. Soon after the volunteers crossed the Touchet the ball opened. Who fired first is still a matter of dispute. Mr. Gilbert quotes A. P. Woodward as asserting that the whites fired the first shot, this being done by a member of Company B, named Jont. Then ensued a running fight up the Walla Walla valley. At the mouth of Dry creek, near the present Loudon place, the Indians made a brief stand, but being forced from their position they broke again and pressed on hastily toward Frenchtown. There, spreading across the valley, they made a determined stand. Here Lieutenant J. M. Burrows, of Company H, was killed and a number of men were wounded. Giving way again the savages retreated to the location of the Tillier ranch, and there, near the present site of the Frenchtown church the fight was renewed. There Captain Bennett, of Company F, and Private Kelso, of Company A, were killed.

The soldiers had found an abandoned howitzer at Wallula, and this, under charge of Captain Wilson, was now brought to bear on the enemy. At the fourth discharge the piece burst, severely wounding Captain Wilson. And now, again, the Indians broke and fled. The fight was over for the time and the soldiers camped that night on the field of battle. The spot where the severest contest occurred was marked a few years ago by a gathering with appropriate exercises and the raising of a flag provided by Mrs. Levi Ankeny,—a deeply interesting occasion, in which veterans of that war took great joy. Prominent among them were General McAuliff, William Painter, Lewis McMorris and A. G. Lloyd.

During the first day's battle, at about the hottest part of the action, occurred a sensational event concerning which there has since been considerable discussion. Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox and his companions in captivity, with one exception, were killed by the guards and volunteers surrounding them. Eye witnesses of this affair are not in accord as to the facts. Probably no one of them is able to give an absolutely correct and detailed statement of all that transpired, such was the confusion and excitement prevailing at the time. Of this affair Frank T. Gilbert says:

The following is an account of it as given to the writer by Lewis McMorris, who was present at the time and saw what he narrated. The hospital supplies were packed on mules in charge of McMorris, and had just reached the LaRocque cabin, where the first engagement had taken place. The surgeon in charge had decided to use it as a hospital in which to place those wounded in the battle and McMorris was unpacking the mules. Near it the unfortunate J. M. Burrows lay dead, and several wounded were being attended to. The combatants had passed on up the valley, and the distant detonations of their guns could be heard. The flag of truce prisoners were there under guard, and everyone seemed electrified with suppressed excitement. A wounded man came in with his shattered arm dangling at his side and reported Captain Bennett killed at the front. This added to the excitement and the attention of all was more or less attracted to the wounded man, when someone said, "Look out, or the Indians will get away! At this seemingly everyone yelled, "Shoot 'em! Shoot 'em!" and on the instant there was a rattle of musketry on all sides.

What followed was so quick, and there were so many acting, that McMorris could not see it in detail, though all was transpiring within a few yards around him. It was over in a minute, and three of the five prisoners were dead; another was wounded, knocked senseless and supposed to be dead, but who afterward recovered consciousness, and was shot to put him out of his misery, while the fifth was spared because he was a Nez Perce. McMorris remembers some of the events that marked this tragedy, however, such as an impression on his mind of an attempt of the prisoners to escape, that started the shooting; that everybody was firing because they were excited and the target was an Indian; that he saw no evidence of an attempt to escape, except to keep from being murdered; that they were killed while surrounded by and mingling with the whites; and that but one Indian offered to defend his life. The prisoner offering resistance was a powerful Willamette Indian called "Jim" or "Wolf Skin," who having a knife secreted upon his person, drew it and fought desperately. "I could hear that knife whistle in the air," said McMorris, "as he brandished it, or struck at the soldier with whom he was struggling." It lasted but a moment, when another soldier approaching from behind dealt him a blow on the head with a gun that broke his skull and stretched him apparently lifeless upon the ground. All were scalped in a few minutes, and later the body of Yellow Serpent, the great Walla Walla chief, was mutilated.

Frank T. Gilbert, also states that McMorris' account was confirmed by G. W. Miller and William Nixon, both of whom were present. But the writer of this work has secured from Mr. Miller a personal narrative of this historical event, over his own signature, and it will be found in full in the appendix to this volume.

A. P. Woodward, who was nearby when the chief was killed, states that, briefly, the facts were these: When asked what should be done with the prisoners Colonel Kelly had told the guard, "I don't care a damn." The prisoners were neither tied nor in any way confined, but were mingled with the volunteers. When the firing became warm and several wounded had been brought back to where the guard and prisoners were, some of the troops became very much excited and called out, "Shoot the damned Indians and kill them!" Several shots were fired and two or three of the Indians fell, though they were not attempting to escape. Then Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox sprang off his horse, and walking toward those who were firing said, "You don't need to kill me, —I am not Jesus Christ," and with these words, fell. The biting sarcasm of the dying words of Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, if these were his words, can only be appreciated when we remember that he was a savage and could not be made to understand why the white men had, according to their own account, killed their own God.

Such is the fanciful tale related by Mr. Woodward. It is obvious, and corroborated by all other witnesses, that the Walla Walla chief was not mounted on a horse at that time, but was struggling with the guards in, or around the cabin, and on his feet. It may, also, be stated that in answer to a direct question as to whether any such language was used, Samuel Warfield, the slayer of Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, said that the only foundation for this story was something that occurred on the evening previous. Wolf Skin, he says, attempted to escape. He was immediately recaptured and while being tied to prevent a repetition of his attempt, he said: "That's as much as could be expected of you; Christ died for his people and I can die for mine," whereupon one of the volunteers rejoined, "Christ did not run," raising a general laugh. Let us here add the account of the killing as given by Mr. Warfield in a personal letter written to the author of this work. He said:

Amos Underwood and I were guards over the six Indian prisoners, Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, Klickitat Jimmy, or Wolf Skin, Nez Perce Billy and three others. About 4 o'clock in the evening there were a number of soldiers around the guard and prisoners. Word was sent two or three times for those soldiers to come to the front; but they did not go. Finally Colonel Kelly came and ordered them to the front. I said to the colonel, "I want to go to the front; what will we do with these prisoners?" He replied, "Tie them and put them in the house, if they will submit to you; if not put them in anyhow." Major Miller was there present among the wounded, having been shot in the arm. Just at that time Wolf Skin pulled his knife from his legging and struck at Major Miller, cutting his arm as it was thrown up to ward off the blow. In an instant some one broke a musket over the Indian's head, killing him. Then the fight began. Five of the Indian prisoners were killed, being either shot or struck over the heads with guns. Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox being the last one. I showed him how to cross his hands so that I could tie him and put him in the house as the colonel had told us, when he grabbed my gun and tried to wrench it around so as to shoot me. I jumped back and grabbed him by the collar and threw him down, still keeping hold of my gun. I also shot at him but missed, he being too close. He caught me by the breeches leg and tried to regain his feet. I again jumped back from him as he tried to get up, and struck him over the head with my gun, settling him for all time.

While speaking of Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox it is only fair to give the explanation of Major Lee Moorhouse, of Pendleton, Oregon, concerning a correct translation of his name. The major, who has given much attention to the history of the aborigines of this region, says that the name Peoemoxmox (as he says it should be spelled in English) means Yellow Bird and not Yellow Serpent, as a malicious French half-breed interpreter, who had a grudge against the chief, translated it to the whites.

A. P. Woodward describes the chief as a man of middle age, six feet two inches tall, straight as an arrow, with piercing eyes and a nose like a hawk—hence his name of Yellow Bird, or Hawk.

On the following day the battle was renewed. Colonel Kelly thus describes the events of the next two days, and inasmuch as his official report thus embraces the essential features of the case we quote it at length:

Early in the morning of the 8th the Indians appeared with increased forces, amounting to fully six hundred warriors. They were posted as usual in the thick brush by the river—among the sage bushes and sand knolls, and on the surrounding hills. This day Lieutenant Pillow, with Company A, and Lieutenant Hannon, with Company H, were ordered to take and hold the brush skirting the river and the sage bushes on the plain. Lieutenant Fellows, with Company F, was directed to take and keep possession of the point at the foot of the hill. Lieutenant Jeffries with Company B, Lieutenant Hand, with Company I, and Captain Cornoyer, with Company K, were posted on three several points on the hills, with orders to maintain them and assail the enemy on other points of the same hills. As usual the Indians were driven from their position, although they fought with skill and bravery.

On the 9th they did not make their appearance until about 10 o'clock in the morning and then in somewhat diminished numbers. As I had sent to Fort Henrietta for Companies D and E, and expected them on the 10th I thought it best to act on the defensive and hold our positions which were the same as on the 8th, until we could get an accession to our forces sufficient to enable us to assail their rear and cut off their retreat. An attack was made during the day on Companies A and H, in the brushwood, and upon B, on the hill, both of which were repulsed with great gallantry by these companies with considerable loss to the enemy. Companies F, I and K also did great honor to themselves in repelling all approaches to their positions, although in doing so one man in Company F and one in Company I were severely wounded. Darkness as usual closed the combat, by the enemy withdrawing from the field. Owing to the inclemency of the night the companies on the hill were withdrawn from their several positions, Company B abandoning its rifle pits which were made by the men of that company for its protection. At early dawn of the next day the Indians were observed from our camp to be in possession of all points held by us on the preceding day. Upon seeing them Lieutenant McAuliff, of Company B, gallantly observed that his company had dug those holes, and after breakfast they would have them again; and well was his declaration fulfilled, for in less than an hour the enemy was driven from the pits and fled to an adjoining hill which they had occupied the day before. This position was at once assailed. Captain Cornoyer with Company K and a portion of Company I, being mounted, gallantly charged the enemy on his right flank, while Lieutenant McAuliff with Company B dismounted, rushed up the hill in face of a heavy fire and scattered them in all directions. They at once fled to return to this battle field no more, and thus ended our long contested fight.

In making my report I cannot say too much in praise of the conduct of the officers of the several companies, and most of the soldiers under their command. They did their duty bravely and well during those four days of battle. To Second Major Chinn, who took charge of the companies in the bush by the river, credit is due for bravery and skill; also to Assistant Adjutant Monroe Atkinson, for his efficiency and zeal as well in the field as in the camp. And here, while giving to the officers and men of the regiment the praise that is justly due, I cannot omit the name of Hon. Nathan Olney, although he is not one of the volunteers. Having accompanied me in the capacity of Indian agent, I requested him to act as my aid on account of his admitted skill in Indian warfare; and to his wisdom in council and daring on the battlefield, I am much indebted and I shall ever appreciate his worth.

Companies D and E having arrived from Fort Henrietta on the evening of the 10th, the next morning I followed with all the available troops along the Nez Perce's trail in pursuit of the Indians. On Mill creek, about twelve miles from here, we passed through their village, numbering one hundred and ninety-six fires, which had been deserted the night before. Much of their provisions were scattered by the wayside, indicating that they had fled in great haste to the north. We pursued them until it was too dark to follow the track of their horses, when we camped on Coppei creek. On the twelfth we continued the pursuit until we passed some distance beyond the stations of Brooke, Noble and Bumford, on the Touchet, when we found the chase was in vain as many of our horses were completely broken down and the men on foot. We therefore returned and arrived in camp on yesterday evening with about one hundred head of cattle which the Indians had left scattered along the trail in their flight.

On the 11th while in pursuit of the enemy, I received a letter from Narcisse Raymond by the hand of Tintinmetzy, a friendly chief (which I enclose), asking our protection of the French and friendly Indians under his charge.

On the morning of the 12th I dispatched Captain

Cornoyer with his command to their relief. Mr. Olney, who accompanied them, returned to camp this evening, and reports that Captain Cornoyer will return tomorrow with Mr. Raymond and his people, who now feel greatly relieved from their critical situation. Mr. Olney learned from these friendly Indians what we before strongly believed, that the Palouses, Walla Wallas, Umatillas, Cayuses and Stock Whitley's band of Des Chutes Indians were all engaged in the battle on the Walla Walla. These Indians also informed Mr. Olney that after the battles the Palouses, Walla Wallas, and Umatillas have gone partly to the Grande Ronde and partly to the country of the Nez Perces; and that Stock Whitley, disgusted with the manner in which the Cayuses fought in the battle, has abandoned them and gone to the Yakima country to join his forces with those of Kamiakin. We have now the undisputed possession of the country south of Snake river, and I would suggest the propriety of retaining this possession until such time as it can be occupied by the regular troops. The Indians have left much of their stock behind which will doubtless be lost to us if we go away. The troops here will not be in a situation for some time to go to the Palouse country, as our horses at present are too much jaded to endure the journey, and we have no boats to cross Snake river, no timber to make them nearer than this place; but I would suggest the propriety of following up the Indians with all possible speed, now that their hopes are blighted and their spirits broken. Unless this is done they will, perhaps, rally again.

Today (December 14, 1855) I received a letter from Governor Stevens, dated yesterday, which I enclose. You will perceive that he is in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war. With his views I fully concur.

I must earnestly ask that supplies be sent forward to us without delay. For the last three days none of the volunteers, except the two companies from Fort Henrietta, have had any flour. None is here and but little at that post. We are now living on beef and potatoes which are found en cache, and the men are becoming much discontented with this mode of living. Clothing for the men is much needed as the winter approaches. Tomorrow we will remove to a more suitable point, where grass can be obtained in greater abundance for our worn-out horses. A place has been selected about two miles above Whitman station, on the same (north) side of the Walla Walla, consequently I will abandon this fort, named in honor of Captain Bennett, of Company F, who now sleeps beneath its stockade, and whose career of usefulness and bravery was here so sadly but nobly closed.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

JAMES K. KELLY,

W. H. FARRAR,

Adjutant of Regiment, O. M. V.

The winter following the battle of Walla Walla was one of the coldest and most trying ever known in this country. The veterans among the volunteers have left on record accounts of the sufferings which show that war in an Indian country was not a picnic in those times. The late W. C. Painter describes vividly the experience of sleeping, or trying to, with scarcely any covering and the mercury at twenty below zero. Meantime while these events were occurring in the Walla Walla and Yakima countries, what was Governor Stevens doing? As already noted, after having negotiated the treaty at Walla Walla in June, 1855, he passed on to the Blackfoot country, where he also negotiated a successful treaty. Having reached Hellgate, in the present Montana, on his return he was met by a detachment of Nez Perce Indians, who informed him of the war and of the fact that he was thus cut off from any direct communication with his government. His own official report to the secretary of war gives so clear and vivid an account of what followed that we reproduce it here:

The result of our conference was most satisfactory. The whole party, numbering fourteen men, among whom were Spotted Eagle, Looking Glass and Three Feathers, principal chiefs among the Nez Perces, expressed their determination to accompany me and share any danger to be encountered. They expressed a desire that after crossing the mountains I should go to their country, where a large force of their young men would accompany me to The Dalles and protect us with their lives against any enemy.

Having replenished my train with all the animals to be had, on November 14th we pushed forward, crossed the Bitter Root mountains the 20th, taking the Coeur d'Alenes entirely by surprise. They had not thought it possible that we could cross the mountains so late in the season.

With the Coeur d'Alenes I held a council and found them much excited, on a balance for peace or war, and a chance word might turn them either way. Rumors of all kinds met us here; that the troops had fought a battle with the Yakimas and drove them across the Columbia toward the Spokane, and that the Walla Wallas, Cayuses and Umatillas were in arms, and that they had been joined by a party of Nez Perces. The accounts were of so contradictory a nature that nothing certain could be ascertained from them excepting that the several tribes below were in arms, blocking up our road, and had threatened to cut off my party in any event. However, I determined to push on to the Spokane.

The Spokanes were even more surprised than the Coeur d'Alenes on seeing us. Three hours before my arrival they had heard that I was going to the settlements by way of New York. I immediately called a council; sent to Fort Colville for Mr. McDonald, in charge of that post for the Hudson's Bay Company; and also for the Jesuit fathers at that point. They arrived. A council was held at which the whole Spokane nation was represented. The Coeur d'Alenes and Colville Indians also were present.

The Spokane and Colville Indians evinced extreme hospitality of feeling; spoke of the war below; wanted it stopped; said the whites were wrong. The belief was current that Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox would cut off my party, as he had repeatedly threatened. They had not joined in the war, but yet would make no promise to remain neutral. If the Indians now at war were driven into their country they would not answer for the consequences; probably many of the Spokanes would join them. After a stormy council of several days, the Spokanes, Coeur d'Alenes and Colvilles were entirely conciliated and promised they would reject all overtures of the hostile Indians and continue the firm friends of the whites.

Having added to my party and reorganized, etc., we thence made a forced march to the Nez Perce country. Mr. Craig had received letters which informed me that the whole Walla Walla valley was blocked up with hostile Indians, and the Nez Percés said it would be impossible to go through.

I called a council and proposed to them that one hundred and fifty of their young men should accompany me to The Dalles. Without hesitation they agreed to go. Whilst in the council making arrangements for our movements, news came that a force of gallant Oregon volunteers, four hundred strong, had met the Indians in the Walla Walla valley and after four days hard fighting, having a number of officers and men killed and wounded, had completely routed the enemy, driving them across Snake river and toward the Nez Perce country. The next day I pushed forward, accompanied by sixty-nine Nez Percés, well armed, and reached Walla Walla without encountering any hostile Indians. They had all been driven across Snake river below us by the Oregon troops.

It is now proper to inquire what would have been the condition of my party had not the Oregon troops vigorously pushed into the field and gallantly defeated the enemy.

The country between the Blue mountains and the Columbia was overrun with Indians, numbering one thousand to twelve hundred warriors, including the force as Priest Rapids under Kamiakin, who had sworn to cut me off; it was completely blocked up. One effect of the campaign of the regulars and volunteers in the Yakima country under Brigadier General Raines was to drive Kamiakin and his people on our side of the river, and thus endanger our movement from the Spokane to the Nez Perce country. Thus we had been hemmed in by a body of hostile Indians through whom we could only force our way with extre difficulty and at great loss of life. We might all have been sacrificed in the attempt. For the opening of the way to my party I am solely indebted to the Oregon volunteers. Peu-Peu-Mox-Mox, the celebrated chief of the Walla Wallas, entertained an extreme hostility toward myself and party, owing to imaginary wrongs he supposed to have been inflicted upon him in the treaty concluded with the Cayuses and Walla Wallas last June, and had been known repeatedly to threaten that I never should reach The Dalles. He was the first to commence hostilities by plundering Fort Walla Walla and destroying a large amount of property belonging to the United States Indian Department.

At Walla Walla I found some twenty-five settlers—the remainder having fled to The Dalles for protection. With these were one hundred friendly Indians. Special Indian Agent B. F. Shaw, colonel in the Washington Territorial militia, was on the ground, and I at once organized the district, placed him in command and directed him, if necessary, to fortify, at all events to maintain his ground should the Oregon troops be disbanded before another force could take the field. The Nez Perce auxiliaries were disbanded and returned home.

Thus we had reached a place of safety unaided, except by the fortunate movements of the Oregon troops. Not a single man had been pushed forward to meet us, although it was well known we should cross the mountains about a certain time, and arrive at Walla Walla about the time we did. Why was this? Arrangements had been made with Major Raines by Acting Governor Mason to push forward a force under Colonel Shaw to meet me at Spokane about the time of my arrival there. A company had been enlisted, organized and marched to Fort Vancouver to obtain equipments, rations and transportation, which Major Raines had promised both Governor Mason and Colonel Shaw should be promptly furnished them. Some little delay ensued, and in the meantime Major General Wool arrived, who immediately declined equipping the company, as promised by Major Raines, and stated that he could not in any manner recognize volunteers or furnish them equipments or transportation, and declined to supply their places with regular troops, of whom, at Vancouver alone, there were some three hundred and fifty men.

Following this description of his journey Governor Stevens went on to prefer charges of gross negligence on the part of General Wool. All history abounds in instances of intense personal feuds and disagreements, and our Pacific coast history appears to have been especially fruitful in them. The same antagonism between regulars and volunteers cropped out in the Chief Joseph uprising of 1877. That between General

Wool with some of the officers who echoed his opinions, the regulars, in short, on one side, and Governor Stevens, supported by the volunteers and the nearly united people of the Territory on the other, was peculiarly acrimonious. We insert the following extract from the report by Governor Stevens to the secretary of war:

When remonstrated with by Captain William McKay, in command of the company, to push forward to my assistance, when informed of the object for which the company was enlisted, and that if it was not pushed forward at once, or some other force was not sent, Governor Stevens and his party would be in the most imminent danger, the general replied that in his opinion the danger was greatly exaggerated; that probably Governor Stevens would be able to protect himself, but if he could not, then Governor Stevens could obtain an escort from General Harney.

What reply was that! A moiety of the Indians now in arms had defeated a detachment of one hundred United States regulars. Major Raines had placed on record his opinion that an insufficient force would be defeated by these Indians, and my party was supposed to number no more than twenty-five men. Yet Major General Wool very coolly says, "Governor Stevens can take care of himself." So, too, in the remark that I could obtain aid from General Harney. Did General

Wool know that the distance from Fort Benton to the supposed position of General Harney was greater than the distance from Fort Benton to The Dalles, and that to obtain aid from him would require not less than six months, and that an express to reach him must pass through the entire breadth of the Sioux? Such ignorance shows great incapacity and is inexcusable.

Mr. Secretary, Major General Wool, commanding the Pacific division, neglected and refused to send a force to the relief of myself and party when known to be in imminent danger, and believed by those who were less capable of judging, to be coming on to certain death, and this when he had at his command an efficient force of regular troops. He refused to sanction the agreement made between Governor Mason and Major Raines for troops to be sent to my assistance, and ordered them to disband. It was reserved for the Oregon troops to rescue us.

The only demonstration made by Major Raines resulted in showing his utter incapacity to command in the field. As has heretofore been said, his expedition against the Yakimas effected nothing but driving the Indians into the very country through which I must pass to reach the settlements.

I therefore prefer charges against General Wool. I accuse him of utter and signal incapacity, of criminal neglect of my safety. I ask for an investigation into the matter and for his removal from command.

CHAPTER VIII

INDIAN WARS OF THE 'FIFTIES—CONTINUED.

It was in the spring of 1850 that the first cloud arose foreshadowing the Rogue River war. That season a party of miners who had collected a considerable sum in gold dust in the California placers, were returning home. Reaching the Rogue river, they were encamped, at Rock Point. Here they were attacked by Indians and plundered of everything of value, including the bags of gold dust. It was to settle with these "rogues" that General Joseph Lane set out in May, (or June), to visit south Oregon. The party comprised fifteen white men and the same number of Klickitats under their chief, Quatley, the determined enemy of the Rogue river Indians. Quatley was not asked to fight, but to assist in the making of a treaty.

Arriving at Rogue river, Lane's party encamped, and he sent word to the principal chiefs that he had come to talk with them and, if possible, effect a treaty. Two chiefs, accompanied by about seventy-five warriors, responded. A circle was formed and Lane and the chiefs placed themselves in its center. But previous to the opening of the conference a second band of warriors, as large as the first, and fully armed with bows and arrows, made their appearance and began descending the neighboring hill upon the camp. Quatley was ordered by Lane to come inside the circle and stand, with two or three Indians, beside the head Rogue River chief. Then the new-comers, apparently hostiles—were commanded to lay down their arms and be seated. The council proceeded. To them was explained the occasion of this visit; they were reminded of their uniform conduct toward the white men; of their murders and robberies, and were given to understand emphatically, that white people were to be permitted to travel unmolested.

The Rogue River chief, at the conclusion of Lane's speech, addressed his people in loud tones; in response they raised the war-cry and made a threatening display of their arms. Seeing this, Lane directed Quatley to hold the head chief. The latter was now a prisoner and Quatley held a knife at his throat. The sullen warriors laid down their arms. Upon this prompt action on the part of Lane the captured chief had not counted. He then ordered his men to retire and not return for two days. A treaty was concluded and Lane gave the Indians slips of paper stating the fact and warning white men to do them no injury.

During the gold discoveries of 1850 in the Klamath valley, there was an hegira of Oregonians thither. Despite General Lane's treaty with Chief Jo, eternal vigilance was required to prevent hostile encounters with his tribe as well as with the Umpqua Valley tribes, south of the canyon. A young man named Dilley was treacherously murdered, some time in May, by two Rogue River Indians. Learning this thirty men of Shasta formed a company, headed by one Long, marched across the Siskiyou, and coming upon a band at the crossing of Rogue River, killed a sub-chief and one other Indian, took two warriors and two daughters of another chief prisoners, holding them as hostages for the delivery of the murderers of Dilley. The chief refused to give up the guilty parties. Moreover, he threatened to send a strong force to destroy Long's command, which remained at the crossing awaiting events. They were not, however, molested, but an alarm became general throughout the southern valleys, and a petition was forwarded to Governor Gaines from the settlers in the Umpqua for permission to recruit a company of volunteers to proceed against the Indians. Then the governor took the matter under consideration, but repaired in person to the scene of the reported hostilities.

June 1st Major Kearney began a march southward with two skeleton companies of artillerymen, to take charge of government property at Steilacoom, Astoria, Vancouver and The Dalles. Arriving at Yoncalla, he consulted with James Applegate, whom he prevailed upon to assist in the exploration of the country east of the canyon, in which they were engaged when the Indian war in Rogue River valley broke out. Of this episode in his "History of Oregon," Hubert Bancroft says:

Captain James Stuart came upon the Indians June 18th. They were prepared for battle. Dismounting his men, who in their haste left their sabres tied to their saddles, Stuart made a dash for the enemy. They met him with equal courage. A brief struggle took place in which eleven Indians were killed and several wounded. Stuart, himself, was matched against a powerful warrior, who had been struck more than once without meeting his death. As the captain approached the savage, though prostrate, let fly an arrow which pierced him through, lodging in his kidneys, of which wound he died the day after the battle. Captain Peck was, also, wounded severely, and one of his troop slightly. * * * While these events were in progress, both Gaines and Lane were on their way to the scene of action.

Early on the 25th the command moved back down the river to overtake the Indians who had escaped during the night, and crossing the river seven miles above the ferry found the trail leading up Sardine creek, which being followed brought them up with the fugitives, one of whom was killed, while the others scattered through the woods like a covey of quail in the grass. Two days were spent in pursuing and taking prisoners the women and children, the men escaping. On the 27th the army scoured the country from the Ferry to Table Rock, retiring in the evening to Camp Stuart, when the campaign was considered as closed.

At the first these Indians had been proudly defiant. It was the boast of Chief Jo that his thousand warriors could keep a thousand arrows in the air continuously. Their pride suffered a fall; they were humbled and humiliated. On the arrival of Gaines at Rogue River he found Kearney gone and the Indians scattered. Succeeding in an attempt to collect them in council, a treaty was effected, eleven head men of the Indians agreeing on terms of peace. By this treaty the Indians placed themselves under the jurisdiction and protection of the United States. They also agreed to restore all the property stolen at any time from white persons. Then their wives and children were given back to them.

In January, 1856, Governor Stevens returned to Olympia. On his arrival he found that the storm of war was in full blast from east to west. Many settlers had been murdered by the sound Indians, aided by the Yakimas. The disheartened pioneers were aroused by the governor, who was full of courage and resourceful; he set on foot measures for saving the territory; equipping an army of one thousand volunteers, organized forces of friendly Indians, issued scrip for meeting expenses and seized necessary stores and implements. The settlers were in need of seed to plant their crops; he dispatched Secretary Mason to Washington to acquaint the government with their plight and needs.

But in the midst of these benevolent efforts the Indians, by a sudden attack, seized Seattle and destroyed the most of it. The Washington volunteers were equipped, and the second regiment under the command of Colonel B. F. Shaw, started for Walla Walla. This was in the summer of 1856.

Meanwhile the Oregon volunteers had passed that dismal winter and spring at Walla Walla and vicinity. In the spring Colonel Kelly returned to Portland, leaving Colonel T. R. Cornelius in command. The detachment set forth from their camp on Mill Creek March 10th, and proceeded to the Yakima country, meeting and dispersing the Indians whom they there encountered and then, passing on to the Columbia, they returned to Oregon and disbanded.

There were still in the air Indian wars and rumors of Indians wars. Governor Curry, of Oregon, and Governor Stevens, of Washington Territory, were in entire harmony, believing alike in a vigorous prosecution of the war; but the United States regulars were entirely aloof from them in sympathy of aim or action. Of the battle of Grande Ronde, July 17, 1856, Colonel Shaw says, in part:

We arrived in the Grande Ronde valley on the evening of the 16th, and encamped on a branch of the Grande Ronde river in the timber, sending spies in advance who returned and reported no fresh signs. On the morning of the 17th, after proceeding about five miles, we ascended a knoll in the valley, from which we discovered dust rising along the timber of the river. I sent Major Maxon and Captain John forward to reconnoitre and returned to hurry up the command which was not far distant. * * * The whole command moved on quietly until within half a mile of the Indian village, when we discovered that the pack train had moved to the left, down the Grande Ronde river. At this moment a large body of warriors came forward singing and whooping, and one of them waving a white man's scalp on a pole. They desired a parley, and I sent Captain John ahead to hold it. As he approached the Indians cried out to each other, "shoot him," when he retreated to the command and I ordered the four companies to charge.

The design of the enemy evidently was to draw us into the brush along the river, where from our exposed position they would have the advantage, they no doubt having placed an ambush there. To avoid this I charged down the river toward the pack train.

Then occurred a sharp, running fight, and when Colonel Shaw's command gained the pack train, he found the guard and reserve camped on a small creek not far from the crossing, as he had previously ordered them to do. In the charge several of Colonel Shaw's men had been wounded. Here he learned that Major Maxon had crossed the river with a small party, was engaged with the enemy and needed assistance. Shaw dispatched assistance. They returned after dark and reported that they had not discovered the Major, but they brought in one of his men whom they had found in the brush. He stated that one of the Major's men had been killed and that the last he had seen of them they were fighting the Indians. Finally Major Maxon returned to the camp of Colonel Shaw. Continuing the latter says of this fight:

The whole command, officers and men, behaved well. The enemy was run on the gallop fifteen miles, and most of those who fell were shot with the revolver. It is impossible to state how many of the enemy were killed. Twenty-seven bodies were counted by one individual, and many others were known to have fallen and been left, but were so scattered about that it was impossible to get count of them. When to these we add those killed by Major Maxon's command on the other side of the river, we may safely conclude that at least forty of the enemy were slain and many went off wounded. When we left the valley there was not an Indian in it, and all the signs went to show that they had gone a great distance from it.

Space does not permit us to give minute details of the second great Walla Walla council, and this episode is really more closely identified with the history of Washington than it is with that of Oregon Territory. This council preceded the memorable defeat of Colonel E. J. Steptoe, in 1858. The issue of this council was, comparatively, null and void. Half the Nez Percés determined to stand by the treaty; the other half refused. All other tribes were hostile. Governor Stevens repeated the terms of peace alone possible: "They must throw aside their guns and submit to the justice and mercy of the government, but as they were invited under safe conduct they were safe in coming, safe in council and safe in going."

Governor Stevens naturally felt disappointed at the failure of his hopes, but having done all that man could do, he had no cause to reproach himself. Whatever impediments had fallen in his way were due to the position of General Wool and the officers who felt compelled to echo his opinions. It may be very properly said here that Wright and Stepto discovered their errors soon and modified their policy. Wool never did, and in the early part of 1857 he was relieved of his command, and was succeeded by General N. G. Clarke, who gave a "new deal" to the impatient pioneers of the Inland Empire.

In May, 1858, Colonel Stepto set out with two hundred cavalymen to the Spokane country. This was in the face of the fact that those powerful and independent Indians had warned troops to keep away, alleging that they were neutral, and would not allow either Yakimas or whites in their territory. Colonel Steptoe began to make egregious and incomprehensible blunders before he left Walla Walla. On account of the great weight of provisions and baggage a brilliant quartermaster conceived the idea of leaving behind the greater part of the ammunition, by way of lightening the load. As Joseph McEvoy expresses it, the force was beaten before it left Walla Walla. Suffice it to say that Steptoe suffered an ignominious defeat at the hands of the Indians, with the loss of several prominent officers.

THE BANNOCK AND PIUTE WAR OF 1878.

One of the most sensational episodes in the history of Oregon was its invasion in the summer of 1878 by the Bannocks and Piutes under the leadership of Chiefs Buffalo Horn and Egan. The causes underlying this invasion have been strangely overlooked. Gilbert, in his "Historic Sketches of Oregon," says:

Buffalo Horn was a celebrated warrior, who had the year before aided the government against Chief Joseph and his band of hostile Nez Percés. His reward for such services was not in keeping with his estimate of their value and importance. He saw Chief Joseph honored and made the recipient of presents and flattering attention, while the great Buffalo Horn was, practically, ignored. His philosophical mind at once led him to the conclusion that more favors could be wrung from the government by hostility than by fighting its battles.

With the exception of the Utes, the Bannocks are the meanest, most treacherous, most savage and most blood-thirsty of all the Indians west of the Missouri river. The Bannocks, with whom were many Shoshones, and all comprised under the general name of "Snake" Indians, were joined by a large number of Piutes, under the lead of Egan, their great war chief. They then numbered about five hundred warriors, women and children, swelling the force to about 2,000. Colonel Orlando Robbins, with a party of scouts and a portion of the first cavalry, under Colonel Bernard, overtook the Indians at Silver Creek, Idaho, and made such a fierce assault that the Indians were badly demoralized. In this engagement Colonel Robbins and Chief Egan had a personal duel, in which Egan was twice shot, his left arm being crippled and his well-known buckskin war-horse captured. Egan was dragged from the field by his young warriors, but the severe wounds received made Egan's subsequent capture on the Umatilla reservation comparatively easy.

The first definite information of the approach of the Indians was brought in by Major Narcisse A. Cornoyer on the second day of July. He reported that while out on the John Day river with a hunting party, he had struck the hostiles. The consternation attending this news can hardly be described. On horseback, in wagons and on foot the settlers hastened to the nearest town for protection. Pendleton, Heppner, Umatilla, Wallula, Weston, Milton and Walla Walla were crowded with refugees. Homes were abandoned so hastily that neither provisions nor extra clothing were provided. All settlements within reach of a warning voice were deserted in a day. Cattle and sheep men in the mountains were in a precarious situation. Many were killed before they could gain places of safety.

Pendleton was to receive the first assault. That the result would be its complete destruction and its outlying settlements was believed by many, while the most sanguine had but little confidence. Pendleton had not more than one hundred and fifty inhabitants, but with the refugees it probably totaled three hundred. In one of the several skirmishes before the Indians reached the Blue mountains, Buffalo Horn, the Bannock chief, had been killed, and the command of the allied forces of Snakes and Piutes devolved upon Egan. For so heavy a responsibility he was totally unfit, and was, also, greatly incapacitated by wounds. His army arrived in and had possession of Camas prairie on July 4th, and had he marched at once upon Pendleton he would have met no effective resistance; could have followed the Umatilla down to the Columbia, and in spite of the two or three armed steamers patrolling the river, made a successful crossing. But instead of striking a decisive blow and falling upon Pendleton before the troops from Vancouver and Walla Walla, and the volunteers from Weston, Milton and other points could concentrate, he frittered away the time in killing a few straggling sheep-herders and skirmishing with Captain Wilson's handful of thirty men which had met the Indians near Alba, and finding the enemy in force, had retreated to Pendleton.

At that time Pendleton consisted of about thirty or forty houses, mostly one-story shacks, scattered along Court and Main streets from the Golden Rule hotel to the Pendleton Savings Bank Building. The houses were in a sort of a quadrangle by no means compact. The first defense erected by the panic-stricken inhabitants was a row of wagons stretched across Main street from the Savings Bank building to where the Odd Fellows building now stands. Women and children were hustled into Byers' mill, and a number of men went there to guard them. Frank Vincent, a dentist, and brother of Dr. F. A. Vincent, recently mayor of Pendleton, was made captain of the company organized for the defense of the town. At Umatilla City similar precautions were taken. J. H. Kunzie was appointed assistant adjutant general by Governor Stephen F. Chadwick, who hurried there and made it his headquarters. That point was selected because it had the nearest telegraph office, and because supplies for troops and volunteers were landed there. Volunteers were organized and armed by Kunzie and the town was closely guarded. At that time it had a population of about one hundred and fifty. The stone warehouse of J. R. Foster & Company was fitted up for a fort. Like preparations were made at Heppner, Weston, Milton and other places which were supposed to be in danger.

So soon as Captain Wilson's company had straggled in from Camas prairie with the information that the hostiles were in force in that region and that some of their number and some sheep-herders had been killed another company was organized by Sheriff J. L. Sperry, which started July 5th for the front, with a company from Weston under Dr. W. W. Oglesby and another under M. Kirk. At Pilot Rock they received recruits and were then consolidated into a single command, constituted as follows: Captain, J. L. Sperry; lieutenants, M. Kirk, William M. Blakely; sergeants, William Lamar, T. S. Ferguson, J. C. Coleman, William Ellis, R. Eastland; privates, W. W. Oglesby, T. C. McKay, George Bishop, S. L. Lansdon, Andrew Sullivan, A. Scott, A. Acton, C. R. Henderson, B. E. Daugherty, J. H. Wilson, H. Rockfellow, B. L. Manning, F. D. Ferguson, M. P. Gerking, C. P. Woodward, F. Hannah, S. I. Gerking, G. W. Titsworth, S. W. Smith, J. M. Stone, H. H. Howell, W. M. Metzger, W. P. Grubb, W. L. Donaldson, J. L. Smith, S. Rothschild, R. F. Warren, J. W. Salisbury, H. A. Salisbury, Harrison Hale, L. Blanchard, J. B. Perkins, A. Crisfield, B. F. Ogle, C. C. Townsend, J. Frazier, W. R. Reed, Thomas Ogle, Joseph Ogle, "Doc" Odeer, Walter Harrison, George Graves, P. J. Ryan and A. R. Kellogg.

Marching from Pilot Rock for Camas prairie the next day they stopped at Wilson Springs for dinner. Here they were attacked in force by the Indians. At the first alarm thirteen of the volunteers sprang on their horses and struck out for Pendleton. Making a virtue of necessity the others tied their horses in a sheep corral and took refuge in a shed. Absolutely indefensible was this position, commanded, as it was, by surrounding hills and rocks. But during all the afternoon the remnant of this company made a stout resistance, but at last they began to suffer severely for water. One of the men refused to stand it, took a pail, and against the protestations of his comrades, left the shed, walked through the zone of Indian fire, filled his bucket and returned unscathed. The shed was riddled with bullets and a number of casualties resulted. William Lamar, a school teacher, who was engaged to be married to a daughter of Dr. W. C. McKay, was killed and S. I. Lansdon, A. Crisfield, afterward a prominent merchant of Pendleton, G. W. Titsworth, C. R. Henderson, Frank Hannah, Jacob Frazer, J. W. Salisbury and H. H. Howell were wounded, Salisbury twice and Hannah seven times. A horrible feature of the affair was the mutilation of the remains of Lamar. The Indians cut out his heart and roasted it over a slow fire, and it was found in this condition on the retreat of the Indians.

During the night the volunteers decided to abandon their position and endeavor to reach Pendleton. Loading the wounded on a wagon (it was a curious thing that all of them were shot in the leg), they started, the men being instructed to fall prostrate the instant a gun was fired. They were fired upon three times, however, and Harrison and Hale were shot dead. The rest of the company returned the fire, and after a few scattering shots the savages gave way.

Upon the arrival at Pendleton of the thirteen men who had fled from Willow Springs at the beginning of the action, Throckmorton instantly started to the relief of the party under Sheriff Sperry, and they met the retreating volunteers soon after daylight about four miles north of Pilot Rock. They were escorted back to Pendleton where they all arrived safely. And now the real defense of Pendleton began. Rifle pits were constructed, and manned by the regulars, and all the soldiers were supplied with plenty of ammunition. The women and children were concentrated in Byers' mill. At this stage of affairs James H. Turner, a lawyer, suggested the idea that the non-combatants in the mill were at the mercy of the Indians should the latter attempt to fire that building. Thereupon Lot Livermore, Turner and James A. Drake, who had seen service in the Civil war, organized a company of twelve men, who, under Drake, as captain, took possession of a fence east of the Byers' mill and held it.

Sunday, July 7th, Howard's forces coming from the east, united with Throckmorton's regulars at Pilot Rock, and the next morning assailed the Indian camp at the heads of Butter and Birch creeks. This combined force was much more than a match for the Indians and Egan's chances for victory were gone. According to Frank T. Gilbert:

The command moved in two columns, two companies of artillery, one of infantry and a few volunteers under Throckmorton, seven companies of cavalry and twenty of Robbins scouts, under Captain Bernard accompanied by General Howard in person. The Indians were encountered and driven with considerable loss from their strong positions, and finally fled in the direction of Grande Ronde valley.

Meanwhile events were happening along the Columbia. Governor Ferry hastened to Walla Walla on the 7th and raised a company of forty volunteers under Captain W. C. Painter, that proceeded to Wallula and embarked the next morning on the steamer Spokane under command of Major Kress.

Captain Wilkinson had the Northwest with twelve soldiers and twenty volunteers. These boats, armed with howitzers and Gatling guns, patrolled the river. This was the day that Howard drove the Indians back into the mountains, thus heading them off if they had any designs of crossing the river.

There were several hundred Indians that had never lived on the reservation and were considered non-treaty Indians. They belonged chiefly to the Umatilla and Walla Walla tribes, lived in the vicinity of Wallula and Umatilla and were known as Columbia River Indians. When Major Cornoyer gathered in the scattered bands, many of these refused to go, and were looked upon as sympathizing with the hostiles and were supposed to have joined them. The morning of the day Howard had his fight on Butter and Birch creeks a number of these attempted to cross the river with a quantity of stock. They were interrupted at three points by the Spokanes and, being fired upon, several Indians and a few horses were wounded and killed. All canoes from Celilo to Wallula were destroyed. Captain Wilkinson on the Northwest fired into a small party in the act of crossing a few miles above Umatilla. Two braves and a squaw were killed.

The death of State Senator C. L. Jewell was ascribed to Columbians by many. He had a large band of sheep on Camas prairie, and went there with Morrissey to look after them. They encountered a number of Indians, but succeeded in eluding them and reaching the herder's cabin in safety. Leaving Morrissey there he returned to Pendleton to secure arms for his men who had decided to remain and defend themselves. The morning of the 5th he left Pendleton with several needle guns, contrary to the advice of many friends. He was expected at the hut that night but did not come.

The 8th Morrissey started to see if he could be found. Near Nelson's he met Captain Frank Maddock with a company of volunteers from Heppner, who informed him that two men had been killed there. A search revealed the bodies of Nelson and N. Scully. Morrissey went around Nelson's house, when he saw a piece of shake sticking up in the road, upon which was written the information that Jewell was lying wounded in the brush. Morrissey called out, "Charlie!" He received a faint response, and the injured man was found with a severe wound in his left side and his left arm broken.

When Jewell had approached Nelson's place on the night of the 5th he had been fired upon and fell from his horse; but while the Indians were killing those at the house, he had crawled into the bushes. In the morning he worked his way out into the road, wrote his notice on the shake, and crawled back again. For three days he had lain there without food and unable to help himself, when he was found by Morrissey. He was conveyed to Pendleton and carefully nursed, but died the next Friday.

Meanwhile all was confusion at Pendleton and the agency. The citizens were suspicious of the reservation Indians, fearing they intended to unite with the hostiles. Consequently volunteers would not go to the agency to defend it. Forty families of Columbians slipped out and went to the enemy's camp, and a few young Umatillas started off without permission, probably with a similar intention.

Two of these saw George Coggan, Fred Foster and Al Bunker coming down from Cayuse station on a course that took them in dangerous proximity to the hostiles. They rode toward the men with the intention of warning them, so they said afterward, and at the same time a third Indian rode up from another direction. The men had seen some deserted wagons a few miles back, where Olney J. P. McCoy, Charles McLaughlin, Thomas Smith and James Myers had been killed. They had also passed a band of Columbians on their way to the hostile camp.

When they saw the Indians dashing toward them from different directions they supposed them to be the ones they had passed, and concluding that their time had come, began firing upon them. The Umatillas suddenly changed their pacific intentions and commenced shooting. Coggan was killed and Bunker wounded. Foster who had every reason to believe that he was assailed by at least a score of savages, took the wounded man upon his horse and carried him two miles when Bunker could go no farther. Foster was then compelled to leave him, and hastened to Pendleton, where his arrival created a panic. Besides killing the teamsters, the Indians burned Cayuse station that day.

At this time news was received that Colonel Miles had been informed of Egan's movements, and had determined to take the responsibility of marching to the agency for his protection. To the exertions of Major Cornoyer and those accompanying him that night is due the fact that Colonel Miles arrived in time to defend the agency and avert the evils that would have followed its capture, including the murder of many people, and a possible union of reservation Indians with the hostiles.

The troops, upon reaching their destination, proceeded at once to eat breakfast, but before they were through the Snakes, Bannocks and Piutes, four hundred strong, were seen riding down from their camp. A line was quickly formed across the flat, and up the hill, and before the soldiers were all in position the Indians began to fire upon them. Nearly all day a battle was maintained with the soldiers lying in holes they had scooped in the ground to protect themselves.

Finally Miles decided to charge his assailants, although he had but one company of cavalry and would not be able to pursue them. The Cayuses requested permission to join in the fight, and were allowed to do so on condition that they would keep with the soldiers and not get in advance of them. The command to charge was given, and the soldiers sprang from their rifle pits and rushed upon the enemy, vieing with their Cayuse allies in the onslaught. The hostiles, fleeing to the mountains, returned no more, and that night found them eighteen miles from the agency, after having finished the destruction of Cayuse station by burning the barn, and the soldiers returned and went into camp. There were no casualties on the side of the troops and the volunteers.

Before the fight Umapine started out to do a little work on his own account. His father had been killed years before by Egan, who was in command of the hostiles, and he wanted revenge. When the battle was over he told Egan the Cayuses would join him, and persuaded the chief to accompany him the next night to a point twelve miles from the agency to meet the Cayuse chiefs and arrange matters. He then sent word to Major Cornoyer to have forty soldiers stationed at the appointed place to capture or kill Egan when he appeared.

Colonel Miles held the same opinion of Umapine's loyalty that the citizens did, and refused to send soldiers on such an errand. The Cayuses expressed their disappointment to the agent and complained of these suspicions. He told them the best way to convince the whites of their loyalty was to go out themselves and capture Egan.

On this suggestion Hom-e-li, chief of the Walla Wallas, and Peo, sub-chief of the Umatillas, acted. Forty young braves were selected and they repaired to the rendezvous between Meacham and Cayuse station. Umapine and Five Crows went to Egan's camp, and requested his presence at a conference. Into this trap Egan walked. All were mounted. Arriving in the vicinity of the proposed rendezvous Egan became suspicious, leaped from his horse and closed with Five Crows. Then ensued a struggle; but Egan was a cripple from his wounds; he soon fell, stabbed to the heart by Five Crows. The latter deliberately scalped his dead enemy, and as one of Egan's sub-chiefs started to ride away, shot him and added his scalp to his collection.

Flushed with victory the Umatillas returned. A triumphal procession of all Indians on the reservation was formed and passed in review before the troops drawn up in line by General Wheaton, that officer having arrived from Walla Walla and taken command. Ya-tin-i-ow-its was chief of the Cayuses, and bearing the scalp of Egan on a pole, arrived in front of the commanding officer, and pointing to his bloody trophy said: "Egan, Egan, we give you." "No, no, keep it, you brave man!" exclaimed the disgusted officer.

Defeat on the reservation, death of their leader, return of the cavalry and knowledge that the Columbia river could not be crossed, so disheartened the hostiles that they began to break up and return to their own country. Chief Hom-e-li with eighty picked warriors of the Umatillas, Cayuses and Walla Wallas joined the troops in pursuit and kept them constantly on the move. Hom-e-li reached their front the 17th, on Camas creek, and when the retreating bands came along, charged into their midst and killed thirty of them without losing a man. He, also, captured twenty-seven women and children, and a number of horses.

From this time the seat of war was removed from Umatilla county. The hostiles retreated to the Blue mountains. Howard, with ten small columns, pursued them energetically, overtook them and finally cornered them in Harney county, forced their surrender and marched them across from Harney to Yakima. The 18th of July Governor Chadwick addressed a letter to Sheriff Sperry instructing him to arrest all Indians guilty of murder or robbery, to be tried by civil authorities. This was a matter of great difficulty owing to lack of witnesses. By appointment a great council was held on the reservation August 26th, at which General Howard, Governor Chadwick and others were present. The chiefs were made to understand that the only way to clear themselves and their tribes from blame was to surrender all that had been guilty of wrongful acts, and hostages were taken to insure their doing so. Some of the Columbia river Indians were arrested, but were afterward released for want of evidence.

At last by the persistent investigation of Major Cornoyer, the murderers of George Cogger were discovered. Four young Umatillas were arrested. One of them gave evidence at the trial in November and was discharged. White

Owl, Qupit-a-Tumps and Aps were convicted and sentenced to be hanged. The first two were executed in the jail-yard at Pendleton, January 10, 1879, a company of cavalry and one of militia being present as a guard. A week later Aps was hanged at the same place.

CHAPTER IX

OREGON: PHYSICAL FEATURES AND EVOLUTION.

The most northwesterly state in the union, previous to the admission of Washington, was Oregon. It is bounded on the south by Nevada and California; on the east by Idaho; on the north by Washington and on the west by the Pacific ocean. From east to west the average width of the state is 350 miles; north and south, 275 miles. Its area is 96,030 square miles, or 61,459,200 acres. It is as large as all of the New England states with Indiana added, and greater in extent than New York and Pennsylvania combined. The census of 1900 accredited Oregon with a population of 413,536; the secretary of the Exposition Board of 1905 claimed the population of the state, by counties, in 1903, to have been 595,700. It is situated between the parallels of 42 degrees and 46 degrees, 18 minutes, north latitude; the climate and physical characteristics are not unlike those of Virginia or Tennessee.

Into two unequal parts the state is divided by the Cascade mountains. In topography, soil and climate these two parts widely differ from each other. Along its western border the Coast Range also traverses it from north to south, while along its eastern boundary the Blue Mountain range, with its various spurs, covers probably a fifth of the total area of the state. Other lesser ranges, generally spurs of those named, jut into the intermediate regions, lending to the entire country an extraordinary diversity of feature.

The western division is about one-fourth of the state, but it contains at least one-half of the arable land, including the matchless valley of the Willamette, which is one hundred and forty by fifty miles in extent. Scarcely less important than the Willamette valley is the coast district of Western Oregon, which borders the ocean for about one hundred and fifty miles. Between these arable districts lie broad ranges of forest, affording a supply of timber practically inexhaustible. No country in the world is more bountifully watered than western Oregon. It is a land of rivers. Clear and pure water gushes from every hillside, and it is rare that a square mile is found through which a crystal stream does not flow.

What is called southern Oregon includes about one-fifth of the superficial area of the state. A small portion of this, lying next to the ocean, has physical characteristics and climate similar to western Oregon, while the remainder, compassed about with mountains, and being more elevated has a climate of its own, dryer than western Oregon, yet not so dry as the climate of eastern Oregon. In summer these districts lie under a warmer sun than their northerly neighbors. Eastern Oregon is a general designation given to all that part of the state east of the Cascade mountains, excepting the much smaller southern portion last above described. This division embraces two-thirds of the area of the state. In its general characteristics this region may be described as high and dry, warm in summer, cool in winter, rich in soil and fairly well supplied with timber. In a country so vast there are many local variations from this general statement. The average elevation of eastern Oregon is about 2,500 feet. The southwestern portion of this section, notably all that lying south of Malheur river, is so dry that it requires irrigation for the maturing of almost all crops. The northern central portion of this eastern Oregon country is much broken by minor ranges of mountains, which afford fine pasturage; and here and there are narrow valleys unsurpassed for fertility. The southern central section is known as the Harney Lake region, which has long been celebrated as one of the main grazing regions of the state. This may be described as a vast, rolling table land, interspersed with valleys of considerable extent, which are natural meadows of luxuriant and nutritious grasses.

RIVERS, WATERCOURSES AND SPRINGS.

For the number, size and economical distribution of its watercourses Oregon has, probably, no equal in the union. With the greatest rivers in the world ranks the Columbia. From its birth, among the most magnificent scenes of the earth, in the far north, and in the heart of the Yellowstone National Park, down through its 2,500 miles of irresistible sweep to the western sea, it is an avenue of wealth and wonder. Inland, for three hundred miles from the Pacific, it averages about two miles in breadth, reaching over six miles near its mouth. Engineers estimate that it carries off a volume of water but little, if any less than does the Mississippi. Its immense drainage of 395,000 square miles may be imagined from the fact that during the melting of the snows in the northwestern mountain ranges, its daily increase, for days at a time, has been equal to the entire volume of the Hudson. The Willamette river is next in size and may be navigated by the largest ocean steamships and sailing vessels so far as Portland, 112 miles from the sea, and by river steamers a distance of 138 miles beyond. It gathers up the waters of forty-two streams, some of which are navigable for light-draft steamers. The Snake river is next in importance, being, in fact, the main fork of the Columbia. It has been navigated by light draft steamers to a point within 125 miles of Salt Lake City, almost under the shadows of the Wahsatch range.

Among other navigable streams are Rogue river and Umpqua river in southwestern Oregon. Flowing from south to north in central Oregon and emptying into the Columbia are the Des Chutes and John Day rivers, each about three hundred miles long. In southeastern Oregon are the Owyhee and Malheur rivers, the former rising five hundred miles southward, in Nevada, and emptying into the Snake where the latter stream strikes the eastern Oregon boundary line. In northeastern Oregon are the Powder, Grande Ronde and Umatilla rivers, all swift, strong streams, watering large areas of fertile valley lands.

There are several commodious harbors for vessels of light draft on the coast line, exclusive of those found at the mouths of the several rivers. At these places a thriving business is carried on in lumbering, coal mining, fishing, oystering, dairying and agricultural products.

CLIMATOLOGY AND HEALTHFULNESS.

Each of the three natural divisions of Oregon has a climate peculiar to itself. That of western Oregon is mild and equable. The average spring temperature is 52 degrees; summer, 67 degrees; autumn, 53 degrees; or an average of 52.75 degrees for the whole year. The mercury seldom rises above 90 degrees in the hottest days in the summer, and rarely falls below 20 degrees in the winter; so that out-door labor may be performed at all times of the year, and at all hours of the day. Considering the mercury's limited range during the four seasons, and the other conditions peculiar to the locality, a year would be more properly divided into two seasons—the wet and dry, the former lasting from the middle of November until May, during which period the rainfall is copious and regular, insuring certain crops and good pasture. In the Willamette valley the annual rainfall is forty-four inches—about the same as at Davenport, Memphis and Philadelphia, while in all other valleys it is sufficient to prevent any drouth. The rain never comes in torrents, but gently and without atmospheric disturbance. Thunder storms are rare.

EVOLUTION OF GOVERNMENT.

So early as 1838 some of the functions of government were exercised by members of the Methodist mission in "Oregon." Persons were chosen by that body to officiate as magistrates and judges and their findings were generally acquiesced in by persons independent of the Hudson's Bay Company because of the unorganized condition of the community, though there was, doubtless, a strong sentiment among the independent settlers in favor of trusting to the general morality and disposition to do right rather than to any political organization. The most important act of the mission officers was the trial of T. J. Hubbard for the killing of a man who attempted to enter his house at night with criminal and burglarious intent. Rev. David Leslie presided as judge during this noteworthy judicial proceeding, which resulted in the acquittal of the defendant on the ground that the act was justifiable. A petition was drafted in 1840, signed by David Leslie and others, and forwarded to Congress. It is not entirely free from misstatements and inaccuracies, but is nevertheless an able and important state paper. It reads as follows:

To the Honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled:

Your petitioners represent to your honorable bodies that they are residents in the Oregon Territory, and citizens of the United States, or persons desirous of becoming such.

They further represent to your honorable bodies that they have settled themselves in said territory under the belief that it was a portion of the public domain of said states, and that they might rely upon the government thereof for the blessings of free institutions and the protection of its arms.

But your petitioners further represent that they are uninformed of any acts of said government by which its institutions and protection are extended to them; in consequence whereof, themselves and families are exposed to be destroyed by the savages around them, and OTHERS THAT WOULD DO THEM HARM.

And your petitioners would further represent that they have no means of protecting their own and the lives of their families, other than self-constituted tribunals, originated and sustained by the power of an ill-constructed public opinion, and the resort to force and arms. And your petitioners represent these means of safety to be an insufficient safe-guard of life and property, and that the crimes of theft, murder, infanticide, etc., are increasing among them to an alarming extent; and your petitioners declare themselves unable to arrest this progress of crime and its terrible consequences without the aid of the law and tribunals to administer it.

Your petitioners therefore pray the Congress of the United States of America to establish, so soon as may be, a Territorial government in the Oregon Territory. And if reasons other than those above presented were needed to induce your honorable bodies to grant the prayer of the undersigned, your petitioners, they would be found in the value of this territory to the nation, and the alarming circumstances that portend its loss.

Your petitioners, in view of these last considerations, would represent that the English government has had a surveying squadron on the Oregon coast for the last two years, employed in making accurate surveys of all its rivers, bays and harbors; and that, recently, the said government is said to have made a grant to the Hudson's Bay Company of all lands lying between the Columbia river and Puget Sound; and that said company is actually exercising unequivocal acts of ownership over said lands thus granted, and opening extensive farms upon the same.

And your petitioners represent that these circumstances, connected with other acts of said company to the same effect, and their declarations that the English government own and will hold, as its own soil, that portion of Oregon Territory situated north of the Columbia river, together with the important fact that the said company are cutting and sawing into lumber, and shipping to foreign ports, vast quantities of the finest pine trees upon the navigable waters of the Columbia, have led your petitioners to apprehend that the English government do intend, at all events, to hold that portion of this territory lying north of the Columbia river.

And your petitioners represent that the said territory, north of the Columbia, is an invaluable possession to the American Union; that in and about Puget Sound are the only harbors of easy access, and commodious and safe, upon the whole coast of the territory; and that a great part of this said northern portion of the Oregon Territory is rich in timber, water-power and valuable minerals. For these and other reasons your petitioners pray that Congress will establish its sovereignty over said territory.

Your petitioners would further represent that the country south of the Columbia river, and north of the Mexican line, and extending from the Pacific ocean to one hundred and twenty miles into the interior, is of unqualified beauty and fertility. Its mountains, covered with perpetual snow, pouring into the prairies around their bases transparent streams of the purest water; the white and black oak, pine, cedar and fir forests that divide the prairies into sections convenient for farming purposes; the rich mines of coal in its hills; the salt springs in its valleys; its quarries of limestone, sandstone, chalk and marble; the salmon of its rivers, and the various blessings of the delightful and healthful climate, are known to us, and impress your petitioners with the belief that this is one of the most favored portions of the globe.

Indeed the deserts of the interior have their wealth of pasturage, and their lakes, evaporating in summer, leave in their basins hundreds of bushels of the purest soda. Many other circumstances could be named, showing the importance of the territory in a national, commercial and agricultural point of view. And although your petitioners would not under value considerations of this kind, yet they beg leave especially to call the attention of Congress to their own condition as an infant colony, without military force or civil institutions to protect their lives and property and children, sanctuaries and tombs, from the hands of uncivilized and merciless savages around them. We respectfully ask for the civil institutions of the American Republic. We pray for the high privilege of American citizenship; the peaceful enjoyment of life; the right of acquiring, possessing and using property; and the universal, unrestrained pursuit of rational happiness. And for this your petitioners will ever pray.

DAVID LESLIE (and others.)

This petition will be found in the Senate Document, Twenty-sixth Congress, No. 514. Inasmuch as the population of Oregon, including children, did not exceed two hundred at this time, the prayer of the petitioners, it need hardly be said, was not granted. But it must not be supposed that the document was therefore without effect. It did its part toward opening the eyes of the people of the east and of congress to the importance and value of Oregon and toward directing public attention to the domain west of the Rocky mountains. Notwithstanding the paucity of the white people of Oregon, the various motives which impelled them thither had divided them into four classes, the Hudson's Bay Company, the Catholic clergy and their following, the Methodist missions, and the settlers. The Catholics and the Company were, practically, a unit politically. The settlers favored the missions only in so far as they served the purpose of helping to settle the country, caring little about their religious influence and opposing their ambitions.

The would-be organizers of a government found their opportunity in the conditions presented by the death of Ewing Young. This audacious pioneer left considerable property and no legal representatives, and the question was what should be done with his belongings. Had he been a Hudson's Bay man or a Catholic, the company or the church would have taken care of his property. Had he been a missionary his coadjutors might have administered, but being a plain American citizen there was no functionary possessed of even a colorable right to exercise jurisdiction over his estate. In the face of this emergency, the occasion of Young's funeral, which occurred February 17th, was seized upon for attempting the organization of some kind of a government. At an impromptu meeting it was decided that a committee should perform the legislative functions and that the other officers of the new government should be a governor, a supreme judge with probate jurisdiction, three justices of the peace, three constables, three road commissioners, an attorney general, a clerk of the court and public recorder, a treasurer and two overseers of the poor. Nominations were made for all these offices and the meeting adjourned until next day, when it was hoped a large representation of the citizens of the valley would assemble at the mission house.

The time specified saw the various factions in full force at the place of meeting. A legislative committee was appointed as follows: Revs. F. N. Blanchet, Jason Lee, Gustavus Hines and Josiah L. Parish, also Messrs. D. Donpierre, M. Charlevo, Robert Moore, E. Lucier and William Johnson. No governor was chosen; the Methodists secured the judgeship and the Catholics the clerk and recorder. Had the friends of the organization been more fortunate in their choice of a chairman of the legislative committee the result of the movement might have been different, but Rev. Blanchet never called a meeting of his committee and the people who assembled on June 1st to hear and vote upon proposed laws discovered that their congregating had been in vain. Blanchet resigned. Dr. Bailey was chosen to fill the vacancy and the meeting adjourned until October. First, however, it ordered the committee to confer with Commodore Wilkes of the American squadron and John McLoughlin, chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, with regard to forming a constitution and code of laws. Wilkes considered it unnecessary and impolitic to organize a government at that time, giving as his reasons:

First—On account of their want of right, as those wishing for laws were, in fact, a small minority of the settlers.

Second—That these were not yet necessary even by their own account.

Third—That any laws they might establish would be a poor substitute for the moral code they all now followed, and that evil doers would not be disposed to settle near a community entirely opposed to their practices.

Fourth—The great difficulty they would have in enforcing any laws, and defining the limits over which they had control, and the discord this might occasion in their small community.

Fifth—That not being the majority, and the larger portion of the population Catholics, the latter would elect officers of their party, and they would thus place themselves entirely under the control of others.

Sixth—The unfavorable impressions it would produce at home, from the belief that the missionaries had admitted that in a community brought together by themselves they had not enough of moral force to control it and prevent crime, and therefore must have recourse to a criminal code.

The friends of the movement could not deny the cogency of this reasoning, and it appears they concluded to let the matter drop. The October meeting was never held and thus the first attempt at forming a government was brought to an unsuccessful conclusion. However, the judge elected made a satisfactory disposition of the Young estate.

But the question of forming an independent or provisional government continued to agitate the public mind. During the winter of 1842-3 a lyceum was organized as Williamette Falls, now Oregon City, at which the propriety of taking steps in that direction was warmly debated. One evening the subject for discussion was, "Resolved, That it is expedient for the settlers on this coast to establish an independent government." McLoughlin favored the resolution and is carried. Mr. Abernethy, defeated in this debate, skillfully saved the day by introducing as the topic of the next discussion, "Resolved, That if the United States extends its jurisdiction over this country within four years, it will not be expedient to form an independent government." This resolution was also carried after a spirited discussion, destroying the effect of the first resolution.

Meanwhile the settlers in the vicinity of the Oregon Institute were skillfully working out a plan whereby a provisional government might be formed. They knew the sentiment of their conferees at the Falls, the result of the deliberations at that place having been reported to them by Mr. Le Breton; they knew also that their designs would meet with opposition from both the Hudson's Bay Company and the mission people. The problem to be solved was how to accomplish their ends without stirring up an opposition which would overwhelm them at the very outset. Their solution of this problem is a lasting testimony to their astuteness and finesse.

As a result of the formation of the Willamette Cattle Company and its success in importing stock from California, almost every settler was the owner of at least a few head, and, of course, the Hudson's Bay Company and the missions also had their herds. The fact that wolves, bears and panthers were destructive to the cattle of all alike furnished one bond of common interest uniting the diverse population of Oregon, and this circumstance furnished one bond of common interest uniting the diverse population of Oregon, and this circumstance furnished the conspirators their opportunity. Their idea was that having got an object before the people upon which all could unite, they might advance from the ostensible object, protection for domestic animals to the more important, though hidden object, "preservation both for property and person." The "wolf meeting," as it is called, convened on the 2d of February, 1843, and was fully attended. It was feared that Dr. I. L. Babcock, the chairman, might suspect the main object, but in this instance he was even less astute than some others. The utmost harmony prevailed. It was moved that a committee of six should be appointed by the chair to devise a plan and report at a future meeting, to convene, it was decided, on the first Monday in March next, at 10 o'clock a. m.

After the meeting pursuant to adjournment had completed its business by organizing a campaign against wolves, bears and panthers, and adopting rules and regulations for the government of all in their united warfare upon pests, one gentleman arose and addressed the assembly, complimenting it upon the justice and propriety of the action taken for the protection of domestic animals, but, "How is it, fellow citizens," said he, "with you and me and our children and wives? Have we any organization upon which we can rely for mutual protection? Is there any power or influence in the country sufficient to protect us and all we hold dear on earth from the worse than wild beats that threaten and occasionally destroy our cattle? Who in our midst is authorized at this moment to call us together to protect our own and the lives of our families? True, the alarm may be given, as in a recent case, and we may run who feel alarmed, and shoot off our guns, whilst our enemy may be robbing our property, ravishing our wives and burning the houses over our defenseless families. Common sense, prudence and justice to ourselves demand that we act consistent with the principles we have commenced. We have mutually and unitedly agreed to defend and protect our cattle and domestic animals; now, fellow citizens, I submit and move the adoption of the two following resolutions, that we may have protection for our persons and our lives, as well as our cattle and herds:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the propriety of taking measures for the civil and military protection of this colony.

"Resolved, That said committee consist of twelve persons."

If an oratorical effort is to be judged by the effect produced upon the audience, this one deserves a place among the world's masterpieces. The resolutions were carried unanimously. The committee appointed consisted of I. L. Babcock, Elijah White, James O'Neil, Robert Shortess, Robert Newell, Etienne Lucier, Joseph Gervais, Thomas Hubbard, C. McRoy, W. H. Gray, Sidney Smith and George Gay. Its first meeting was held before a month had elapsed, the place being Willamette Falls. Jason Lee and George Abertiehy appeared and argued against the movement as premature. When the office of governor was stricken from the list the committee unanimously decided to call another meeting on the ensuing 2d of May. W. H. Gray, in his "History of Oregon," describes this decisive occasion with such graphic power that it would be a great deprivation to the reader to fail to give it in his own language. He says:

The second of May, the day fixed by the committee of twelve to organize a settlers' government, was close at hand. The Indians had all learned that the "Bostons" were going to have a big meeting, and they also knew that the English and French were going to meet with them to oppose what the "Bostons" were going to do. The Hudson's Bay Company had drilled and trained their voters for the occasion, under Rev. F. N. Blanchet and his priests, and they were promptly on the ground in an open field near a small house, and, to the amusement of every American present, trained to vote "No" to every motion put; no matter if to carry their point they should have voted "Yes," it was "No." Le Breton had informed the committee and the Americans generally, that this would be the course pursued, according to instructions, hence our motions were made to test their knowledge of what they were doing, and we found just what we expected was the case. The priest was not prepared for our manner of meeting them, and as the record shows, considerable confusion was existing in consequence. By this time we had counted votes. Says Le Breton, "We can risk it; let us divide and count." "I second that motion," says Gray. "Who's for a divide?" sang out old Joe Meek, as he stepped out; "all for the report of the committee and an organization follow me."

This was so sudden and unexpected that the priest and his voters did not know what to do, but every American was soon in line. Le Breton and Gray passed the line and counted fifty-two Americans and but fifty French and Hudson's Bay men. They announced the count—fifty-two for, and fifty against. "Three cheers for our side!" sang out old Joe Meek. Not one of those old veteran mountain voices was lacking in that shout for liberty. They were given with a will, and in a few seconds the chairman, Judge I. L. Babcock, called the meeting to order, when the priest and his band slunk away into the corners of the fences, and in a short time mounted their horses and left.

After the withdrawal of the opponents of this measure the meeting became harmonious, of course. Its minutes show that A. E. Wilson was chosen supreme judge; G. W. Le Breton, clerk of the court and recorder; J. L. Meek, sheriff; W. H. Wilson, treasurer; Messrs. Hill, Shortess, Newell, Beers, Hubbard, Gray, O'Neil, Moore and Dougherty, legislative committee; and that constables, a major and captains were also chosen. The salary of the legislative committee was fixed at $1.25 per day, and it was instructed to prepare a code of laws to be submitted to the people at Champoege on the 5th day of July.

On the day preceding this date the anniversary of America's birth was duly celebrated, Rev. Gustavus Hines delivering the oration. Quite a number who had opposed organization at the previous meeting were present on the 5th and announced their determination to acquiesce in the acts of the majority and yield obedience to any government which might be formed, but representatives of the Hudson's Bay Company even went so far in their opposition as to address a letter to the leaders of the movement asserting their ability to defend both themselves and their political rights.

A review of the "Organic laws" adopted at this meeting would be interesting, but such is beyond the scope of our volume. Yet they were so liberal and just, so complete and comprehensive that it has been a source of surprise to students ever since that untrained mountaineers and settlers, without experience in legislative halls, could conceive a system so well adapted to the needs and conditions of the country. The preamble runs: "We, the people of Oregon Territory, for purposes of mutual protection, and to secure peace and prosperity among ourselves, agree to adopt the following laws and regulations, until such time as the United States of America extend their jurisdiction over us." The two weaknesses which were soonest felt, were the result of the opposition to the creation of the office of governor and to the levying of taxes. The former difficulty was overcome by substituting in 1844, a gubernatorial executive for the triumvirate which had theretofore discharged the executive functions, and the latter by raising the necessary funds by popular subscription. In 1844, also, a legislature was substituted for the legislative committee.

Inasmuch as the first election resulted favorable to some who owed allegiance to the British government as well as to others who were citizens of the United States, the oath of office was indited as follows: "I do solemnly swear that I will support the organic laws of the provisional government of Oregon so far as the said organic laws are consistent with my duties as a citizen of the United States, or a subject of Great Britain, and faithfully demean myself in office. So help me God."

Despite the opposition to the provisional government, the diverse peoples over whom it exercised authority, and the weakness in it resulting from the spirit of compromise of its authors, it continued to exist and discharge all the necessary functions of sovereignty until on August 14th, 1848, in answer to the numerous memorials and petitions and the urgent appeals of Messrs. Thornton and Meek, congress at last decided to give Oregon a territorial form of government with all the rights and privileges usually accorded to territories of the United States. Joseph Lane, of Indiana, whose subsequent career presents so many brilliant and so many sad chapters, was appointed Territorial Governor.

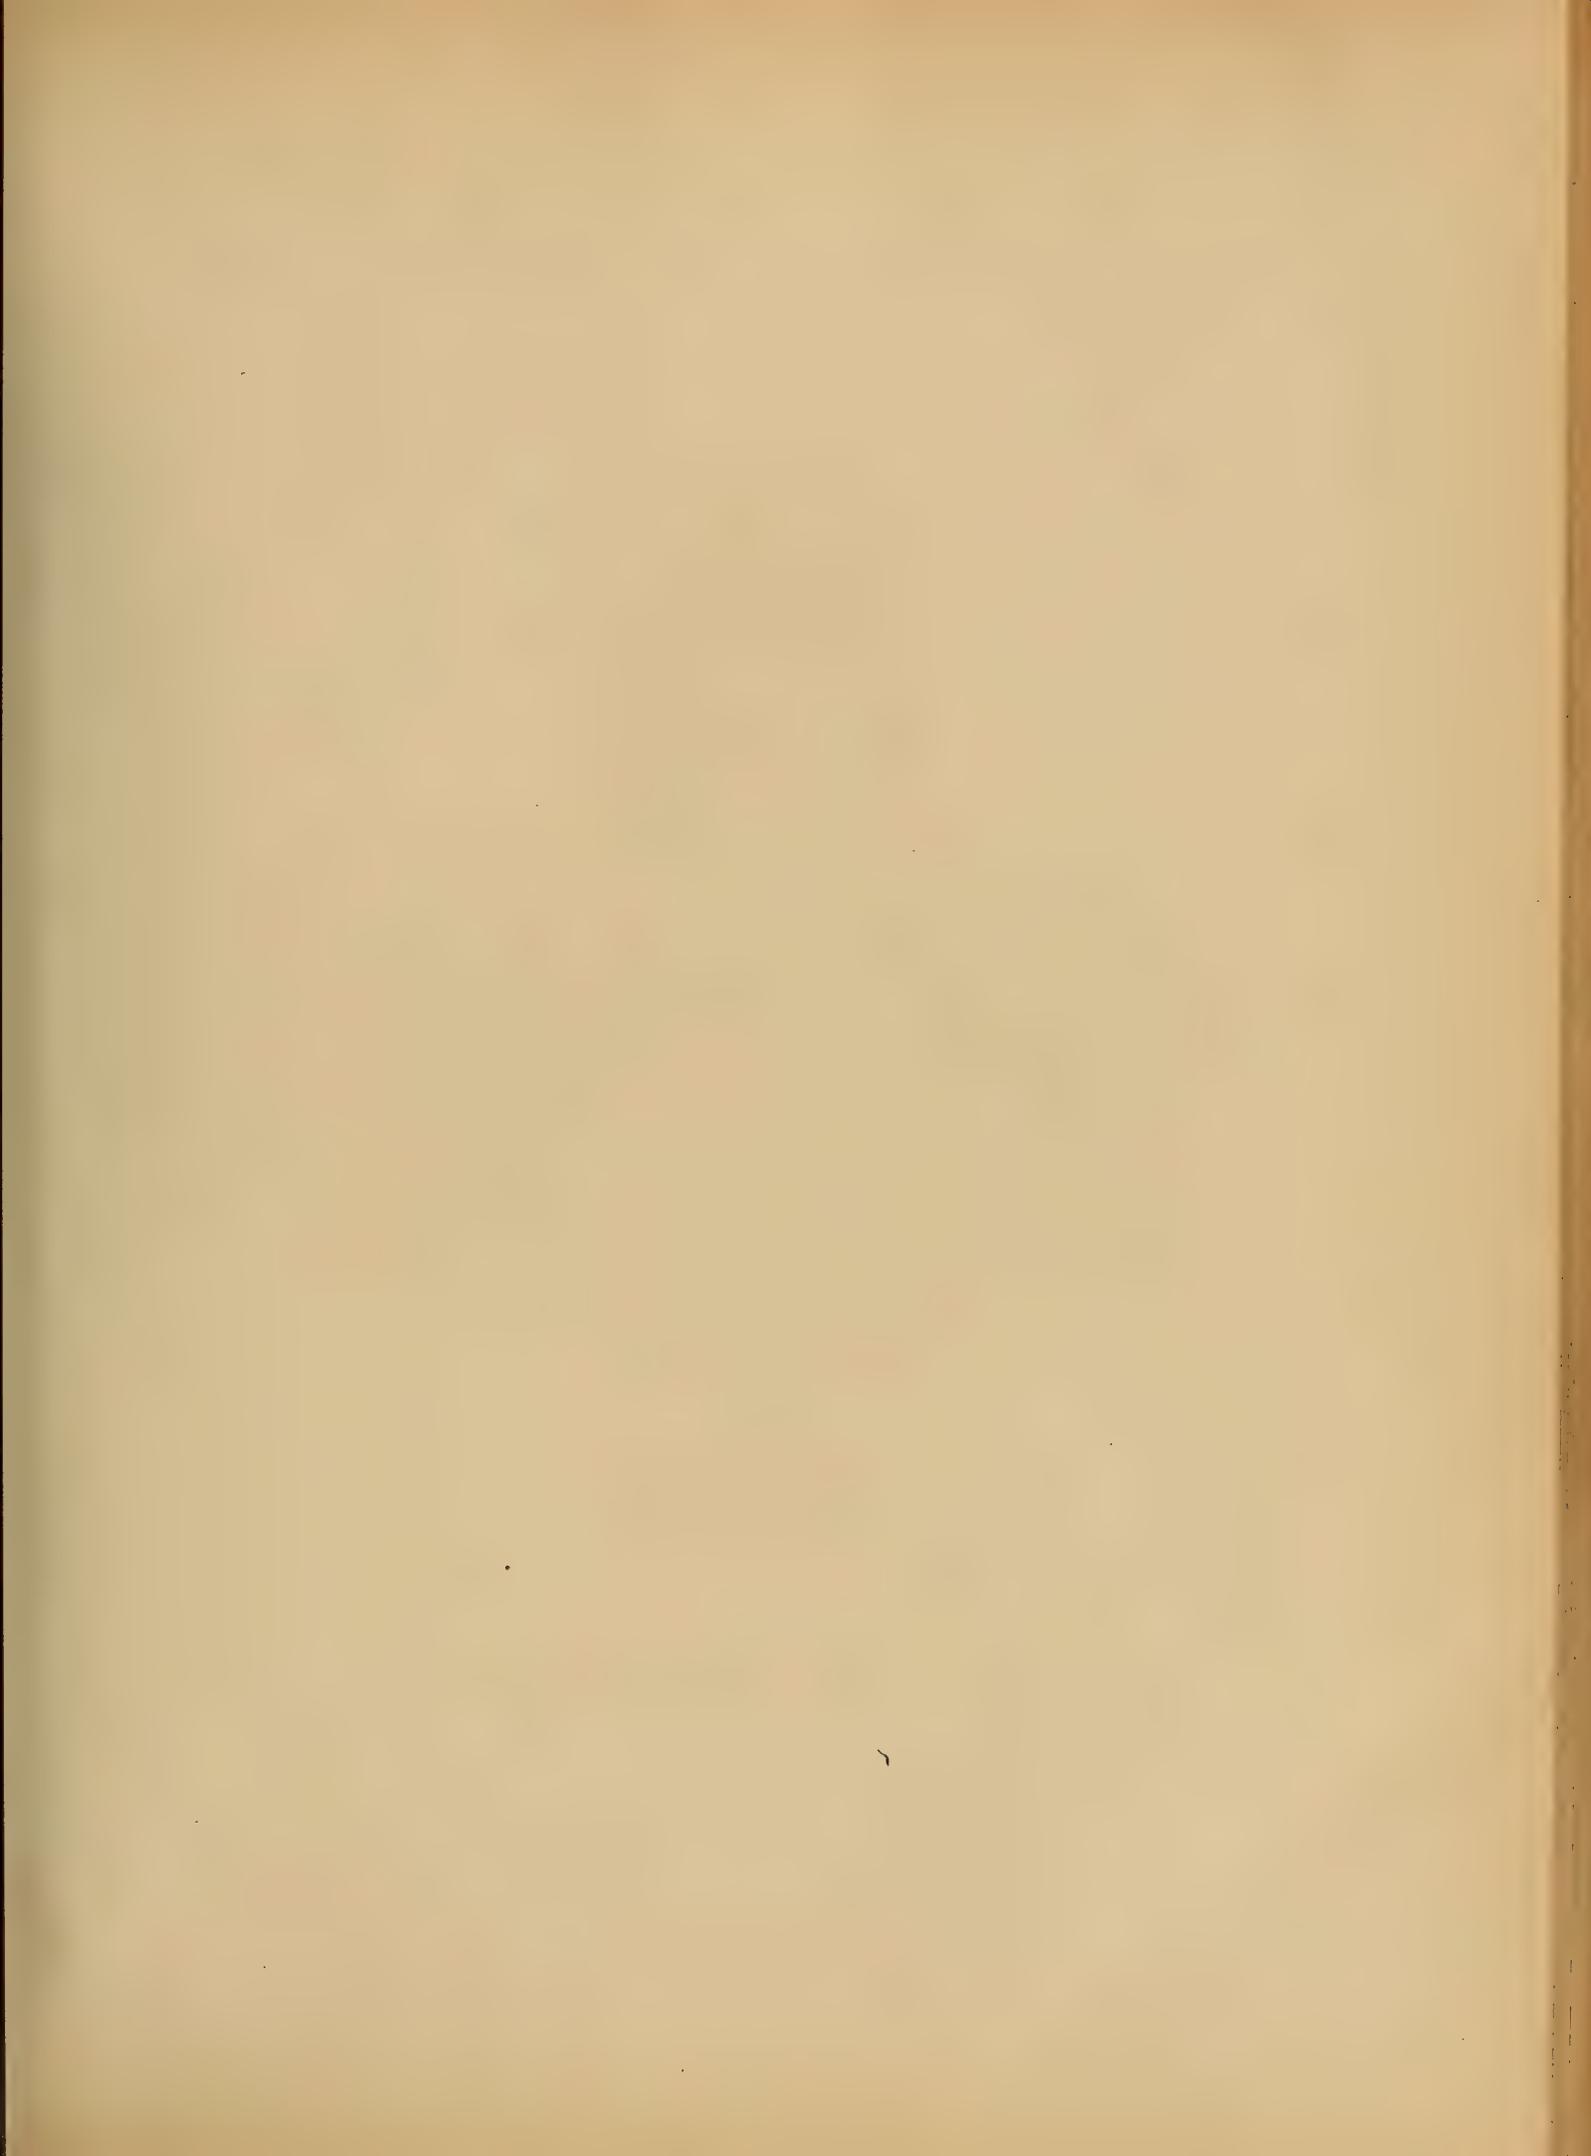

The limits and province of this work preclude further narration of the history of Oregon in general. By the act of March 3, 1853, the country north of the Columbia was organized into a separate territory, bearing the name of the great father of his country. At later dates the area of Oregon was further curtailed by the formation of Montana and Idaho territories, but in 1859, notwithstanding this curtailment, the country had so far advanced in population and general development that it was admitted to the union.

The provisional system had originally divided the territory governed by its provisions into three districts. The development and settlement of the country necessitated an increase in the number from time to time and soon the name county was substituted for district. When eastern Oregon became sufficiently populous to gain recognition in the councils of the state it was organized into Wasco county, with its seat of local government at The Dalles. The discovery of gold in eastern Oregon and Idaho soon populated the wilderness to such an extent that the inconvenience of this ponderous and unwieldy empire county began to be oppressive, and in 1862 two new counties, Umatilla and Baker, were organized. Later this was followed by the organization of other counties with which the rest of this history has to deal.

HISTORY OF WASCO COUNTY

TRADITIONAL, LEGENDARY AND AUTHENTIC.

In all the noble state of Oregon, with its thirty-three counties teeming with a variety of distinctively western industries, the echoes of the hum of sawmills and of threshers mingling in a symphony of prosperity, there is no county richer in historical records than Wasco. Despite successive curtailments of her once vast territory to form other political divisions of the state, Wasco still remains one of the larger counties, with a population of more than fifteen thousand. It is bounded on the north by the state of Washington, on the east by Sherman and Wheeler, on the west by Multnomah, Clackamas and Marion, and on the south by Crook, counties.

The original Wasco county was one of the earliest settled portions of the northwest, as it was one of the earliest formed counties in Oregon. It is so styled after the tribe of Indians of the same name which, in the early days, was one of the strongest numerically and otherwise of all the tribes then scattered along the Columbia river. Of these Indians the "Century Dictionary and Cyclopaedia" says:

"Wasco (Pl., also Wascos, Wascões), a collective name for the tribes of the Upper Chinook division of North American Indians nearest The Dalles. It may have been equivalent to, or inclusive of, the Watlala. There are 288 on the Warm Springs reservation, Oregon, and 150 on the Yakima reservation, Washington."

A literal translation of the word Wasco is a horn basin, and the name was conferred upon the tribe because of their ability displayed in the manufacture of rude basins. The following legend concerning the origin of the name is taken from an article descriptive of The Dalles published in the West Shore, from the pen of Mr. S. L. Brooks:

Wasco, like all our original names, has its peculiar origin. Tradition tells us that once upon a time a young man's wife died, leaving two bright, helpless little children, whose only care and succor was found in the love of their grief-stricken father; their continued cries for their forever departed mother caused the children's remaining parent to try all manner of means for the quieting of their grief; so one day he, with a heart full of sadness, while out with his little ones on a hillside for a walk, found a piece of an elk-horn, and with his flint knife cut the string from one of his moccasins and tied a broken flint to it, and after quenching his thirst at a beautiful spring of sparkling cold water (this spring is known as Wasco spring today), sat down beside it on a large rock and began pecking small holes in it, which so amused his loved ones he concluded to make three in a row, making the center one as large as a basin, which represented to them three alone in the world. His relatives, observing the devotion and attachment for these helpless ones, estranged themselves from him, as it was not in accord with their old traditions, and cut him off from their associations, which, with their barbarous habits, forced him to seek refuge away from the home of his childhood. So he took his skin robes, made them in a roll, tied up his war clubs and spears, and set his face with his little darlings toward the Shin-ni-na-klath—mountain of the setting sun—

“So he journeyed westward, westward,
Passed the mountains of the prairie
To the kingdom of the west wind,”

Where he found himself in a land he called Win-quatt, because the new home was walled in by high, rocky cliffs. This is the original which we now call “The Dalles.” Such was the origin from whence sprang into existence the once powerful tribe of Indians known today as the Wascos, signifying makers of basins, or more literally, “horn basins.” This, like all other tribes that have sounded the war whoop with its savage glory, have faded and are still fading, as the paleface makes the warpath the highway for the iron horse, and his hunting ground the source from which supplies are sent abroad to marts of the world to satisfy the wants of the millions.

Before entering upon the history of early explorers who visited what is now Wasco county, or of the pioneer settlers to the new country, we purpose to give a brief history of the Indians who inhabit the locality around The Dalles of the Columbia, their mode of living, physical resources, etc.

And yet there is certainly a history that is older than even the shadowy Indian legends and traditions. It has never been written; it may never be penned. And only dim suggestions dotting a wide field of speculation are found in the faint traces left by the ancient progenitors of those Indians found by the first settlers of Oregon. Such Indians who were then on the ground never possessed the skill, aptitude and intelligence necessary to perform such work as was required to shape the delicate and beautiful arrowheads and spear points; ornaments and ingenious implements fashioned in flint, obsidian, opal and carnelian; such as have been found amid drifting sands along the banks of the Columbia river, and are offered for sale in the streets of The Dalles by modern Indians who pick up the elaborate specimens of the ornate handicraft of their pre-historic ancestors. These are in design and workmanship not unlike those of the Aztecs of Mexico and Pueblos of Arizona. Paintings on the rock cliffs in the vicinity of The Dalles, and carvings and sculptures that have been discovered, all of unquestioned antiquity, exhibiting many Aztec characteristics, indicate that at some remote period the country was occupied by a race of people far superior, intellectually, and otherwise, to the Indian of today in his normal condition. Here is a wide and profitable field for the antiquarian. While his most patient researches will, probably, never reveal a satisfactory history of the peoples who at one period, aeons ago, inhabited the Columbia basin, much will doubtless be discovered that may shed light on their origin and fate. Such being the conditions confronting us, we must rest content in treating of those Indians whom the explorers and early missionaries and pioneer settlers found existing here in squalor and tribal decay in the dawn of the Nineteenth Century.

Dr. William C. McKay was an educated half-breed; a reliable writer and his words are authoritative in all that he has written concerning Indians. The following extract is from an article read by him before the Ladies' Aid Society of the Congregational church at The Dalles, Tuesday, May 18, 1869, and published in the Mountaineer on the 28th:

Long before the Indian had any knowledge of the white men this place (the present location of The Dalles), was called Win-quatt, signifying a place encircled or surrounded by a bold cliff of rocks. Within this circle there are many points which have significant names attached to them by the aborigines. The island now occupied by the Oregon Steam Navigation shops was called Ka-pooks. Tradition tells of a beautiful grove of iron-wood trees standing somewhere near the present site of the machine shop. It was a place much resorted to by the young folks and many tales are told respecting it. The mouth of Mill creek had the name of Will-look-it, meaning looking through an opening or gap. The mouth of Three-Mile creek was We-galth, signifying a place of danger. Tradition says the Snake Indians, inhabiting at that time Fifteen-Mile creek, Tygh valley and Des Chutes, often made raids on the Wascos here at Win-quatt and The Dalles fishery, by the way of Three Mile creek, by following it down to its mouth, and often bloody strife was the result.

The mouth of Five Mile creek was I-gal-li-matic. Tradition gives an account of a Wasco Indian being pursued by the Snakes—his hereditary enemies—and he, knowing of a pole lying across the gulf or canyon, and his only means of escape being to cross it, succeeded in walking over on the pole, hence the derivation of the name. The government, or Mission Springs, was called Amotan, meaning the Indian or wild hemp which grew in abundance at that place and was a staple article of trade. The garrison Point, Qua-qual-Chal means Squirrel Point. The spring at Logan's house, Gai-galt-whe-la-leth means Alone in Its Beauty. The mountain southeast of the Logan house, Shinni-na-kalth, means the mountain that tells of the sun's travel. The mountain back of Irvine's place, Molock Oaihut, means the Elk's trail. The rocky point west of Irvine's farm, Ethno-a-Chalk, signifies the vulture's rest. The Catholic mission, Tayas-whe-yam, means storm upon storm. Irvine's farm, or spring, Shelooks-thla-gipt, means the wolf spring. There is a long legend in connection with this place, but it is too long to be given here. Chenoweth creek, Thlemit, means caving, or constant washing away. The mountain back of Crait's, Kat-ka-Talth, means flint mountain. Crait's Point, Thle-yap-Kanoon, means fresh water muscles. Tradition tells of a certain time and season when there was a general turn out in fishing after the muscles, when a great feast and a good time in general was had. Three Mile creek, at Mr. Whitney's, Thle-gam-Yan, means beautiful prairie.

There is a cold, living spring at The Dalles, near the fishery called the Wasco Springs. The tradition tells of a young man's wife having died, and left him with two helpless children in his charge, who gave him much trouble and great anxiety. He would often try by all manner of means to quiet their cries, but to no avail. But at last he amused them by picking three holes in a rock, the largest one being in the center. These holes in the rock are still represented at the above mentioned spring. The father becoming dissatisfied with his relatives on account of their mistreating his children, he concluded to leave them and come down and settle at Win-quatt, which soon got to be a large village. The inhabitants were known as the Wasco people, signifying the makers of basins. The literal meaning of the word Wasco is a horn basin. Some of these can still be seen at their camps, fantastically carved with certain hieroglyphics.

There is a pond in the rocks near the fishery called Te-kai-kayots—the poleway pond. On the Washington Territory side the village of Wish-Kam, opposite The Dalles fishery, was called Nech-loi-deth—stationary people that never move. Rockville, Quallachin—the spotted rock. Opposite Crate's Point there used to be a large village called Kill-ka-hat. The Klickitat mountain, opposite here, Thle-ge-neuche-teche, signifies resembling persons looking or peeping over.

I have given the names of most of the prominent points, and still there are others which I would like to give if they could be procured at present. * * *

The Wasco tribe were the owners of this country, and the village of Win-quatt was their headquarters. They were considered by the early voyagers and traders as the most numerous and strongest of the bands living on the Columbia. They extended from The Dalles fishery down to the Wind mountains. Their influence with the other tribes was great; their place was the central point for all the adjacent tribes, who resorted here in the summer during the fishing seasons from all quarters for the purpose of trafficking, gambling and indulging in sports of various kinds. The Indians from the north and east brought for traffic horses, buffalo robes, pauerfleshes, furs of all descriptions, dressed skins of several qualities, ropes, dried buffalo meat, etc. The southern tribes brought Modoc, Pitt River, Chasty and California Indians—to sell as slaves—elk, deer, mountain sheep and antelope skins, dressed, dried meats, furs of all qualities, ropes, hemp, dried and prepared roots—such as looks, kouse, saweet, nonas, camas, peyahe, guiya, semame, itallo, and wocas—all very nutritious and part of their subsistence; all kinds of berries, such as mountain whortle, blue, savies, rasp, salal, salmon and straw; currents, cherries, etc., which will keep for a long time when properly dried. The western tribes—those from the Cascades and around Vancouver, Portland, Oregon City and Sauvil's island—brought prisoners from the coast, guns, ammunition, clothing, blankets, utensils, axes, knives, traps, fish-hooks, files, tobacco and whatever else they could procure from the fur traders at Vancouver. The tribes that congregated here yearly for trading purposes and sporting in general, such as gambling, foot-races, wrestling, horse races, etc., were the Klickitats, Wanchapams, Illdepiers, Okanogans, Spokanes, Colvilles, Palouses, Walla Wallas, Yakimas, Umatillas, Long Islands, Kamilth, Dockspurs, Winwawe, Teninos, Tilchines, Tyghs, Klamaths, Cayuses, Nez Perces, Coeur d'Alenes, Pend D'Oreilles and Flatheads from above. Those from below were the Cascades, Multnomahs, Thalawelas, Clackamas and Molalas. The Wascos gave in exchange, aside from what has been enumerated, dried and pounded salmon. I could still go on and give a long account of their mode of living and passing away, but my intention was merely to show what our town was in early days while under the supervision of the Indians.

There is at the present period abundant testimony that the Indians of the days of Oregon's first settlement availed themselves of every advantage which their location gave them, invariably making exorbitant demands and charges for all privileges granted or services rendered. Quite often they deliberately robbed weak and unprotected parties. When Lewis and Clark passed through the vicinity of Wasco county accompanied by a well-armed and disciplined force, they were unmolested; five years later the half-starved and worn out company headed by Wilson P. Hunt were treated by these same savages with insolence and cruelty. Of the Wascos Washington Irving has written: "These Indians were shrewder and more intelligent than other Indians. Trade had sharpened their wits, but had not improved their honesty, for they were a community of arrant rogues and freebooters."

One of the penalties of greatness is illustrated by the Indian nation on which has been conferred the name of "Flatheads." Among the Indians of the coast and the lower Columbia only such as are of noble birth are allowed to flatten their skulls. This is accomplished by placing an infant on a board corresponding to its length and breadth; the papoose being confined in a stout sack to hold its limbs and body in one position. The head is confined with strings and lashings, which permit hardly any motion of the head. From the top of the rack upon which the child is pinioned a small piece of board extends down nearly covering the eyes. To this strings are attached to prevent the forehead from extending beyond the eyes, giving the entire head and face a broad and flat shape. From three to four months, or longer, the native infants of the blood royal—those born in the purple—were retained in these presses to such an extent as the infants could bear, or the aspirations of the pagan parents prompt. In 1870 it was the testimony of W. H. Gray that "For the last fifteen years I have not seen a native infant promoted to these royal honors."

The narrative of the United States exploring expedition of 1841, in charge of Commander Charles Wilkes, furnishes a clear and concise account of such Indians as were then at the Cascades and The Dalles, their occupations, life methods, dress, etc., together with an excellent description of the country in their immediate vicinity. We present several excerpts from this report, published in 1845:

At the Cascades during the fishing season there are about three hundred Indians, only about one-tenth of whom are residents; they occupy three lodges; but there was formerly a large town here. Great quantities of fish are taken by them, and the manner of doing this resembles that at Willamette Falls. They also construct canals on a line parallel with the shore, with rocks and stones, for about fifty feet in length, through which the fish pass in order to avoid the strong current, and are here taken in great numbers. There are two portages here under the names of the "new" and the "old." At the first only half of the load is landed, and the boats are tracked for half a mile further, when the load is again shipped. The boats are then tracked to the old portage. A strong eddy occurs at this place, which runs in an opposite direction; and here it is necessary to land the whole of the cargo; after which the empty boats are again tracked three-quarters of a mile beyond.

To a stranger unacquainted with the navigation of this river the management of these boatmen becomes a source of wonder; for it is surprising how they can succeed in surmounting such rapids at all, as the Cascades. The mode of transporting the goods, and the facilities with which they do it, are equally novel. The load is secured on the back of a voyageur by a band which passes around the forehead and under and over the bale; he squats down, adjusts his load, and rises with ninety pounds on his back; another places ninety pounds more on the top, and off he trots, half bent, to the end of the portage. One of the gentlemen of the company informed me that he had seen a voyageur carry six packages of ninety pounds each (540 pounds) on his back; but it was for a wager, and the distance was not more than 100 yards. The voyageurs in general have not the appearance of being very strong men. At these portages the Indians assist for a small present of tobacco. * * *

A short distance above the Cascades they passed the locality of the sunken forest, which was at that time entirely submerged. Mr. Dayton on his return visited the place, and the water had fallen so much as to expose the stumps to view. They were of pine and quite rotten, so much so that they broke when they were taken hold of. He is of the opinion that the point on which the pine forest stands has been undermined by the great currents during the freshets; and that it has sunk bodily down until the trees were entirely submerged. The whole mass appears to be so matted together by the roots as to prevent their separation. Changes by the same undermining process were observed to be going on continually in other parts of the river. On the 30th of June they had a favorable wind, but it blew so hard that they were obliged to reef their sail, and afterward found the waves and wind too heavy for them to run without great danger; they, in consequence, put on shore to wait until it abated. In these forty miles of the river it usually blows a gale from the westward; in the summer time almost daily. In the evening they reached within seven miles of The Dalles, and four below the mission. Here the roar of the water at The Dalles was heard distinctly.

The country had now assumed a different aspect; the trees began to decrease in number, and the land to look dry and burned up. * * * The diversity of dress among the men was greater than even in the crowds of natives I have described as seen in the Polynesian Islands; but they lack the decency and care of their persons which the islanders exhibit. The women, also, go nearly naked, for they wear little else than what may be termed a breech-cloth of buckskin. Some have a part of a blanket. The children go entirely naked; the boys wear nothing but a small string around the body. It is only necessary to say that some forty or fifty live in a temporary hut, 20 by 12 feet in size, constructed of poles, mats and cedar bark, to convey an idea of their civilization.

The men are engaged in fishing and do nothing else. On the women falls all the work of skinning, cleaning and drying the fish for their winter stores. So soon as the fish are caught they are laid for a few hours on the rocks, in the hot sun, which permits the skins to be taken off with greater ease; the flesh is then stripped off the bones, mashed and pounded as fine as possible; it is then spread out on mats and placed upon frames to dry in the sun and wind, which effectually cures it. Indeed, it is said that meat of any kind cured in this climate never become putrid. Three or four days are sufficient to dry a large matful, four inches deep. The cured fish is then pounded into a large basket, which will contain about eighty pounds; put up in this way, if kept dry, it will keep for three years. During the fishing season the Indians live entirely on the heads, hearts and offal of the salmon, which they string on sticks and roast over a small fire.

The fishing here is much after the manner of that at Willamette Falls, except that there is no necessity for planks to stand on, as there are greater conveniences at The Dalles for pursuing this fishery. They use hooks and spears attached to long poles; both the hook and the spear are made to unship readily, and are attached to the pole by a line four or five feet below its upper end. If the hook were made permanently fast to the end of the pole it would be likely to break, and the large fish would be much more difficult to take. The Indians are seen standing along the walls of the canal in great numbers, fishing, and it is not uncommon for them to take twenty or twenty-five salmon in an hour. When the river is at its greatest height the water in the canals is about three feet below the top of the bank.

The Dalles is one of the most remarkable places upon the Columbia. The river is here compressed into a narrow channel, three hundred feet wide, and half a mile long; the walls are perpendicular, flat on the top, and composed of basalt; the river forms an elbow, being situated in an amphitheatre extending several miles to the northwest and closed in by a high basaltic wall. From appearances one is led to conclude that in former times the river made a straight course over the whole; but having the channel deeper, is now confined within the present limits. Mr. Dayton on inquiring of an old Indian, through Ogden, learned that in the time of his forefathers they went straight up in their canoes. * * *

The river falls about fifty feet in the distance of two miles, and the greatest rise between high and low water mark is sixty-two feet. This great rise is caused by the accumulation of water in the river above, which is dammed by this narrow pass, and is constantly increasing until it backs the waters, and overflows many low grounds and islands above. The tremendous roar arising from the rushing of the river through this outlet, with the many whirlpools and eddies which it causes, may be more readily imagined than described. * * * The number of Indians within The Dalles mission is reckoned at about two thousand; in but few of these, however, has any symptom of reform shown itself. They frequent the three great salmon fisheries of the Columbia, The Dalles, Cascades and Chutes, and a few were found at a salmon fishery about twenty-five miles up the Des Chutes river. The season for fishing salmon, which is the chief article of food, in this country, lasts during five months, from May to September. The country also furnishes quantities of berries, nuts, roots and game, consisting of bear, elk and deer; but owing to the improvidence of the natives they are, notwithstanding this ample supply of articles of food, oftentimes on the verge of starvation.

After the fishing and trading season is over, they retire to their villages, and pass the rest of the year in inactivity, consuming the food supplied by the labors of the preceding summer, and as the season for fishing comes around they again resort to the fisheries. This is the ordinary course of life among these Indians. * * *

The country about The Dalles is broken and the missionaries report that this is the case for some miles around. There are, however, also some plains and table lands which are considered very valuable, being well watered with springs and small streams; excellent for grazing, and well supplied with timber—oak and pine. The soil varies in quality and portions of it are very rich. Garden vegetables succeed, but require irrigation. Potatoes also must be watered, by which mode of culture they succeed well. Corn and peas can be raised in sufficient quantities. Wheat produces about twenty-five bushels to the acre; this is not, however, on the best land. They sow in October and March, and harvest begins toward the end of June.

The climate is considered healthful; the atmosphere is dry, and there are no dews. From May till November little rain falls, but in winter they have much rain and snow. The cold is seldom great, although during the winter preceding our arrival the thermometer fell to —18 degrees Fahrenheit. The greatest heat experienced in summer was 100 degrees in the shade; but even after the hottest days the nights are cool and pleasant.

During the early '60's traces of what might now be termed a pre-historic race, well-defined traces of aboriginal occupancy, were easily discernable in the country round and about The Dallas and throughout Wasco county. To the unexperienced eye these signs are without significance today. Well nigh gone forever are the rude implements, grotesque carvings, the far-reaching trails, stone mounds and unsymmetric paintings upon basaltic bluff-walls. In the '60's these deep-worn parallel paths mentioned, those primitive thoroughfares along which traveled Indians on their annual trips between winter abodes and the great fisheries above The Dalles, were entirely free from the intricate mesh of farm and field; no obstructive fences, rail or wire, barred their way. Humming their legendary ballads or singing their low, rude melodies of motherhood, dusky princesses followed each a tall, stoical chieftain or warrior brave, in the same pathway trod by their ancestors centuries ago.

When on these periodical fishing expeditions Indians were invariably accompanied by a drove of parti-colored "cayuses"; returning these animals were loaded with heavy packs of dried salmon. Trails were worn deep into the arable soil by these horses driven loose. To the earlier settlers these trails became of great service while on their way to town. And even after the first primitive official roadways were established Oregon pioneers continued the use of these highways. It was along one of these aboriginal trails leading in from the Tygh that a detail from the travelworn expedition of Meek rolled into The Dalles making their last encampment under the overhanging boughs of a lone pine tree which formerly stood on the farm owned, in 1889, by Mr. John Southwell, on Eight Mile creek, ten miles south of The Dalles. Sixteen years ago traces of this now forgotten roadway were yet to be found. To W. S. Campbell, in 1889, Hugh McNary, a member of the luckless Meek party, pointed out the old road and the campground. He told graphically of the subsequent fruitless search for the "blue bucket" diggings, and he related many stirring incidents of those days that "tried men's souls." Mr. McNary settled in the vicinity of the campground, where for a number of years he continued to reside, and was for a number of years identified with the pioneer freighting venture of Boise, Canyon City and other interior points.

It was, indeed, a populous, dusky nation that, long years ago, inhabited the little sequestered valleys along the mountain streams, some of which are to-day known as Three, Five, Eight and Fifteen Mile creeks, on the south; Mill and Chenoweth on the west; Five and Eight really being the lower portion of Fifteen Mile. The first bunch-grass sod of the Inland Empire—at least in a large portion of it—was broken not one hundred yards from Meek's last camp on Eight Mile. At that time the circular depressions—not unlike miniature circus rings long abandoned by the sawdust troupe—where formerly stood the picturesque tepees of the Wascos were encountered; the plow-point dulled on the round broiling stones in the long forgotten hearths. Often the deadly arrow-head, fashioned from flint, was picked up, curiously inspected, or perhaps, taken to the hardy settler's cabin and placed among his rude and strangely assorted bric-a-brac. Here, when the summer sun shone brightly, in the long-ago, and the light, fleecy clouds floated lazily athwart the azure sky, the tribal youths rounded up their fleetest steeds and tested their endurance before matching them against the champions of rival bands. And under the pine the hides of deer and shaggy coats of bear were beaten by strong-armed squaws until the finest of buckskins and most luxurious of robes were made for their lords and masters.

The frames of their wickiups were alder poles; the roofs were cedar bark brought down from near the sources of the streams. As evidence of this naked trunks still stand there, musty and old, among the firs and hackmetacks of the swamps. Of this locality Mr. W. S. Campbell wrote in the Times-Mountaineer, January 1, 1889:

Once, when engaged in the exploration of a cedar swamp near the head of Five Mile, we were startled by suddenly beholding the counterpart of an Indian woman, natural as life, almost, standing in the bog alone, the very picture of desertion and rigidity. Though on closer inspection it proved to be but a partially decayed stump, at the proper distance the likeness was wonderful, indeed. And, as we came away, she still seemed to be looking toward the coming night in the east with the same hopeless attitude of desertion, making us half believe we were turning our back on a stricken being whom cruel fate had decreed to remain in solitude to the end of time.

The well-known stone figures of the Indian woman and child, to be seen from the deck of the Cascades boat as she runs near the Oregon shore a few miles below The Dalles, may be more enduring, but never more life-like than the wooden image of the swamp mentioned. Odd, it is, the number of singularly truthful statues formed by chance that are to be found in this vicinity. Near Mr. Sherar's toll bridge, on the left-hand side of the canyon, up which the Grass Valley road winds and turns toward its destination, half way up the canyon and hillside as well, is the stone figure of another Indian woman, sitting with her elbows on her knees and her averted face clasped in her hands as though weary, weary, weary, long weary! And still further up the gorge, on the opposite hillside, the majestic figure of a noble chieftain stands out in bold relief against the eastern sky, perfect in attitude and outline, even to the regal war bonnet, once so familiar to the first settlers.

In the days gone by Mount Hood was the center of a vast natural park, wherein the choicest game and the most delicious wild fruits were plentiful. Agile-limbed hunters, armed with bows and arrows, stealthily searched sylvan dells and brought to bay the monarchs of the forest beneath the very shadow of the grand old mountain. Now the timbered slopes are desolated by the roving bands of sheep which are driven there for pasturages every summer.

Beginning with the year 1838 Rev. Daniel Lee passed a number of years as a missionary at The Dalles, the mission which Dr. Marcus Whitman, a short time previous to his assassination, purchased. From a work entitled "Ten Years in Oregon," by Rev. D. Lee and J. H. Frost, published in 1844, we make the following extracts:

The nights among The Dalles Indians were spent in singing and dancing, and thier carousals could be heard a mile. One, and then another of the medicine men, would open his house for dance, where it was generally kept up five nights in succession; men, women and children engaged in the chant, while a man, a woman, or both, danced on a large elk skin spread down on one side of the fire that blazed in the center of the group, keeping time to the loud-measured knocking of a long pole suspended horizontally, and struck endwise against a white cedar board—the dancer jumping and invoking his "tam-an-a-was," or familiar spirit, until exhausted he falls as one dead, by the overpowering influence of his "familiar."

To arouse him from this deep slumber required the skill of a medicine man, or "mesmeriser," who, going around him, peeps and mutters, and whoops, and hoots at his toes, fingers and ears, and wakes his tam-an-a-was; when he shudders, groans, opens his eyes and lives again. With these dancers the feat of fire-eating is also connected. The writer going one night to witness a dance was told that a medicine man present could eat fire; at first he seemed not a little ashamed, and denied he could do it. "Let me see you eat fire," said the writer; "you dare not do it; you can not do it." This was calling his courage and power into question before many who had seen him devour the blazing torch, as they believed, again and again. This was too much; his reputation was in danger, and his friends were urgent, confident that the doubter would be convinced.

"Al-ta-nan-ich! Now see the doctor eat fire!"

Having a bundle of small sticks of wood about two inches in diameter, and several inches long, he lighted one end, and while it blazed well, thrust it into his mouth, instantly closing his lips and extinguishing the flames. At this a smile of triumph rested on every face.

"Give me a bundle of sticks," said the writer.

The sticks being given were lighted and put into the hands of an Indian who was near. "Now, see, all of you! He, only keeping the wind away from it, made it go out. He does not eat it. Putting my hands around this will do the same; there, it is out, you see. My hands did not eat it; only shut the air out. Fire can not live without wind."

All were mute. Speaking to the doctor, he said:

"You deceive the people."

"Oh, now-it-kah, certainly," he replied. The people appeared to be convinced; but probably thinking the writer was a very great medicine man, being more than a match for the fire-eater.

Formerly it was a prevailing custom for the medicine men at the dancing festivals to lacerate their flesh with sharp stones, or knives, making deep cuts, and while the blood was gushing out, scoop it up in their hands to drink it and appease their blood-thirsty tam-an-a-was that raged within. Probably it was pretended by these deceivers that their "familiar" delighted in blood in order to inspire the poor dupes of their black art with an abiding dread of their displeasure, who could command the service of such malicious agents. The limbs and bodies of many exhibit scars which originated in this diabolical practice.

During the winter a circumstance came under the writer's notice, which may be related here, which is in keeping with the known character of The Dalles Indians since the whites first knew them. Several Indians from Wisham called one day at the mission, and being left alone in the room where they used to sit to converse, or came to get medicine, one of them when an opportunity served went into an adjoining room and found a market under his blanket for two shirts and a vest, on which he and his party soon left, having lost their inclination to remain there any longer. The next Sabbath he came to meeting wearing the vest which he carefully covered with his blanket, so that it was not seen until service closed, when he forgot to keep it hidden, and thus the thief revealed himself and proved that previous suspicions were well founded. The vest and one of the shirts only were recovered.

Difficulties often arise about property on the decease of relatives. A case of this kind took place at The Dalles station this winter. Tah-lac-eow-it, the Indian mentioned before, was living there and at work for the mission. He occupied a small house with his family, consisting of his wife and her mother, which house belonged to the mission. After a time his wife, who had long been a consumptive, died. The writer was present at the time, and was engaged in prayer when her spirit took its flight. As he arose the watchful mother caught with her eye the last gasp, and was instantly overwhelmed with loud and frantic grief. When the burial and mourning had ended the brother of the deceased began to annoy the bereft husband about the property, and made his visits so frequent and urged his unreasonable claims so madly that a quarrel ensued and a battle of pulling hair, and after this a strife to wrench an axe from each other's grasp, that one might have it to fight the other to some purpose. At this stage of the affray the writer entered the little house where they were, seized the weapon and wrested it from them; and then laying hold of the aggressor's long hair, showed him the way out into the yard in a hurry, and there the war ended. It is seldom that their engagements can be depended on. One was paid for ten deer skins, and when he brought them five were poor ones; and besides this cheat he wanted to get other property worth at least half the skins. Agree to give one a shirt for his services, and when he has done he will often want a vest or half a dozen small presents. * * *

Before the revival among the Indians at The Dalles, and in the vicinity, which took place in the fall and winter of 1839 and 1840, and which in order of time has its place here, is treated of, let me introduce the reader to a more particular acquaintance with the Indians in these parts and with their character. Ten miles above the station at the shoos are two villages, Tekin and Wiam. These are Walla Wallas. At the long narrows on the north side is Wisham. Here we first met with the Chinooks. Next, three miles below, is Ka-clas-ko, near which the mission houses stand (improperly called Wasco-pum). Ten miles you come to Clat-a-cut on the north side. Fifteen miles further down is Kle-miak-sac and Kow-il-a-mow-an. Three miles more Ne-nooth-tect, then Scal-talpe and Wah-he at the head of the Cascades. Besides on the north side of the river, a short distance inland, were the Chick-atat Indians, and on the south, twenty-five miles, the village of Til-han-ne, inhabited by the Walla Wallas. The villages named along the river from The Dalles down to The Cascades are the winter residences of many who pass their summer at or near the other of these fisheries. All these number less than 2,000 of all ages. From The Dalles Indians the Kinse used formerly to take an annual tribute of salmon, alleging that the fishery belonged to them. Whether or not their claims were well-founded, their superior power in war kept their stipendiaries in abject submission. These exactions were formerly more rigorous than now; at present they are concealed under the show of traffic. They buy at their own price, compelling them to sell even their own stock of provisions so as to have little left to subsist on themselves. Another cause, nearly as oppressive, which occurs almost every year, and makes a draft on their salmon stores, is the aggression of some of their poorer neighbors of the nearer inland tribes. These came to the fisheries after the end of the salmon season, while the fishermen are gone into the mountains to gather their yearly stock of berries, and rob their salmon caches. These are cellars which they dig in the sand where they deposit with much care and secrecy the fruits of their summer's toil and their winter's hope. Thus pillaged, every returning spring finds many of them in abject want. Formerly they had wars with the Clam-aths and the Zwan-hi-ooks, who inhabit the country far to the south and southeast. Some of the former tribe they hold in slavery.

Many years ago the rich hunting ground of the Willamette valley attracted the Kinse thither in chase of deer. On their return they were waylaid in the wilderness, when within about twenty-five miles of The Dalles, by a party of the Chinook race residing between this place and the Cascades, and nearly, if not entirely, cut off. This bloody conduct soon brought a war party of the Kinse upon the aggressors, when a battle ensued, and the avengers of their brothers' blood were conquerors.

A disposition to take every advantage of white men in their power by force or fraud, has been more manifest in the Indians here than in any other part of the territory; from the first introduction of the traders among them. Such was their determination to plunder that for many years the Hudson's Bay Company was compelled to pass them with a large force, and restrain them by the dread of their arms. So late as the year 1826, as Mr. McLeod, a gentleman of the company, and Mr. Douglas, the naturalist, were passing there, they manifested hostile intentions. Mr. McLeod, being apprised of his danger, ordered his men to put their boats into the water, on which the Indians interfered, and as Mr. McLeod was pushing one of them away from the boat, another drew a bow to shoot him. Mr. Douglas, seeing this, uncovered his piece and aimed it at the Indian.

At this moment a Kinse chief and three of his young men arrived, and set the matter at rest. When one of these Indians is detected in stealing, or with stolen property, and it is restored or taken from him, it is often the case among themselves that the thief receives some article of less value for which he has the boldness to stipulate with the owner of the stolen property. * * *

Let the reader now be introduced to the most influential persons among this people. These are the "medicine men," or conjurers, who can, it is believed, set the evil spirit of disease at defiance; cast it out where it has dared to enter, and make it seize with an unyielding, deadly grasp the object of their displeasure. The people believe that they hold intercourse with spirits; that they can see the disease, which is some extraneous thing, as a small shell, or a pipe, or a piece of tobacco, or some other material substance which they (the doctors) describe. It is firmly believed that they can send a bad "tam-an-a-was" into a person and make him die, unless it can be cast out by some other "medicine man." If a threat is made, or it is intimated by one of them that a certain person will not live long, no sooner does he hear of it than he is alarmed and feels himself a dead man. For their services they are paid in advance, and often their demands are high, and their practice is lucrative. When their patients die they restore the fees. This is necessary for their own security, for otherwise they might be charged with having caused his death, which would render them marks of revenge. If one of the order is his rival or enemy, and he wishes the obstacle to his own advancement removed, the affirmation that he caused the death of some person will probably be followed by his death by the relatives of the deceased. Several deaths from this cause took place at The Dalles the first year after the station was occupied, and this is a common occurrence among many of the surrounding tribes. Sometimes it happens that the doctor takes all the patient has, not leaving a dying man his last, perhaps his only garment or covering. A case of this kind occurred at The Dalles. A young man was in consumption and was in the writer's care. He was frightened away to the doctor by some one who saw he had a shirt and trousers, shoes and a light blanket, which he had received in part from me; and it was not long before he had stripped him of the whole, and then left him to die, or hastened his death. The poor man had no friends and the doctor was safe.

During the years 1839 and 1840 considerable religious excitement prevailed among the Wascos in the vicinity of The Dalles. It permeated nearly the whole tribe, and about a thousand of them professed to be converted, were baptized and received into the Christian church. But in 1850 such of these converts as were then alive had, nearly all, relapsed into their former state. Their religion, according to Mr. G. Hines, appeared to be more of the head than of the heart.

May 4, 1843, Mr. Hines and Dr. White came to the house of a Mr. Brewer, at The Dalles, where they found assembled about twenty Indians. And these savages were congregated there for a purpose, which was subsequently revealed. At the time Dr. White was in the vicinity, the previous winter, he had prevailed on the Indians to organize themselves into a kind of civil government. One high chief and three subordinates had been elected; laws had been promulgated and the penalties for transgression of the same were whippings, more or less severe, according to the character of the crime or misdemeanor committed. In the enforcement of these laws the chiefs had found much difficulty. Taken altogether this whole scheme of government devised by the well-meaning Dr. White appears to have been most chimerical, visionary and impracticable. The chiefs said that on punishing some of the recalcitrant Indians, according to the "white man's law," they had resisted strenuously, even to the point of the knife.

And now these chiefs who had been appointed through the influence of Dr. White, and upon whom rested the responsibility of executing the laws, were desirous that the new "government" should continue, but too evidently solely because it placed the "governed" under their absolute control and gave them the power to regulate all their intercourse with the whites and with other Indian tribes. But there were others, and influential men, too, who, not being in office, revolted against the corporeal punishment, and boldly desired to be informed what particular benefit this whipping system might confer on them. These men ingeniously said that they were willing it should continue provided they were to receive blankets, shirts and trousers as a reward for being whipped. No modern politician of the Twentieth Century ever sought more diligently for "graft" than did these Wasco Indians of 1840. They said they had been whipped a good many times, but had received nothing for it; it had done them no good. Should this unsatisfactory condition of "government" continue it was all (cultus) good for nothing, and they earnestly desired to do away with the entire system.

Dr. White replied that he and Mr. Hines could not then be detained to adjust any pending difficulties; that they were going farther into the interior, and were in something of a hurry, and that on his return he would endeavor to oil the wheels of government, but not exactly in the manner proposed, bestowing bribes on the whipees by the whippers. There would be no pay coming to them for being flogged whenever they deserved it. The assembled Indians laughed heartily and good-naturedly dispersed, but from that day the backbone of self-government, according to Dr. White's idea, was broken.

In 1850 the Indian villages at The Dalles were separated. One was clustered around the Catholic mission; the other was in the vicinity of Nathan Olney's store. Mrs. Elizabeth Lord, writing of early times, says: "Caskilla lived near the store, and Mark, his brother, at the mission. Both were chiefs, though Caskilla was higher in authority. He was a fine type of Indian, tall, straight, dignified and an interesting talker. Mark was fat and coarse."

C. W. Denton, who was one of the pioneers of Wasco county and who took an active part in the Indian wars, has written as follows concerning the different tribes of Indians and their chiefs at the time of the first white settlements in the early '50's:

The Indians were very numerous and powerful. The following are the names of the tribes, their chiefs and locations; Indian Chenowith was chief of the Cascade Falls Indians; Old Colwash of the Dog River and White Salmon Indians; Caskilla of the Indians at The Dalles and in the vicinity; Stock Whitley of the Des Chutes (or Won Woyas). At one time Cimetestas was their chief. Stock Whitley, at the time of our earliest recollection was quite a youngster, and to give an idea of his manly qualities, I will relate a little incident. During the summer of 1857 a party of Des Chutes Indians visited the garrison (at The Dalles). As their first thought is of something to eat, they turned their steps to the house of the only family in the place and asked for bread, which was given them. The man of the house had been lying across the bed, reading, but now stepped out to look at the horses. The noble Stock Whitley gracefully reclined his fat body in the place vacated, and after arranging the pillows to suit his august head, picked up the book and seemed to be deeply engrossed in its pages, while he munched a crust of bread. The lady of the house who sat sewing, viewed these proceedings with disgust. Seizing a slipper which lay beside her she gave his majesty a blow which sent the crust flying into the yard. The savage with a yell and a bound landed beside it. He picked up the bread, vowing that he would be revenged. He went at once to the Indian agent (a specimen of wax work) with his complaint and said she must be sent away immediately. The agent gave him some "taffy" and half a plug of tobacco to overlook the insult, which he readily did.

Yoice was chief of the John Days and renegades; Camiackan of the Yakimas, Simcoes and Klickitats (some of the most powerful tribes in the northwest); Simowe and White Owl of the Cayuses and Umatillas; Peo-Peo-Mox-Mox of the Walla Wallas; Snow-hollow, of the Priest Rapids and White Bluffs Indians; Lawer and Nez Perce Dick, of the Nez Percés; Wa-wa-wa, of the Snake tribes on the Weiser and Payette; Mowhigh, of the Malheurs; Paulina, of the Ochocos and those on the upper John Day; Winnemucca, of the Piutes (whose principal hunting grounds then were within the limits of what is now the state of Nevada).

I wish to say, in justice to the Wasco Indians, that as a tribe they never have taken up arms against the whites, but a few renegades have at times joined the hostiles. While they, nominally, have always had a chief, since the return of Billy Chinook in 1851 from his visit to the eastern states and California, with John C. Fremont, he has controlled the Indians more than any chief. He, being an intelligent and honest Indian, was worthy of the confidence the tribe placed in him.

To this favorable comment on the character of Billy Chinook Mrs. Elizabeth Lord adds the following testimony:

"In H. K. Hines' latest work he speaks of William Hendry. I had known Billy Chinook since 1851 and had never heard of him as anything else, so I was very much amused, but that, I suppose, was his Methodist name. He had introduced himself to father as Billy Chinook when he arrived at The Dalles in 1851, as we supposed returning from his trip east with Fremont. He came by way of California, bringing a California Indian wife, and quite a large band of Texas and Mexican cattle. He moved into a cabin across Mill creek from where we then lived. He was as good and honest a man as could be found anywhere. Father always had a warm place in his heart for Billy. He removed with the other Indians to the Warm Springs reservation and ended his days there."

Of the Hudson's Bay Company's post at The Dalles there is only meagre information concerning details available. Certain it is, however, that this gigantic fur trust and syndicate of speculative English capitalists established a post, or "factory" at this point in 1820, and that James Birnie, a Scotchman and native of Aberdeen, was in charge of the same. Dr. William McKay, an authority on Indian and Hudson's Bay Company history, states conclusively that such a post was established in the year mentioned. But it remained in existence only a short time and cut no important figure in the history of the territory to which this history is confined. It is, today, problematical if ever a building intended for permanency was erected.

In the early days of the Nineteenth Century perigrinating traders of the Hudson's Bay and American companies, with headquarters at Astoria, frequently passed the falls of the Columbia and mention of the place occurs at intervals in the journals of these companies. It is true that at this period (1820) the Hudson's Bay Company was intent upon extending its trade and territorial sovereignty throughout the country east of the Northwest Coast. Therefore it would have been natural for them to project a post, fort or stockade at The Dalles, really a most eligible location. Still, the place was isolated; Indian tribes were hostile, and it is quite probable that the post, temporarily located, was soon abandoned. It is known, however, that the canny Scotchman, Birnie, subsequently had charge of Fort George, Astoria, and, also, Fort Simpson. James Birnie, who has been designated the "first inhabitant of The Dalles," died at Cathlamet, December 21, 1864, aged sixty-nine years.

From 1844 to 1846 the increase of immigration, all of which trended in the direction of the Willamette settlement, and the terrors inspired by rafting their lares et penates down the Columbia from The Dalles, led a few of the more enterprising pioneers to seek for a more feasible route over the mountains. The result was the "Barlow Road," connecting eastern and western Oregon. In 1847 this highway was declared open to travelers. A large proportion of the 7,000 emigrants of that year, being more accustomed to land, than water travel, preferred to risk the hardships of logs and canyons to the dangerous and treacherous currents of the Columbia. At that period the superior qualities of Wasco soil had been tested neither by scientific analysis or practical agricultural experiment. Here the pioneer, with his eyes fixed on the seductive valley of the Willamette, of which most attractive tales had floated eastward on the wings of rumor, saw no value in the meadows and bunch grass hillsides of Wasco save to feed his starving stock that they might be able to cross the last great divide separating him from the Willamette. The beautiful valleys of Wasco, with their pure streams, had no names to the pioneer; to him they simply indicated so many miles less to travel. Thus the names Three Mile, Five Mile, Eight Mile, and Fifteen Mile creeks, referred to the distance from The Dalles to the crossing of those streams now historic in the annals of Wasco county, on the road across the Cascades. From the year of the opening of the Barlow road, 1847, the valley of "Fifteen Mile creek" became famous as a resting place to the emigrant. Its wild hay gave strength to many a foot-sore horse and ox that, otherwise, would never have passed their declining years in Oregon.

It was in 1845 that the first effort was made to open a road over the Cascade mountains, near the base of Mount Hood, on the south side. It was the freely expressed sentiment of S. K. Barlow that "God never made a mountain without some place for man to go over it, or under it."

Assured by this philosophical reflection Mr. Barlow, with eighteen men and women, besides children, struck out from The Dalles with thirteen wagons, sixteen yoke of cattle and seven horses. December 23d the party emerged from the mountains and arrived at Foster's farm—the welcome haven of later emigrants. The wagons had been abandoned—cached on the summit of the divide. Those accompanying Barlow and his family were William Rector, J. C. Caplinger and Mr. Gessner, and their respective wives; John and William Bacon. Subsequently Rector returned to The Dalles. The following season this road, or trail, was cut through. So steep was it on the western passes that it was necessary to lower wagons by ropes passed around stout trunks of trees. Only a few years since some of these trees still bore the marks of the cords and chains that cut through their bark. This was the last stage of the all-wagon route to the Willamette, and was in constant use by later arrivals. Of this commendable enterprise Mr. S. L. Brooks has written:

Previous to the building of the Barlow road in 1847 the immigrants, after reaching The Dalles, proceeded by boat down the Columbia river to the Willamette valley. Their route through eastern Oregon to The Dalles was via the emigrant road. This highway entered the present confines of the state through the Blue Mountains. It passed through Pendleton, crossed the Umatilla river above the mouth of Butter creek, then followed a southwestern course to Willow creek, crossing that stream near the present station of Cecils; thence west across the present Gilliam county to Rock creek; followed Rock creek and crossed the John Day river below the mouth of Rock creek; thence it crossed Sherman county, passing through what is now the town of Wasco, to the mouth of the Des Chutes river; crossed that stream at the mouth and followed the Columbia to The Dalles.

The Barlow road extended south from The Dalles to Fifteen Mile Crossing (Dufur); thence to Tygh valley; thence south and west, keeping to the north of White river, to the pass through the Cascades, between Mounts Hood and Wilson, and thence to Oregon City and other points in the Willamette.

In its issue of January 1, 1898, the Times-Mountaineer said:

"The Klinger family, consisting of father, mother and six children, were among the first to cross the Cascades on the Barlow road, which was completed that year (1847), and en route cooked of their scant supply of rice (which with a smaller allowance of bread comprised their sole provisions) on the spot where Dufur now stands. The year 1847 was a hard one on the emigrants to Oregon; 7,000 is the estimate of those who started; hundreds died on the road, and were buried between the wagon tracks that the savages might not find and dig up the bodies, and hundreds that reached eastern Oregon were in a destitute and starving condition. For instance, one of the Klinger party traded a shirt for a salmon at Tygh valley, and was so starved that he ate so much that it killed him."

In the introductory chapters of this volume we have related the incidents of the Indian war of 1847-8; the aftermath of the horrible Whitman massacre at Waiilatpu. It is not our intention to here repeat the story. But there are certain details of that campaign which come directly into the warp and woof of this history of Wasco county and these should, consequently, be noted. In 1847, after the massacre, Oregon volunteers took the field determined to punish the treacherous redskins guilty of the inhuman enormity perpetrated at the Whitman mission. General Gilliam promptly proceeded to the front with his command. In the course of this campaign in the Walla Walla country the old mission where is now The Dalles was converted into barracks; a military depot and base of supplies during the entire war extending over a period of eight months. Of the Oregon City volunteers Captain H. A. G. Lee was in command. They were stationed at The Dalles post until the death of General Gilliam, when Lee assumed command of operations against the hostiles. But the discovery of the gold fields of California in the spring of 1848 so greatly demoralized this little army that the soldiers could not be induced to remain in the field, and again the country fell into the hands of the war party who held sway until 1850.

During the occupancy by the troops of the old mission building at Wasco-pum (The Dalles)—the place was known first as Wasco-pum; later as Fort Lee, in honor of its commander. In April, 1848, we find Captain H. J. G. Maxon commanding, and in August Lieutenant A. T. Rogers. Following is the resolution passed by the legislative assembly of the Oregon Territorial government:

"That the governor is hereby required to raise, arm and equip a company of riflemen, not to exceed fifty men with their captain and subaltern officers, and dispatch them forthwith to occupy the mission station at The Dalles, on the Columbia river, and to hold the same until reinforcements can arrive at that point or other means be taken as the government may think desirable."

These are the names of the volunteers, in the field and at the mission: Joseph B. Proctor, H. A. G. Lee, J. S. Rinearson, Thomas Purvis, J. Magoon, C. Richardson, J. E. Ross, Isaac Walgamoult, John G. Gibson, B. B. Rogers, Benjamin Bratton, Samuel K. Barlow, William Berry, John Bolton, Henry W. Coe, William Buckman, S. A. Jackson, Jacob Witchey, John Fleming, A. C. Little, A. J. Thomas, George Westby, Edward Robson, Andrew Wise, D. Averson, J. H. McMillen, John C. Danford, W. M. Carpenter, Lucius Marsh, Joel McKee, H. Levalley, J. W. Morgan, O. Tupper, R. S. Tupper, C. H. Davendorf, John Hiner, C. W. Savage, G. H. Bosworth, Jacob Johnson, Stephen Cummings, George Weston.

These men organized themselves into a company and selected their officers as follows:

Captain, H. A. G. Lee; first lieutenant, J. Magoon; second lieutenant, J. E. Ross; commissary, C. H. Davendorf; surgeon, W. M. Carpenter, M. D.; first sergeant, J. S. Rinearson; second sergeant, W. Savage; third sergeant, William Berry; first corporal, Stephen Cummings; second corporal, J. H. McMillen.

The following letter was written by Major H. A. G. Lee to Governor Abernethy, of Oregon, December 26, 1847, shortly after his arrival at The Dalles (then known as Wasco-pum):

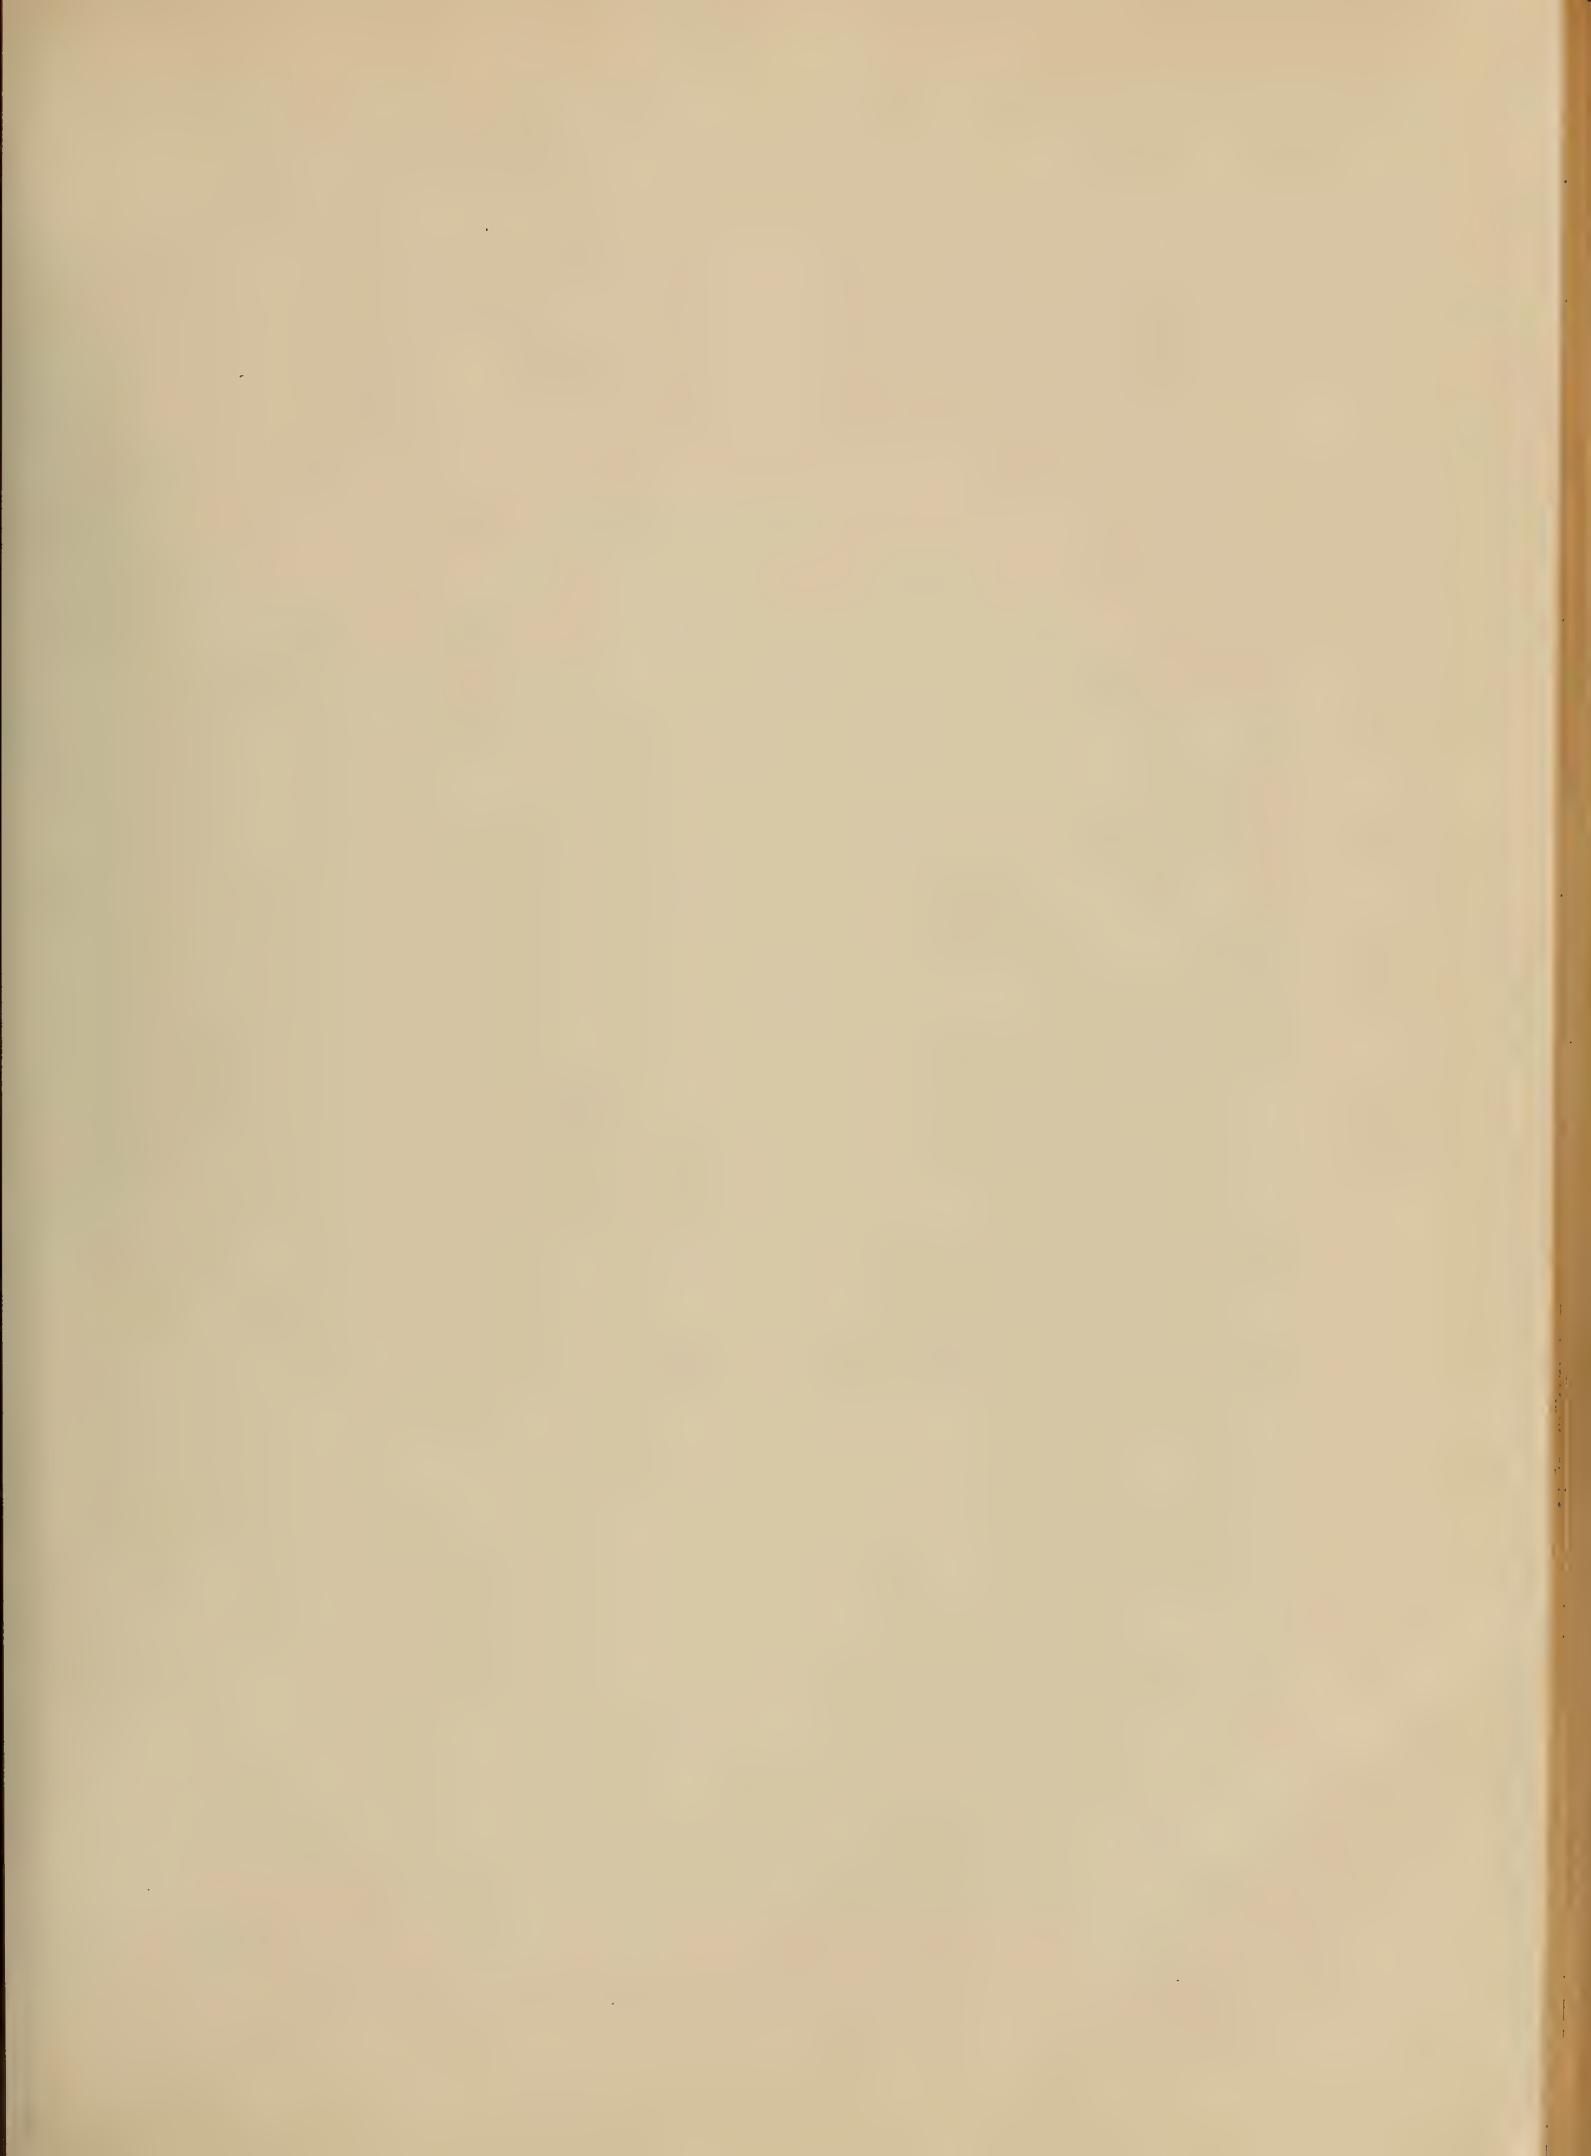

To Governor Abernethy: Sir—I reached this place on the evening of the 21st instant, with ten men, including Mr. Hinman (who had been in charge of the mission at Wasco-pum), whom I met on his way to Wallamet at Wind River Mountain, thirty miles below. The boats being wind-bound, and hearing from Mr. Hinman that a party of the Cayuses and river Indians had been down and driven off some horses from the mission, and that he had left with his family soon after, thinking it unsafe to remain longer, I was induced to lead the few men that were with me (for we had been separated by the wind and could not get together), and press to this place by land, with all dispatch, to save the houses from destruction; and I am very happy to inform you that we have arrived just in time, and that all is now safe. The natives immediately about this place are friendly and hailed our arrival with much joy. Seletsa professes friendship, but I shall keep an eye on him; his men have been killing cattle, and I suspect with his consent, though he promises to make them pay for them. We have been collecting the cattle and placing them below in order to stop the slaughtering that has been carried on above. We have not yet learned the amount of mischief done at this place, but are getting things under way quite as well as I could have anticipated. Mr. Hinman has been of great service to me here; he leaves today to join his family whom he left on the river * * * While writing the above one horse which had been stolen from the immigrants has been brought in, and others are reported on the way. I think most of the property stolen near this place will be returned; that above Des Chutes will probably be contended for. The Indians about this place are evidently terrified, and I shall avail myself of that fact, as far as possible, in furthering the object of our trip. I have no fears of an attack on this place, yet I shall be as vigilant as though an attack were certain. The boats which were wind-bound eight days arrived this morning all safe and well.

I remain your most obedient, humbled servant,
H. A. G. LEE.

The forces under General Gilliam were rapidly mobilized and on January 12, 1848, some of them left Portland, arriving at The Dalles on the 23d. This force numbered fifty men. On the 25th the remainder of the command came in, making a total force of about two hundred and fifty soldiers. Previous to the arrival of Gilliam, Captain Lee engaged in a light skirmish with the Des Chutes Indians, capturing a number of horses which proved serviceable as riding animals. These Indians, it was said, had been urged on by the Cayuses and Lee was sent forward to find them. He came up with them and a sharp skirmish resulted. At night this fact was reported to Gilliam by a scout.

The following day, with about thirty men, Gilliam moved forward and found the hostiles in force on the hills above a point described as Meek's Crossing. On the morning of the 30th Gilliam ordered an attack. The Indians were quickly dislodged, and abandoned their horses, some forty of which were collected; also a few cattle. The only loss inflicted upon the volunteers was by some Cayuses who attacked the exposed camp, killing two soldiers, Packwood and Jackson, who were guarding the horses. Finally the Des Chutes Indians were induced to give up the struggle, and they made a truce with the commissioner, saying that they had been forced into the difficulty through fear of the Cayuses. A forward movement was then commenced by Gilliam, February 15th, and subsequently the war was carried on in the northern country, now the state of Washington. Only a few soldiers remained at The Dalles post during the whole campaign.

CHAPTER II

PASSING EVENTS—1805 TO 1853.

While these lines are being penned the city of Portland, Oregon, is making elaborate arrangements for the opening, June 1, 1905, of the Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition, commemorative of the enterprise and daring of these two famous explorers, whose thrilling adventures, daring exploits and wonderful executive ability are thrown into bold relief in the history of the United States. In the opening chapters of this work a synopsis of the motive, plans and execution of their arduous labors has been given. It is only as their command impinged upon the history of Wasco county that we now have to deal.

Just one hundred years ago the county at present embraced within the boundaries of Wasco county was first visited by white men of whom there is authoritative data. We find the earliest mention of the localities of which this volume treats in the journals of that party, "first across the continent," while on their exploring expedition of 1805. They then went into camp at the mouth of Mill creek, where now stands a city known as The Dalles, at once the metropolis and capital of Wasco county. And here they found the Indian village of Win-quatt, the chief town of the Wasco Indians. Of these explorers' first view of The Dalles of the Columbia, and the course of their voyage through this section of the Territory, a full account is given in Chapter II, Part I, of this volume.

It should be recorded to the credit of the natives of these then unbroken wilds that among the multitude of Indians encountered by Lewis and Clark they found none unfriendly. They even persuaded the Nez Perce guides to visit the village below the great falls of Celilo, which at first the guides were unwilling to do, as they were at that time enemies. But a peace was arranged and no one was molested. Lewis and Clark reached Celilo October 22d, and the Cascades November 1, 1805.

In 1892 there was found in an Indian grave near The Dalles a most curious and interesting relic of the Lewis and Clark expedition. It is supposed to be a branding iron owned by Captain Clark, and used by him for the purpose of branding the property belonging to the expedition. We here produce a representation of the same:

A few years since Mr. George H. Himes, assistant secretary of the Oregon Historical Society, addressed to the Morning Oregonian, published at Portland, a letter giving a short account of its discovery, and also accompanying his communication with the iron relic itself. The letter states:

To the Editor: A very unique and interesting relic was discovered by the writer at Hood river a few weeks ago, in the possession of Mr. W. R. Winans. Mr. Winans found it in an Indian grave, on an island in the Columbia river, three and one-half miles above The Dalles, in 1892, after a freshet. It was attached to parts of a human skeleton, presumably of an Indian. It is thought to be a branding iron belonging to the Lewis and Clark exploring expedition of 1804-6, as indicated by the lettering, "U. S. Capt. M. Lewis," Captain Lewis having been the leader of that Jeffersonian expansionist expedition.

The space below the lettering is one and one-quarter inches deep, and was used, doubtless, to hold movable iron letters or lines, as the construction of the iron indicates that there were thumb-screws at each end to hold such letters or lines rigidly in place. The implement was probably used to mark the "parfleche," or rawhide bags used by the explorers to pack their stores in, and also to mark their camping places; and perhaps, too, it may have been burned into thin pieces of wood and distributed among Indians from time to time.

The brand was constructed on lines of strength, rather than beauty, although the iron lettering evinces much skill on the part of the maker, notwithstanding the ravages of time since it was made, and it weighs two and three-eighths pounds. The purpose of its use as above set forth is purely conjecture, and in the absence of better information is as good a theory as can be set up. The implement belongs to Mr. Winans, who has kindly placed it in the custody of the Oregon Historical Society for safe keeping.

GEORGE H. HIMES,

Assistant Secretary.

The denominational missions at The Dalles have proved important factors in the early development of this country. The pioneer attempt to establish a mission in this vicinity was made by a party comprising P. C. Pambrun, of the Hudson's Bay post at Walla Walla, Dr. Marcus Whitman, H. H. Spalding and W. H. Gray. The last three, it should be remarked, were the only ones deeply interested in the mission project. This was in 1836. They did not then locate at the Dalles, but proceeded up the Columbia river and established the Whitman mission at Waiilatpu, then in the territory now comprising the state of Washington. Of this venture W. H. Gray in his "History of Oregon" says:

"Our mission party, with Captain Pambrun, his two boats loaded, two-thirds of the goods for the mission, on their way up the Columbia river, arrived all safe at The Dalles. Gray took a decided stand in favor of the first location at that point on account of its accessibility and the general inclination of all the Indians in the country to gather at these salmon fisheries; Spalding and Pambrun opposed; Whitman was undecided; Pambrun would not wait to give time to explore nor assist in getting horses for the doctor and Gray to look at the country in view of a location."

The second and successful attempt was made in 1838. The Dalles was considered a most promising field for missionary effort, and it was determined by the members of the Oregon Mission Board to begin a new station at that place, about eighty miles above Fort Vancouver. Accordingly Revs. Daniel Lee and H. K. W. Perkins were appointed to proceed there for that purpose.

In March, 1901, Mr. H. K. Hines, in an impressive address said:

We are assembled today, my friends, on a historic spot to commemorate an important event in the thrilling story of Old Oregon. Sixty-three years ago (1838), on the 22d day of this present month of March, Rev. Daniel Lee and Rev. H. K. W. Perkins, who had been selected for that service by Rev. Jason Lee, superintendent of the missions of the Methodist Episcopal church among the Indians of Oregon, arrived at this place, then known as "Wasco-pum," and on the Sunday following formally opened their mission among the Indians. The tribe of Indians then resident here was known as the Wascos. When Jason Lee, accompanied by Daniel Lee, had entered the country, in September, 1834, the first missionaries, by two full years to enter the vast region west of the Rocky mountains, his statesmanlike mind had selected this as the proper place for the establishment of a mission east of the Cascade mountains. On arriving at the Willamette valley it was evident to him that that was the point for the central station for his missionary work, and it was accordingly located among the Calapooia Indians, near where the capital of Oregon now stands. The force of the mission was so small that it was not possible to occupy more than one point at the beginning, but it was the full and avowed purpose of Mr. Lee to occupy this place whenever enlargement could be undertaken. That time did not come until the spring of 1838 when, as before indicated, that purpose was put into execution, and the persons appointed to carry it into effect.

At the Walamet station the missionaries embarked, March 14th, in two canoes, with a small store of supplies. They passed down the river and then ascended the Columbia, arriving at their destination Wednesday, March 22d. Mr. Perkins had left his wife at the central mission in the Willamette valley. Early in April, with the assistance of Indians, they had so far completed a log building for a residence, that Mr. Perkins returned to the Willamette for his wife. Mr. Lee remained on the ground carrying forward the work. In May Mr. Perkins returned with his wife; affairs at the new mission settled down into regular routine work.

A valuable spring of water was found three miles below the narrows and one-half mile from the shore of the river. The land was rich; there was a plentiful supply of timber, oak and pine, and an elevated and pleasant location for a house. Hilly and broken was the background and thinly wooded. It was on this favored spot that a house was begun and completed.

Meantime Rev. Jason Lee, on his way to the United States, arrived on the scene. He was ac-accompanied by Mr. Edwards and another gentleman, Mr. Ewing, of Missouri, W. M. Brooks and Thomas Adams, two Indian boys of the Chinook tribe who had been attending the mission school at the Walamet station. And they were there with an object. It was to secure additional facilities to more extensively carry on missionary work in the Oregon territory. April 9th Jason Lee hired horses of the Indians and, with those who accompanied him, set out for Walla Walla. There he intended to purchase horses needed to make the tour of the mountains. This was on the same day that Mr. Perkins left in a canoe for the Walamet station for his wife. On his return his family occupied the new house long before it was roofed. During the ensuing year a number of trips were made to the Walamet and Vancouver for supplies. Another journey was made to Walla Walla after horses; another overland to the Walamet station to procure cattle.

Meetings with the Indians were commenced immediately following the arrival of these missionaries. They were addressed through the services of an interpreter in the "jargon," now termed "Chinook," an important medium of communication with all tribes. This patois was developed through the necessities of traffic between the whites and the natives; it embraces some English, some French and many Indian words, Chinook, Walla Walla and those of other tribes. These religious meetings were held among the oaks or under a pine tree. Scattered stones afforded seats for some; others squatted upon the bare ground. An American named Anderson, who had been hired by the year, supplied lumber for the mission, overseeing the natives. Farming utensils were required for the ensuing spring; also bridles, collars, traces and full equipment for the horses, all of which were made at the mission. The scriptures were read and expounded to the Indians morning and evening. Sabbath services were continued; the attendance increased.

In the spring of 1839 about twenty acres of land were sowed and planted. One field was worked on shares by Indians, who assisted in fencing and plowing it. Returns were small as the ground was new, and a portion of these were stolen. Discouragements like these, combined with the plentitude of salmon, roots and berries, rather disgusted the savages with agricultural pursuits—the vaunted fruits of husbandry were treated as a joke. Still, the soil being irrigated from the spring, a few garden vegetables and a fine crop of potatoes were secured the first season. Some of the potatoes were stolen by the Indians. Another house was under way and, nearing completion; it was utilized for meeting purposes during the winter. Writing in 1901 of this colony Mr. H. K. Hines said:

The appointment of Messrs. Daniel Lee and Perkins was, in itself, a most judicious one. Daniel Lee was the nephew of the superintendent, and had been his chosen companion in his journey across the plains, four years before. He was a plain, practical man, of solid rather than brilliant gifts, of undoubted integrity, and well calculated to gain and hold a strong influence over the minds of the Indians. His early life had familiarized him with toil and schooled him to brave and determined deeds. Mr. Perkins was a younger man, well educated and trained in the higher amenities of the best New England life. While Lee's piety was of that practical, business kind that passes, properly, for so much with the plain toiling multitudes around us, that of Perkins was rather of that lofty, mystical character that appeals so strongly to the cultured and sentimental. His spirituality was intense. While in some respects these men were the opposite of each other, they were, also, the complements of each other in such a work as they were to undertake at this place.

In June, 1840, this mission at The Dalles was reinforced by the arrival of Dr. J. L. Babcock, H. B. Brewer and J. H. Frost and families, and Mrs. Daniel Lee, who was formerly Miss Maria T. Ware. This outpost of civilization was maintained by the Methodists for a trifle less than ten years. Rev. Daniel Lee continued as superintendent of the mission until 1844 when he left for the United States accompanied by his wife. Lee was succeeded by Rev. George Gary. The latter remained in charge until 1847. That year Rev. William Roberts assumed control. For nearly an entire decade the Methodist mission constituted the sole settlement of white people at The Dalles; it was the first permanent settlement made. This was during the period when the territory was claimed by both England and the United States, as has been shown in our chapter on "The Oregon Controversy" in Part I, of this work. It was a project dear to the hearts of Lee and his associates, particularly Dr. Whitman, to hold the country for the United States. These missionaries, while disseminating the truth of the Gospel among the Indians, did not overlook the value of the country to our government; in fact they fully realized it long before the politicians at Washington awoke to the significance of the real worth of the Inland Empire. The Dalles was the key to the Northwest Coast. Lee realized this fact. His best efforts were thrown forward to establish a permanent American settlement.

The Methodists transferred the mission to Dr. Marcus Whitman in August, 1847. Whitman was a propagandist of the Presbyterian Missionary Society; better known as the American Board. To Whitman and his associates The Dalles was an important station. They were at this time doing the greater portion of the missionary work east of the Cascade mountains. In the Willamette valley the Methodists found a religious field large enough to occupy all their talents and forces. At the period of the transfer it was mutually understood that the missionary work would be continued on such general lines as were then followed throughout the northwest. After the transfer Whitman returned to Waiilatpu leaving The Dalles station in charge of his nephew, Perrin B. Whitman, at that time a youth seventeen years of age. Until December, 1847, the latter remained in charge. Then he received news of the massacre at Whitman's Waiilatpu mission, and fled down the Columbia leaving the buildings in charge of some friendly Wascos. Soon after the houses were occupied by a military company in command of Captain H. A. G. Lee. It was never used subsequently as a missionary station.

Throughout the entire field of Indian regeneration at The Dalles, during the winter of 1839-40, a wave of religious enthusiasm swept forward. This revival was under charge of Revs. Lee and Perkins. Business was laid aside; the largest rooms were crowded; great congregations assembled in the open air. The culmination of this revival came at a camp-meeting held near the mission house early in April, 1840. The place where the camp meeting was held was a point about six miles below The Dalles and three miles from the mission house. The place was called by the Indians Cow-e-laps. This point was in the vicinity of the Geo. Snipes brick residence below town. Nearly 1,200 Indians were in attendance, many of whom made a profession of religion; one hundred and fifty were baptized; four or five hundred partook of the sacrament. Of this awakening Mr. H. K. Hines says: "I believe they were mostly sincere, and their expressions real. Notwithstanding within ten years the Indians were dispersed and the mission itself given up, the causes are easy to find outside of the oft asserted superficiality of the work itself."

In October, 1840, Mr. Jason Lee visited the mission and another camp meeting was held. This was attended by not one-third or one-fourth as many as at the spring meeting.

Rev. J. S. Griffin, in the winter of 1839, attempted to pass the Salmon river mountains to Payette river, for the purpose of establishing a mission among the Snake Indians. He failed and went into the Willamette valley as a settler. While at The Dalles, as related by W. H. Gray, in his "History of Oregon," these three clergymen succeeded "in converting, as they supposed, a large number of Indians. While this Indian revival was in progress the writer had occasion to visit Vancouver. On his way he called on the missionaries at The Dalles and, in speaking of the revival among the Indians we remarked that, in our opinion, most of the religious professions of the natives were from selfish motives. Mr. Perkins thought not; he named one Indian that, he felt certain, was really converted, if there ever was a true conversion. In a short time Daniel Lee, his associate, came in and remarked, 'What kind of a proposition do you think _____, (naming Mr. Perkins' truly converted Indian) has made to me?' Perkins replied: 'Perhaps he will perform the work we wished him to do.' 'No,' says Lee, 'he says he will pray a whole year if I will give him a shirt and a capote [coat].' This fact shows that the natives who were supposed to be converted to Christianity were making these professions to gain presents from the missionaries."

On the other hand we have the following testimony of Dr. McLoughlin, given to Rev. Jason Lee: "Before you came and began your missionary work here, we had to guard every boatload that passed The Dalles by forty armed men. Now our boats come and go alone and unguarded with safety."

Concerning this mission, and its condition in 1841 we have some reliable and unbiased testimony. In the summer of that year a United States exploring expedition under command of Charles Wilkes, U. S. N., made a trip up the Columbia river, accompanied by Peter Ogden, chief factor for the northern district of the Hudson's Bay Company. The following in regard to the mission is taken from the report of Commander Wilkes, published in 1845. It gives an accurate idea of the mission as it was at that time, as well as the surroundings:

In the morning they were again on their route and reached Little river, from which the station of the Methodist mission is three-fourths of a mile distant. Here they were met by Mr. Perkins, who was waiting for his letters and some packages of goods which the brigade had brought. Mr. Drayton accompanied Mr. Perkins to the mission, while the brigade moved on towards The Dalles. Mr. Daniel Lee, the principal of the mission, was found near the house, reaping his wheat.

At this station there were three families, those of the Rev. Mr. Lee, Mr. Perkins and a lay member, who is a farmer. The reception of Mr. Drayton was exceedingly kind. The mission consists of two log and board houses, hewn, sawed and built by themselves, with a small barn and several outhouses. The buildings are situated on high ground, among scattered oaks, and immediately in the rear is an extensive wood of oaks and pines with numerous sharp and jagged knolls and obelisk-looking pillars of conglomerate, interspersed among basaltic rocks; in front is an alluvial plane, having a gradual descent toward the river, and extending to the right and left. This contains about two thousand acres of good land, well supplied with springs, with Little river, and other smaller streams passing through it. The soil is of decomposed conglomerate and in places shows a deep black loam. Around this tract the land is high, devoid of moisture, and covered with basaltic rocks or sand.

They here raise wheat and potatoes by irrigation; the latter grow in great perfection and wheat yields twenty to thirty bushels to the acre. They had just gathered a crop of two hundred bushels from land which they irrigate by means of several fine streams near their houses. They might raise much more if they were disposed. The summers here are much hotter than at Vancouver and consequently drier, the spring rains cease here earlier and the people harvest in June. There are only a few Indians residing near the mission during the winter, and these are a very miserable set. They live in holes in the ground, not unlike clay ovens, in order to keep warm. They are too lazy to cut wood for their fires. The number that visit The Dalles during the fishing season is about fifteen hundred; these are from all the country round, and are generally the outlawed of the different villages. The missionaries complain much of the insolent behavior and of their thieving habits, both of the visitors and those who reside permanently at the falls. They are, therefore, very desirous of having a few settlers near, that they may have some protection from this annoyance, as they are frequently under apprehension that their lives may be taken.

It is not to be expected that the missionaries could be able to make much progress with such a set, and they, of course, feel somewhat discouraged, though they have succeeded in obtaining a moral influence over a few. The missionaries have been stationed at The Dalles since 1838. The primary object of this mission is to give the gospel to the Indians; next to teach them such arts of civilization as shall enable them to improve their condition, and by degrees to become an enlightened community. There are many difficulties that the missionary has to contend with, in first coming among these people, none of which are greater than the want of knowledge of their true character. The missionaries, after a full opportunity of knowing these Indians, consider covetousness as their prevailing sin, which is exhibited in lying, dishonest traffic, gambling and horse-racing. Of the latter they are extremely fond, and are continually desirous of engaging in it. This sport frequently produces contentions, which often end in bloodshed. Stealing prevails to an alarming extent; scarcely anything that can be removed is safe. The missionaries have several times had their houses broken open, and their property more or less damaged. The stealing of horses in particular is very common, but after being broken down the animals are sometimes returned. There are but few chiefs to whom an appeal for redress can be made, and they can exercise but little control over such a lawless crew. Those who gather here are generally the very worst of the tribes around.

This is an extract from a decision of the United States District Court in the case of Dalles City and others against the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church, for the possession of The Dalles townsite, handed down December 3, 1879:

In regard to the abandonment of the mission:

It is claimed by the defendant that in August, 1847, it agreed to turn over the missionary station at The Dalles with the improvements thereon to Marcus Whitman, the agent of the American Board of Commissioners for foreign missions, and then engaged as a lay missionary of said board at a place called Waiilatpu, about one hundred and forty miles, east, northeast of The Dalles, upon the understanding that said board would maintain a mission there among the Indians, and that said Whitman would pay $600 for certain personal property belonging to the mission; that in pursuance of said agreement said Whitman gave the defendant a draft upon said board for said $600, and the defendant's agents and missionaries between September 1 and 10, 1847, surrendered the station to said Whitman; that owing to the death of said Whitman on November 29, 1847, said agreement was canceled in 1849, by the surrender of said draft to the agent of said board and the "retransfer" of said station to the defendant, who thereupon resumed control of the same.

* * * Defendant substantially admits that from the delivery of said station to Whitman as aforesaid it never actually occupied the same for mission purposes or otherwise, and claims that it was prevented from so doing by the danger from Indian hostilities growing out of what was known as the Cayuse war.

This decision, in effect, denied the claims of the missionaries, and sustained the contention of the city of The Dalles.

At the conclusion of the Indian war of 1847-8, culminating in the subjugation of the Cayuse tribe and other northern hostiles, another mission was established at, or near, The Dalles. This was by the Catholic church. May 16, 1848, they formally began their work which, at this point, has been uninterrupted until the present day.

Rev. L. Rosseau was the first father in charge, and in fact the actual founder of the mission. Father Rosseau crossed the plains with Rev. A.

M. A. Blanchet, Bishop of Walla Walla, and others of their order late in 1847. They established missions in various parts of the country. Father Rosseau, an Italian, was an eloquent and impressive preacher, possessing great personal magnetism and he had much influence with the Indians. The mission was established near the Catholic cemetery, west of the city.

Father Rosseau was succeeded by Father Mesplie, in 1851, under whose supervision the mission buildings were erected. This mission, which has proved an important factor in the growth and development of the town, has become a flourishing society with handsome structures.

John Peter Mesplie, a brother of Father Mesplie, was an early worker at the mission. He came direct from France to the Catholic mission at The Dalles. From that time he remained a resident of Wasco county, until his death, January 22, 1905. At the time of his decease he was a pioneer of pioneers, having made his home in the county for fifty-two years. Writing in The Dalles Times of March 2, 1881, "An Early Settler" says:

*** The Catholic mission was here in 1850 and I think it had ben here some time before; for soon after that date, the priest in charge told a friend of ours that he was discouraged and should leave; as he had worked to instill sentiments of religion in the minds of the Indians, and yet, when he asked them to perform the slightest religious duty, they invariably asked, "What will you pay me?" And this reminds us of an incident: A party attended the church one Sunday morning, and were quite highly entertained by hearing the priest preach to the Indians in Chinook, telling them Bible stories—among others the ascension of Elijah—Copa Lah-alie illehee copa piah chick-chick copa yaka—well, very highly dressed, trying to make them understand by these miracles the magnitude of the power of God. But he had to pay them to believe these things, so the good father left, and was replaced by Father Mesplie.

In 1851 the mission building was burned down, but was immediately rebuilt, as before, of logs. Father Mesplie built the old frame church which stands at the Catholic cemetery, as well as the St. Peter's edifice in town.

The Catholic mission, as originally built, consisted of two log cabins, one the church and the other the home of the priest. The frame building built by Father Mesplie was put up in the late fifties and was near the old site. It supported a belfry and was a much more pretentious building than the log structures that had preceded it.

Before continuing the story of the early settlement of Wasco county let us consider the occupancy of the country around The Dalles by military forces; the building of Fort Dalles and establishment of the military reservation. In 1849 the rifle regiment recruited in Missouri for service in Oregon, completed their journey overland, and tarried a short time at The Dalles on their route to Vancouver. These troops were bare-foot and scarcely able to walk; their horses too weak to carry them. Remaining here a short period to recuperate they then extended their journey down the Columbia. Their means of conveyance were three Makinaw boats, one yawl, four canoes and one whaleboat. A raft was also constructed to carry four or five tons. This was loaded with goods, eight men being on board to navigate the awkward craft. Attempting to run the treacherous Cascades six of the crew were drowned; according to the Spectator, of October 18, 1849. A portion of this command with wagons, teams and riding horses, crossed the Cascade mountains via the Mount Hood road, losing nearly three-fourths of their exhausted horses on the way. The total loss on this disastrous journey amounted to forty-five wagons, one ambulance, thirty horses and two hundred and thirty-five mules.

May 13, 1850, Colonel Loring dispatched Major Tucker from Vancouver with two companies of this rifle regiment to establish a supply post at The Dalles. The officers detailed for this duty were Captain Clairborne and Lieutenants Lindsay, May and Ervine, and Surgeon C. H. Smith. These companies located the present site of the military garrison at The Dalles; their tents were pitched under some trees near a sand bed. Four sides of one of the trees were blazed and branded "U. S." This represented the center of the military reservation, five miles each way; thus warning everybody within a radius of ten miles to "keep off the grass"—which they didn't do to any apparent extent.

In 1851 the rifle regiment was ordered to California. Therefore the two companies at The Dalles were relieved by two companies of the First Artillery, commanded by Lieutenant Woods. In the fall of 1852 two companies, K. and I, of the famous Fourth United States Infantry arrived, in command of Captain Benjamin Alvord, and relieved the artillery. He was accompanied by Captain Montgomery, chief quartermaster. These troops came via the Isthmus of Darien. Major Rains and Captain Mallony subsequently relieved them, and the former made two separate surveys of the reservation under authority of the United States government. Major Granville O. Haller and Quartermaster Forsythe relieved Rains and Mallony. In the spring of 1853 the reservation, which until that time had been ten miles square, was ordered cut down to five, thus affording an opportunity to settlers to occupy lands nearer the post. The following is from the Wasco County Abstract Index:

In the summer of 1853 Lieutenant Montgomery, then at Fort Dalles, commenced to survey a military reservation, "not exceeding 640 acres," in accordance with section 9 of act of congress of February 14, 1850. Montgomery commenced at the lower end of Washington street, about 150 feet north of Main street, and ran one mile southerly (south 32 degrees, 30 minutes w), thence westerly one mile; northerly one mile; then to beginning, thus making a reservation one mile square. But this survey was never approved, if ever sent on to Washington.

In 1854 Major Rains, being in command at Fort Dalles, disapproved of Montgomery's survey, as he wanted the reservation to take in Mill creek, and also wanted to throw out a piece of ground on which settlers might establish a town and trading post.

* * * In 1854 Rains, in laying out his reservation, abandoned Montgomery's beginning point, and started his survey at a large rock at the mouth of Mill creek, and running southerly to Sugar Loaf rock, thus leaving the triangular piece of land known as Dalles City at the east of his survey and thus lying between the east line of the Rains reservation and the west boundary line of Bigelow's claim taken with reference to the Montgomery survey. This was for the purpose of establishing a town under the townsite act just extended to Oregon under act of congress of July 17, 1854, being the original act of May 23, 1844.

Mrs. Elizabeth Lord, in her book, "Reminiscences of Eastern Oregon," has the following to say of the garrison at The Dalles, as it was upon the arrival of the Laughlin family, October 4, 1850:

"The only houses in the garrison at that time were the long, low barracks with six or eight rooms used for so many years as officers' quarters * * * and the commissary and guard house which was more like an outdoor cellar than anything else I can think of, the upper part being of logs. The soldiers were in tents until after the mill was built and sawed lumber could be procured. Over one hundred civilians, immigrants, were employed during the winter to build the mill and quarters for the men; a barn for the horses and cottage for the commanding officer."

The original garrison buildings were erected in 1850, and remained in about the same condition until the arrival of Captain Jordan, in 1856. This military officer was quite luxurious in his tastes—considerably of a sabarite—and he expected large sums of the government's money in the erection in 1858, of showy and ornate houses and in laying out elaborate grounds and lawns. The Dalles Chronicle lately said:

In recent dispatches was announced the death of Captain Thomas Jordan, at one time in the regular army, and later in the Confederate service. Captain Jordan was stationed at The Dalles at the time the military post was there, and his death has caused a friend of the Chronicle to write the following reminiscent article which will be of interest to those who wish to learn of the early history of The Dalles:

The death of Captain Jordan should be of more than passing interest to us in this vicinity, he having been quartermaster at the post of Fort Dalles during the erection of the buildings which succeeded the first log huts put up. It was he who sowed over the bluff around the government spring the seed of white clover, the sods of which have helped to start many a lawn in our city, and some of which still flourish where they have not been extirpated by the spade of improvement.

Along with this, the horses of the cavalry regiment turned the sward of the native grass growing on their exercise ground into a desert which increases yearly. But this was not the fault of Captain Jordan, nor was he to blame for the charge of extravagant expenditure which was often brought against him. It is not easy to build well and inexpensively when carpenters are paid ten dollars a day in gold and when planing mills are not, but every stroke in the construction has to be made by the strong hand of the builder unaided by mechanical invention. It is not easy to build posts for frontier protection, as Fort Dalles was built, and at the same time take advantage of the cheapening facilities of densely populated cities.

Captain Jordan had fine taste in building, and Uncle Sam is supposed to have a long purse, and so it was that we boasted of as picturesque a collection of officers' quarters as could be found the world over. The customary tradition of "two rooms and kitchen" received its usual generous interpretation in army quarters. A room is but a room, though it may be subdivided by any number of sliding doors, and any portion of the upper stories, the upper angle of which is cut off by the roof to ever so small a degree, does not count. It will be long before our city has another $100,000 building in its residence quarters. We had our little pride in the commandant's house. It went out in a blaze of glory. But one of Captain Jordan's buildings is still standing, called, we believe, the Captain's quarters.

The buildings are about through with their usefulness; the builder is at rest; the parade ground is cut up into town lots, and grows roses and chrysanthemums. We do not forget that he raised his hand against the government; but we would "be to his virtues very kind," and remember his faithfulness wherein he was faithful.

In her entertaining reminiscences Mrs. Lord says:

"In March, 1851, the rifle regiment was ordered away. At this time the headquarters for the military for the northwest was at Oregon City, but the part of the regiment which had gone through the preceding year had lost a great many from desertion, as the men were simply wild to go to the recently discovered gold mines in California. Officers had pursued and returned seventy in one bunch, but many others had eluded them and were never heard of, probably perishing, either from starvation or being murdered by Indians. For this reason the government made The Dalles a stopping place for the late portion (those of the rifle regiment who came west in 1850), because of its not being so easy to desert. Their leaving threw the two hundred men out of employment (those who were engaged in putting up the garrison buildings), as the buildings which had been completed were ample for the company of sixteen privates, two non-commissioned officers and one lieutenant, who were to take their place. Consequently there was a grand exodus of both soldiers and civilians, leaving quite a number of cabins vacant, although some of the people for different reasons did not make haste to leave."

Major Granville O. Haller was stationed at Fort Dalles from 1853 to 1856. From this point, and under command of Major Haller, was the campaign of 1855 carried on against the hostile Yakima Indians. In May, 1855, Colonel Lawrence Kip, U. S. A., paid a visit to the post on his way to Walla Walla to participate in the great council which established the white race in full possession of eastern Oregon. In his journal he has this to say of the post at The Dalles:

"This post possesses none of the outward attractions of scenery which distinguished that of Vancouver. Its principal recommendation is its healthfulness. The buildings are badly arranged, having been planned and erected years ago by the mounted rifles when they were stationed in Oregon. The officers' quarters are on the top of a hill and the barracks for the men some distance further down, as if the officers intended to get as far from them as possible. There is a want of compactness, as there is no stockade—nothing in the shape of a fortification; in case of an outbreak by any of the hostile tribes of Indians, the post might easily be surprised. At this time two companies of the Fourth Infantry were stationed there under command of Major Rains."

In September, 1904, The Dalles was revisited by Mr. Louis Scholl, who at that time was making his home in Walla Walla. So early as 1856 Mr. Scholl came to The Dalles with Captain Jordan, and was the architect who prepared the plans for the buildings erected by that officer for garrison purposes. At one time an idea obtained that the lumber for these edifices was brought around the Horn. Mr. Scholl is authority for the statement that it was sawed at the mills on Fifteen Mile, at Mosier, on the site of the Urquhart place, on Mill creek, where stood a mill owned by Scholl & Noble, and, also, at the government mill. At the period of Mr. Scholl's visit, in 1904, the local Sorosis at The Dalles was fitting up a museum in the old garrison building, and he presented to the ladies a number of interesting relics of pioneer days; a lamp, an old dictionary used by Captain Allen, and presented to him by his clerk, Mr. Inman; an old ledger once used in W. D. Bigelow's store, and the original plans of the garrison buildings. It is needless to say that these valuable relics were greatly appreciated. May 1, 1904, a dispatch from The Dalles recorded the following:

Through the efforts of the Sorosis Club, of this city, a recent act of congress has been passed by which one of the last remaining buildings of old Fort Dalles has come into the hands of the Oregon Historical Society for the purpose of preserving it as a landmark and relic of the pioneer settlement of this historic spot, with which some of our country's most famous soldiers and historians were identified.

Although now falling into decay and rapidly meeting the same fate of rack and ruin which has overtaken the other old barracks, the building is still in a reasonable state of preservation, its present condition evidencing the excellent workmanship, material and care used in its construction.

The house, which was built in 1858, was one of the row of officers' quarters, and was originally intended for the residence of the post surgeon. Its finishing lumber, window cases, mantle pieces, stair rails, window panes, etc., were brought around Cape Horn from New York, its dimension lumber and rough material being sawed out at the two government saw mills on Mill creek; one at the falls near the old Catholic mission; the other four miles up the stream.

This latter statement appears to contradict that of Mr. Scholl. When we consider the immense cost of these buildings, we are forced to the conclusion that Mr. Scholl is correct and that, with the exception of the window glass mentioned, the various finishing materials were the result of the handicraft of the workman employed at The Dalles on these once ornate edifices.

The chimneys were worked out of the sandstone quarries east of the fort, all the work being done by the soldiers of the post, with what little help could be secured from itinerant workmen picked up as they came and went on their way to the Willamette valley. Under the direction of Captain Thomas Jordan, the buildings were commenced, Louis Scholl, of Walla Walla, drafting the designs and architectural models; Rev. P. S. Knight, of Salem, and Colonel N. H. Gates, now deceased, of this city, both being employed in their erection.

Standing on the highest point of the old garrison enclosure in the southeast corner of the post, the old house faces northward across the abandoned parade ground and commands a magnificent view of the Columbia and its valley from the sharp turn in the river above the city to the gorge below Crate's Point. Although the history of its early occupancy is somewhat conflicting, Captain Black, of Company G, Ninth United States Infantry, who came with his company to the fort in 1852, was probably its first tenant.

According to the subsequent survey of The Dalles City, the old house occupies a peculiar location, being situated on the intersection of four city lots and directly across an alley. As the land upon which it is located was included in the bill donating it to the Historical Society, its old age will probably never be disturbed by the encroachment of modern homes, which have now almost taken possession of the old military reservation.

In years past the question of preserving this old building has been agitated without especial effort or result, until April, 1903, when Register J. P. Lucas, of The Dalles Land Office, at the request of the local board of the Woman's Federation of Clubs, took up the matter with the secretary of the interior with a view of securing the building to this society. In response to this correspondence and upon his representation of the dilapidated condition of the house, the local land officers were authorized by the secretary to sell the building, which had previously been appraised at a value of $1,100, for the sum of $100, if sold without the ground on which it stood, or for $140 including the site. This amount not being available in the local club, a conference was had with the officers of the Historical Society, at which it was determined to request our delegation in congress to secure the passage of a bill prepared by that society donating the property to their corporation. * * * With proper repairs this landmark can be made to last for many years to come, the sole survivor of this once famous fort, where passing immigrants and settlers could look for military protection in the upper Columbia country.

A picture of this historic edifice will be found in this work. An idea of the expense incurred in maintaining Fort Dalles may be gleaned from the fact that a quantity of hay purchased at San Francisco for use at the post cost the government $77 per ton laid down at The Dalles. The post was abandoned in 1866. Of this historic place the Times-Mountaineer of a comparatively recent date says:

"The old garrison buildings, the first erected at The Dalles, presents a picture of desolation sad to behold. Some of these were built at a great expense to the government, as material and labor commanded high prices. Many of them were elegant structures, but not having been repaired for many years, present the appearance of decay. The old guard-house in which many of the first soldiers on this frontier spent a repentant night, is almost a mass of ruins. Large stones have been dug out of the wall, and the building is gradually going to ruin. Several families are living in the houses, but the shiftless manner in which they leave the old historic landmarks to go to wreck is deplorable. Now that General Grant is nearing the end of his life's journey, very many will look upon this is a hallowed spot, as among its earliest associations was when Lieutenant U. S. Grant, then lately graduated from West Point, was stationed at this post."

This last statement is incorrect. General Grant, when a lieutenant, passed two weeks only here, while on a tour of inspection. General Grant, when on a later trip to Oregon, told S. L. Brooks this, which is, undoubtedly authentic.

PASSING EVENTS—1846 TO 1862.

Thus far this History of Wasco County has been devoted to Indian affairs, the Hudson's Bay Company, Lewis and Clark, the missions, the military post at The Dalles and the short campaign against Indians of the Oregon volunteers. Previous to 1846 no actual settler had come into this portion of the Territory to build himself a home and blaze a trail for others. A few trappers had penetrated the country, and in a few localities east of the Cascade mountains missions had been established to teach and regenerate the savages; later immigrants slowly won their way on a weary march to the Willamette valley, the ultima Thule of the earliest overlanders to Oregon.

But the year 1846 witnessed the appearance of the first settler, Joseph Lavendure, a French trapper. Contrary to the character of the average fur hunter, Lavendure established a land claim, built a log cabin, and fenced a few acres on what later became the Logan estate. But the discovery of auriferous deposits in California in the spring of 1848 induced him to abandon everything and he melted into oblivion, never to be afterward heard from by his successors in that locality. Later the military forces took possession of his personal property. Mrs. Lord is authority for the statement that Lavendure's claim later became known as the "Chrisman place." He built two log cabins; in the early '50's one of them was for a time occupied by a Frenchman named Narcisse Ramon.

It has been authentically settled that Nathan Olney was the second settler in Wasco county. In 1847 he "took up" a claim which was subsequently known as the "John Irvine place." Like Lavendure Olney went to the California gold fields; was financially successful, returned and retained his claim until 1853. He then sold it to Dr. Shaug, and secured another on Ten Mile creek for the purpose of raising stock. He disposed of this holding to James Bird and entered property subsequently known as the "Booth farm," on Five Mile. Mr. Olney had the reputation of having been the first "permanent" settler in this locality. Of his personality Mrs. Lord writes:

I have frequently mentioned Nathan Olney, who came to The Dalles in 1847. He was a prominent man in the country at that time, handsome, intelligent, genial, and a general favorite with men; but owing to his domestic relations he was not usually sought by women. (He was a squaw man.) * * * (In the middle fifties) Mr. Olney came to the conclusion that he was fitted to live a better life than he was then living. Times were changing. The country was settling up, and he craved the society of white women as well as white men. So he sent Annette to the reservation. They had two children at this time. He kept the elder and let her keep the babe.

This man had left home at fifteen years of age and grown up on the frontier, respected and well treated by men, never realizing the light in which he stood with refined women. After he had, as it were, swept and garnished his home, he set about finding a wife. After several refusals he discovered a lady who accepted him, and after one week they were married, on the first day of April, 1856. They were separated within less than a month. A divorce followed, and the Indian woman returned to a place in his home. After passing the following winter in the Sandwich Islands (a law having in the meantime been enacted by congress that men should not be allowed to live with Indian women without being married to them), in the spring Nathan Olney and his two younger brothers took their squaws down to a justice of the peace, and were married.

To Mr. Olney is accorded quite a prominent part in the early history of the county. Following the organization of Wasco county he was elected to a number of offices within its jurisdiction.

September 27, 1850, what was commonly called the Oregon Donation Claim law was passed by congress. This act granted to a married man and his wife who were in Oregon previous to the passage of the bill 640 acres of land, on the condition that they should cultivate and live on it four years, each receiving a title to 320 acres. It was under this law that the early settlers of Wasco county acquired homes. The donation law expired by limitation December 1, 1855.

Mr. J. W. Coventon has graphically described the country in the vicinity of The Dalles in 1850. That year he crossed the plains and in September camped near the mouth of Mill creek. This was a point where immigrants abandoned their horses and wagons and proceeded by the way of the Columbia river to the settlements in the Willamette valley. There were no steamboats; pioneers were compelled to utilize almost every conceivable kind of craft in which to float down stream. Invariably some difficulty was experienced in making a portage at the Cascades; but usually the sturdy pioneers were successful in getting their boats around the rapids. There is a chapter of hardships in this portion of the toilsome journey; it may never be fully written. It is the testimony of Mr. Coventon that there were above one hundred old wagons in every stage of dilapidation scattered about the place where now stands The Dalles. Crippled and half-starved cows and oxen were seen on the hillsides. Too weak and emaciated to be driven further they had been turned loose to die or recuperate as fate might determine. On Mill creek there was one cabin, near the rock pile, and here a few articles of merchandise were kept for sale. On the bluffs were camped a company of soldiers, near where now stands the academy; they then lived in tents.

At this period the only residence house, aside from the mission, was owned by Nathan Olney. It was this house, doubtless, that Mr. Coventon referred to. The same year Judge William C. Laughlin built a cabin at Crate's Point, but having been notified by the military authorities that he was on the reservation, he promptly abandoned it. Mr. Laughlin and Dr. Farnsworth settled at Hood River in 1852, built houses and there passed one winter. The season proved unusually severe; nearly all their stock died, and they abandoned their claims. In the spring of 1853 Judge Laughlin returned to The Dalles.

Mrs. Elizabeth Lord, daughter of Judge Laughlin, in her "Reminiscences of Eastern Oregon," thus tells of the building of their first home here:

Father, while hunting along the rivers and sloughs for ducks and geese, had frequently noticed Crate's Point, and thought it must be five miles from the post, and would be a place where he could raise stock if he concluded to stay; at any rate he would stay for the winter and try, so he moved the camp down there and set it up in front of a rock which was in the shape of a fireplace and served that purpose very well. He then began cutting trees and shaping logs for a house. He cut small ones, so with what assistance mother could give him, as there was no man he could get to help him, the work went on. It was interfered with by hours of hunting for game with which to supply the table and an occasional trip to Olney's store for supplies which we were obliged to have. * * * After the cabin had been laid up ready to put the rafters on, we were notified that we were within the limits of the reservation, so of course the work ceased.

After abandoning the partially prepared home at Crate's Point, the family lived in tents, making camp at different places in the vicinity of The Dalles. It was after this that in company with Dr. Farnsworth that they removed to Hood River.

Crate's Point was named in honor of Edward Crate, at one time employed by the Hudson's Bay Company. Early in 1850 he located on the point that now bears his name. The Dalles Times-Mountaineer, of July, 1891, places the date in the year 1848. These dates, however, refer to his location at The Dalles. While in the employment of the Hudson's Bay Company he had passed through the Indian village of Winquatt, on the present site of The Dalles, so early as 1837.

Mr. Justin Chenoweth was engaged in carrying the United States mail and lived in a sort of cave on the banks of the river in 1851-2, below a residence site later occupied by Mr. Klindt, at the mouth of a creek which now bears his name. In the fall of 1852 he erected a large, substantial building there, married and took a donation claim. For a number of years he strove to create a town in that vicinity, but realizing that his efforts would not prove successful he moved to where Mr. Vanbibber subsequently lived.

Although he had come to the country some time previous Mr. Charles W. Denton, the pioneer fruit raiser of this section, set out his first orchard on Mill Creek in 1854. In 1853 D. Bolton had located on Fifteen Mile, where he began farming on quite an extensive scale; he is said to have been the first farmer to raise a crop of wheat in Oregon east of the Cascade mountains. These men mentioned were the pioneer agriculturists of Wasco county, and to them is due great credit for having developed the agricultural resources of what has become one of the most productive grain sections of the northwest.

In June, 1851, the Herbert family, who had been living at The Dalles, removed across the Cascade mountains. With the departure of Mrs. Herbert, Mrs. Laughlin remained the only white woman in eastern Oregon; until immigration began there was none other. In 1852 George Snipes first settled on what was later known as his "lower place," seven miles below The Dalles. L. C. Coe, James Jenkins and J. M. Benson settled at Hood River in 1854. The same year John A. Simms filed a donation claim on the "Chrisman place," long known as the "Logan estate." William Logan was the father of Dr. Logan. Early in the '50's James Mosier built a house on the bank of the creek which now bears his name; Messrs. John Dyer and Green Arnold settled upon Three Mile; R. R. Thompson, Indian agent, filed east of the Logan estate, which property later became known as Thompson's addition, and O. Humason also came about this time.

After 1852, and for a number of years during the '50's, the country which is now Wasco county, was settled quite rapidly. It would be impossible to mention all who came at that period to The Dalles and vicinity. With the gradual unfolding of important local events in the course of this history, many of their names will appear.

During these earliest years of settlement and founding of the town of The Dalles—the first in eastern Oregon—there was gradually coming into existence on the Columbia river quite a fleet of steamers. These have entered into the history of Wasco county; it is our purpose to briefly sketch the story of the early steamboating up to the formation of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, which event will be reserved to a more appropriate place in its chronological order.

From so reliable an authority as Mr. P. W. Gillette it is learned that the first steamboat built above the Cascades was the James R. Flint. The promoters and constructors of this pioneer river craft were the Bradfords, J. O. Vanbergen and James R. Flint, of San Francisco. She is described by Mr. Gillette as "a small, side-wheel boat, with single engine geared to the shafts, and when in motion sounded more like a threshing machine than a steamboat." Dr. Newell was a passenger on her first trip down from The Dalles. It is related that for some time he appeared nervous and somewhat disturbed. At length he ventured to ask one of the crew the cause of "that rattling sound."

"Oh," replied the fresh-water sailor man, "that's only the cook grinding coffee."

The Flint was conveyed over the Cascades in the autumn of 1861 and traded between Portland and Oregon City. Eventually she was bisected, lengthened, the machinery of the old Columbia

(the first steamer on the river to run as far inland as the Cascades) placed within her, and re-named the Fashion.

The Mary was the second boat navigated by steam to ply between the Cascades and The Dalles. She was, also, constructed by the Bradfords. Soon after the completion of the Mary the Bradfords built the Hassalo to make the Cascades and Dalles run. In the meantime R. R. Thompson, L. W. Coe and others were not neglecting the opportunities offered in the way of steam navigation. A small craft was built by them at the upper Cascades to be taken to the upper Columbia beyond Celilo. When ready for her maiden trip, by some error of judgment her lines were cast off before she had acquired sufficient head of steam, and she drifted over the falls. Yet so little was she injured that she was run down to Portland, refitted and sold for the Fraser river trade.

At Celilo, in 1859, the same parties constructed the Wright, the first steam craft that ever lashed the waters of the Columbia beyond Celilo. This boat was a money-maker. Prior to the appearance of the Wright all freight was transported on schooner-rigged barges. During a portion of each year there prevailed a stiff breeze on that reach of the river, which often enabled these hermaphrodite craft to make good time. They continued in commission as late as 1862, when steam-power crowded them off the river. Captain Dick Williams, S. G. Reed and others built the Belle, the first boat to run regularly between the Cascades and Portland. There were few, if any settlers, in these days east of the Cascades. Consequently all transportation was for the government; soldiers, guns, military supplies, etc. The Mountain Buck, built by Ruckles & Olmstead, was put into commission between Portland and the Cascades. Soon after these parties built the little steamer Wasco, for trade between the Cascades and The Dalles, which with their "portage road," gave them a through line to The Dalles. This was about 1859 or 1860. By this line much business was deflected from the portage road on the north side of the river and the boats running in connection with it.

The steamers Belle, Senorita and Multnomah, one of which ran down as far as Astoria, were owned by Benjamin Stark, S. G. Reed, R. Williams, Hoyt and Wells. The portage road from Dalles City, around The Dalles to Celilo, fifteen miles, was owned by O. Humason. This was a road traversed by immense freight wagons drawn by oxen and mules, for transportation of freight, and stages to carry passengers, until the construction of the portage railroad in 1862. The steamer Allen, built by the Hudson's Bay Company in 1852, was commanded by Captain Thomas Gladwell. In 1854 she was wrecked near Mitchell's point. The Idaho, built by Colonel Ruckles in 1860, was subsequently sold to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. This company also built the Onconta in 1863, and she was commanded by Captain McNulty.

In the introductory portion of this work, Part I, has been related the story of the evolution of the government of Oregon. Under what was termed the "Provisional Government" (which continued in force until August 14, 1848, when congress was, figuratively, whipped into granting a regular territorial form of government) there were no regular "county organizations." Instead Oregon was divided into four "districts," Tualatin, Yamhill, Clackamas and Champoeg. The Clackamas district comprised what is now eastern Oregon, all of Montana west of the Rocky mountains, and all of the present states of Idaho and Washington. These districts and their boundaries as recommended by the executive committee and approved by the people July 5, 1843, were as follows:

First district to be called Tualatin District, comprising all the country south of the northern boundary line of the United States; west of the Wallamet, or Multnomah river; north of the Yamhill river, and east of the Pacific ocean.

Second district, to be called the Yamhill District, embracing all the country west of the Wallamet or Multnomah river, and a supposed line running north and south from said river; south of the Yamhill river, to the parallel of forty-two degrees north latitude, or the boundary line of the United States and California, and east of the Pacific ocean.

Third district, to be called the Clackamas District, comprehending all territory not included in the other three districts.

Fourth district, to be called the Champoeg District, and bounded on the north by a supposed line down from the mouth of the Haunchauke river, running due east to the Rocky mountains; west of the Wallamet or Multnomah river, and a supposed line running due south from said river to the parallel of forty-two degrees north latitude, south of the boundary line of the United States and California, and east of the summit of the Rocky mountains.

By this it will be seen that the original Wasco county was formed from what had been the Clackamas and Champoeg districts. Apparently the second, or Yamhill district, did not come into existence although authorized by the first legislative body.

WASCO THE MOTHER OF COUNTIES.

It was created by the Oregon Territorial legislature January 11, 1854. It was then the largest county in the United States and included that part of Oregon territory lying east of the Cascade range to the Rocky mountains, and from the Columbia river and the 46th parallel south to the 42d parallel. Its area of about 130,000 square miles, embraced more territory than the British Isles, or than any present state of the union with the exception of Texas or California, and more than twice the area of New England. During the passing years since then the county has been sliced into a fraction of Wyoming, most of Idaho, and the counties of Baker, Umatilla, Union, Grant, Crook, Gilliam, Wheeler, Sherman, Morrow, Lake, Klamath, Harney and Malheur, in Oregon, until its present area is only 2,962 square miles, of which 324 square miles are in the Warm Springs Indian Reservation.

In more detailed recapitulation it may be said that a part of Silver Bow and Ravalli counties, Montana, were once a part of Wasco—and of Idaho the southern part of the Nez Perce, all of Idaho, Lemhi, Washington, Boise, Custer, Fremont Canyon, Ada, Elmore, Blaine, Bingham, Owyhee, Lincoln, Bannock, Bear Lake, Oneida and Cassia, eighteen, and a fraction of another. Of the present Wyoming it contained Vinta, Fremont and Sweetwater counties, and, in addition to other territory heretofore described, the southwestern corner of Yellowstone Park. January 19, 1905, Mrs. C. J. Crandall, writing in The Dalles Daily Chronicle, said:

"It is interesting to follow the metes and bounds of this county of such gigantic proportions. East on the Columbia river and the 46th degree near Wallula, crossing the Snake river near the mouth of Salmon river, on through the state of Idaho, with Grangeville and Mqunt Idaho on the Oregon side, crossing the Bitter Root mountains into Montana in the region of Silver Bow county, perhaps near Butte, which city stands on the crest of the Rocky mountains near the 46th parallel. Thence southerly along the summits of the Rockies, cutting off the southwestern corner of the Yellowstone Park, and quite a chunk out of the western side of Wyoming, intersecting the 42d degree near the South Pass, through which was the old emigrant road; thence west on the 42d degree to the Cascade mountains, having for southern boundary parts of Wyoming, Utah Nevada, and the eastern half of northern California."

In its chronological order the loss of territory from the original Wasco county will be told as this work progresses. It is, however, proper to say here that by an act of March 3, 1853, the country north of the Columbia and the 46th parallel was organized into a separate Territory and named Washington. In all this vast area known as Wasco county, there were not at the time of its organization to exceed three hundred white citizens, most of whom were trappers in the employment of the Hudson's Bay, and American Fur companies. Less than half a hundred were actual settlers, and Mrs. Crandall records that Major Rains, of the Fourth Infantry, stationed during the winter of 1853-4 at The Dalles, opposed the organization of the county, not only on account of its mammoth and unwieldy proportions, but for the further fact that, as estimated by himself, there were only thirty-five white inhabitants in the whole proposed county. Yet this little handful of patriots was composed of sturdy pioneers who carved from this tenantless wilderness a mighty empire. They were in the main true and law-abiding citizens, who sought county government as a protection to their property and as a safeguard against the ravages of the lawless element that then, throughout the northwest, held sway.

Following is the complete text of the organic act creating this historical political division:

An Act to create and organize Wasco county:

Section 1. Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oregon—that so much of said Territory of Oregon as is bounded as follows, to-wit: Commencing at the Cascades of the Columbia river, thence running up said river to the point where the southern shore of said river is intersected by the Southern boundary of Washington Territory, thence east along said boundary to the eastern boundary of Oregon Territory, thence southerly along the eastern boundary of said Territory to the southern boundary of the same; thence west along said southern boundary to the Cascade mountains; thence northerly along said range of mountains to the place of beginning; be and the same is hereby created and organized into a separate county, to be called Wasco county, with the same organization, rights, powers and duties as appertain to other counties in this Territory.

(ENDORSED.)

H. B. No. 28. An act to create and organize Wasco county. Originated in House of Representatives. John McCracken, clerk. Enrolled January 11, 1854.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

State of Oregon—Office of the Secretary of State: I, F. I. Dunbar, Secretary of the State of Oregon, and Custodian of the Seal of said State; do hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true and complete copy of "An Act to create and organize Wasco County," together with the endorsements thereon, as filed in my office and custody.

In Testimony Whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the Capitol, at Salem, Oregon, this 24th day of February, A. D., 1905.

F. I. DUNBAR,
Secretary of State.

The first meeting of the Wasco county board of commissioners, of which there is any record, was held April 3, 1854. Undoubtedly one or more previous meetings had been held, following the approval of the organic act, January 11, 1854, and before April 3d. The gentlemen named in the enabling act as commissioners qualified and were present during the proceedings which follow. But little business was transacted at the meeting of April 3d. Precinct officers were appointed, an account of which will be found in the political chapter relating to Wasco county. Another meeting was held April 24th, but this was, practically, without result.

Two days later, April 26th, the commissioners again assembled, and this time they were more fortunate in finding some official material upon which they could work. William C. Laughlin was elected chairman of the board. Following are the proceedings as they appear on the commissioners' journal:

Granted license to Orlando Humason to keep a ferry on Snake river at any point within a distance of three miles above or below Fort Boise, said ferry only required to be kept in time of the emigration passing; assessed the tax for license at fifty dollars per annum for the term of two years; rate of ferrying to be for a wagon and persons belonging thereto, four dollars; for cattle and horses, one dollar per head; for sheep twenty-five cents per head.

Granted to Richard Marshall license to keep a ferry at or near Salmon Falls, on Snake river, for the term of two years with the same tax rates and provisions as to O. Humason.

Granted to C. E. Irvine license to keep a ferry on Green river, at a point on said river eighty miles above the boundary line between Utah and Oregon Territories, with the same tax rates, provisions, and the same term of years as before.

Granted license to J. L. Henderson to keep a grocery at The Dalles for six months at the rate of fifty dollars tax per annum, commencing on the first day of April, A. D., 1854.

The proceedings of July 3d were, in part, as follows:

License was granted to Justin Chenoweth to keep a ferry across the Columbia river at or near The Dalles for the term of two years; assessed the tax at five dollars, the rate of ferryage to be as follows: For each loose animal one dollar; for horses with rider one dollar and fifty cents; horse with pack, sheep or hog, twenty-five cents; for a man fifty cents.

License was granted to Matthew Finlay to keep a ferry across the Columbia river at or near Wind mountain for the term of two years; assessed the tax at eight dollars with the foregoing rates.

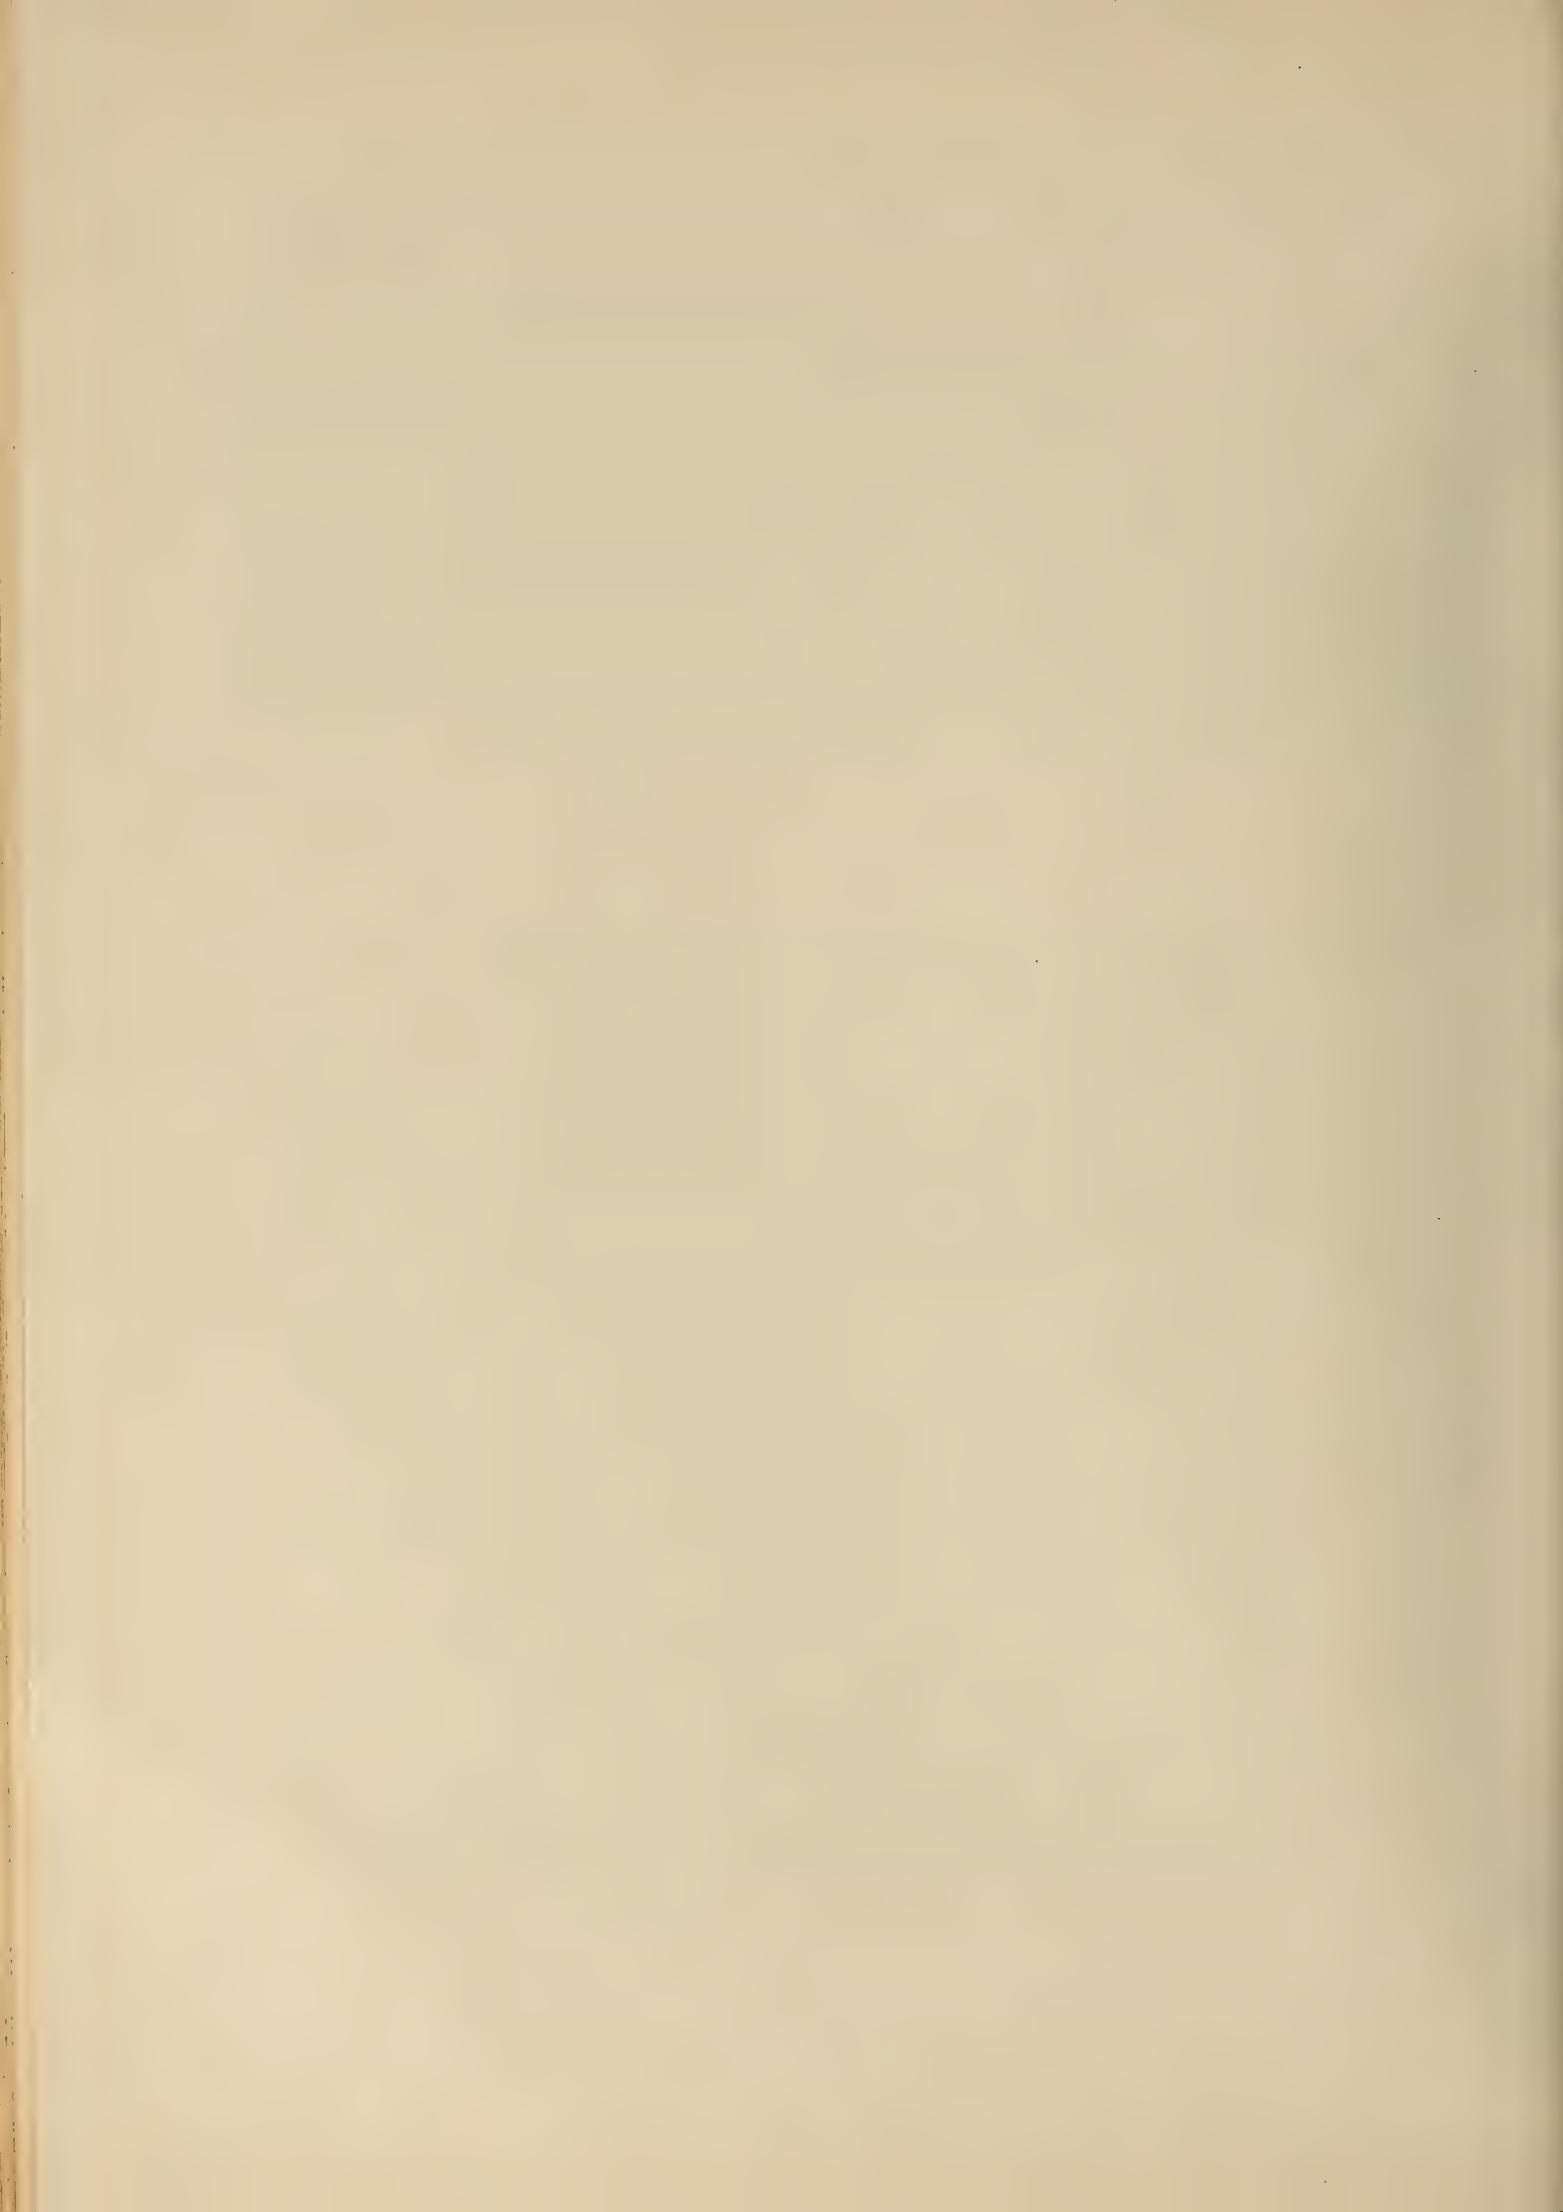

O. Humason's tax to keep a ferry on Boise river was reduced from fifty to twelve dollars.

It also appears that the commissioners appointed a place of voting at the house of Mr. Forsythe. At a subsequent meeting of the board held December 4, 1854, Wasco county was divided into three commissioners' districts, the boundaries being described as follows:

"The first district beginning at the Falls of the Cascades, running east to Dog (Hood) river; south to the boundary line of the county. The second district commencing at Dog river, running east to Five Mile creek; the center of that stream being the divide between that district and the third district, which shall include the eastern balance of the county; the southern and northern line of each district being the established county line."

This division into commissioners' districts is rather vague and indefinite. Hood river and Five Mile creek run only a comparatively short distance into the interior of the immense territory then embraced by Wasco county. Of course the only settlements at that period were in the northern part of the county in the vicinity of The Dalles. These commissioners' districts were, also, the road districts, having the same boundaries and being numbered one, two and three. At the meeting of December 4, the commissioners authorized the levying of a tax of seventeen mills upon each dollar of taxable property in the county (and it is certain that at that period this tax could raise but little revenue, military property being exempt). This was in addition to the Territorial tax of one mill upon each dollar and two mills upon each dollar for school purposes. This brought the total tax up to two per cent.

The first session of district court held in Wasco county convened at The Dalles August 14, 1854. Judge Cyrus Olney, one of the justices of the Oregon Territorial supreme court presided. Other officers of this court were William R. Gibson, clerk; B. M. Reynolds, sheriff; and N. Huber, prosecuting attorney. The court organized by the selection of the following named gentlemen empaneled as a grand jury: W. C. Laughlin, foreman; John A. Sims, John Tompkins, R. Marshall, L. P. Henderson, J. A. Stoley, W. C. Keith, M. M. Cushing, J. H. Mosier, S. S. Moore, Charles E. Evelyn, John Irvin, Thomas Martin, Justin Chenoweth, John Wamsley and John Matthias. The initial cause given to the petit jury was an action at law; Roger G. Atwell vs. Felix J. Imans. The plaintiff was represented by Mr. Chenoweth; the defendant by Mr. Campbell. The jury summoned to try this cause consisted of L. W. Coe, William Jenkins, John Whitebread, George Cannon, Mark Cole, L. J. Kimberland, Matthew Duffa, Hiram Russell,

The gold mines at that place had been discovered the year previous, and hundreds of desperate characters had flocked thither. Way was among the number. His avarice induced him to murder a companion named Gallagher, and appropriate his money and horses. Gallagher's death soon became known to the miners, and the crime of his murder was then fastened upon Way. The deputy sheriff was the only peace officer in that section, and Way was taken in custody by that official. Jails were then unknown, and miners' wages being $5 a day, while the deputy's was only $2, he could not afford to stand guard over the prisoner or hire an assistant, so Way was tied to a log for safe keeping. One night he escaped, but was recaptured at Boise and brought back to Canyon City. Having been put to considerable trouble in recapturing the murderer, the deputy sheriff refused to further inconvenience himself by bringing the prisoner to The Dalles to be tried. It was a journey of 200 miles through an Indian country, with savages who were no respectors of even high officials, lurking behind every wayside hiding place. The deputy sheriff determined to be put to no more trouble by Way, and calling to his assistance a number of trusted friends, proceeded to serve in the capacity of judge, jury and executioner, and Berry Way expiated his crime on the gallows.

The beginning of the gradual reduction in size of Wasco county was in 1859. February 14th of that year Oregon was admitted to statehood; its bounds were defined as we now know them. This act of congress took from Wasco county fully one-third of its territory. To Washington territory was annexed that portion of Wasco county east of the Snake river; west of the Rocky mountains and between the 46th and 42d degrees of north latitude. Five years later this tract became southern Idaho. Later in this work will be recorded the history of additional slicing from Wasco territory.

But now it is eminently fitting that the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, which, in its day, proved so important a factor in the history, not only of Wasco county, but of the entire northwest, should be briefly noticed. We have previously told of the earliest navigation of the Columbia river; by canoes, batteaux, schooner-rigged barges and pioneer steamboats. It is ours now to describe the formation of all the water transportation interests into one of the greatest and most oppressive monopolies of the new northwest. We quote from the Daily Astorian of February, 1892:

But it was the Oregon Steam Navigation Company that made the money. Probably no steamboat corporation ever run business on so liberal a scale or ever made so much money in a very thinly settled community. An old purser of one of the steamers told an Astorian reporter that one year the profits on the boat that he was on were over $65,000. The company gave considerable latitude to its employes. It got good men, gave them big wages, and so long as the boats made money didn't look after them very closely. The Oregon Steam Navigation Company came from small beginnings. Captain J. C. Ainsworth was the prime mover. With him were R. R. Thompson, S. G. Reed and W. S. Ladd. When Jay Cooke was building the Northern Pacific railroad he bought out the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. When Cooke went broke in 1873 the original owners bought their former property back for one-third of what they had received for it from the great Northern Pacific financier, and then made more money than ever.

The Dixie Thompson was built at Portland in 1871. The Emma Hayward in Portland in 1878. She is still making money and was recently brought back from the Sound. The Bonita was built at Portland in 1875; she is still making money for her owners. The Welcome was built at Portland in 1874; the Wide West, the company's finest boat, at the same city in 1877. She was worth $150,000, and was broken up three years ago. The S. G. Reed was constructed at Portland in 1878; the R. R. Thompson, now plying between Astoria and Portland, was built at The Dalles, the same year. The Mountain Queen was built at The Dalles in 1877. The Annie Faxon, now running to Lewiston, was built at Celilo in 1877, and the John Gates at the same place in 1878. The Harvest Queen, one of the Union Pacific boats, plying between Astoria and Portland, was built at the latter place the same year.

In 1878 Henry Villard was appointed to represent the German creditors of American railways. At that time some of those parties had an interest in the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, and Villard managed his trust in such a way that it was found convenient to compromise with him. He relinquished his hold upon the railway and secured an interest in the steamship business. At that time the Oregon Steamship Company had two vessels, the George W. Elder and the City of Chester. It is said that while managing this business for his principals he aided in placing the Great Republic in opposition. This vessel was wrecked at Sand Island in 1879. While that vessel was making inroads upon the ocean business of the pro-rating companies, experts were busy acquiring information as to the precise amount and character of business done by river steamers. On every steamer was placed an expert, whose business it was, pencil and book in hand, to note all freight received and discharged; the number of cabin fares and the number of passengers carried on the lower deck. From such information furnished daily for several weeks, a pretty accurate idea of the value of the traffic was obtained and calculations made to determine the strength of the company and the probable cost of successful competition and the resultant gain.

Villard had begun the scheme for the reorganization of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and worked on it for some time. He gave up the idea of competition and concluded he would supplant the old company and made overtures for its purchase. He had no money himself, but relied on his ability to show capitalists an opportunity to make considerable. He talked with Ainsworth, Ladd and Reed for several months, but at last they told him he must put up some money or quit talking. But while he was talking he was getting others interested, and at last he got an option on the Oregon Steam & Navigation Company for one year by paying $100,000. This option was dated May 23, 1879.

With considerable effort Villard got the $100,000, paid it to Ladd and Reed, and with his bonds, option and stock, started east. He had been in correspondence with Jay Gould, and tried hard to make that wily wizard take hold, but there wasn't enough in it for him, and he refused. Then Villard took his option and script to Germany, but couldn't make it work and came back to New York considerably discouraged. But he went to Boston and succeeded in getting Endicott and Pullman interested in the scheme. They put up the money, and twelve years ago he bought the Oregon Steamship Company. On the 31st of the following March he bought the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, for which he paid $2,300,000.

The stock and bonds were sold at a heavy discount to Boston capitalists, and with what was left after buying the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, a railroad was built from Celilo to connect with the Walla Walla & Columbia River Railroad. The stock went to a very high figure and all concerned made big money, Villard and his friends retaining control of the stock. This was soon worth twice what it had cost, and the stock was watered and watered again, until finally it represented $15,000,000.

Mr. P. W. Gillette, from whom we have previously quoted, contributed the following historical sketch of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, October 24, 1900:

By 1859 the transportation business had greatly increased, and there being two complete through lines between Portland and The Dalles, produced strained relations between the two opposing companies, and a rate war seemed imminent. Several efforts had already been made to combine all the different interests under one management, but all had failed. At length an arrangement was reached. The portage roads at the Cascades; all the steamboats, wharfboats and property belonging with them, were appraised each at its cost value, the whole amounting to $175,000. On the 27th day of December, 1860, articles of incorporation were signed, and filed at Vancouver, Clark county, Washington Territory, incorporating the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, shares, $500 each. There were sixteen shareholders, the largest being R. R. Thompson, with 120 shares; Ladd & Tilton, 80 shares; T. M. Lyles, 76 shares; J. Kamm, 57 shares; J. C. Ainsworth, 40 shares; and so on down, the smallest shareholder having but three shares.

In October, 1862, the company filed new articles of incorporation with the secretary of state at Salem, and also with the county clerk of Multnomah county, Oregon, with a capital stock of $2,000,000, represented by twenty-five shareholders, at $500 a share. Bradford & Company were the largest shareholders, having 758 shares, R. R. Thompson, 672; Harrison Olmstead, 558; Jacob Kamm, 354; and so on, the smallest shareholder having but eight shares. This corporation put both portage roads and the gorge of the Columbia into the hands of a corporation, giving it perfect control of all transportation to and from every point beyond the Cascades. Thus owning both portages and all the steamboats, it is needless to say that the Oregon Steam Navigation Company found it unnecessary to consult any one as to what prices they should charge. Such an opportunity, with such unlimited power seldom ever falls into the hands of men. It made them the absolute owners of every dollar's worth of freight and passage, going up or down the great valley on the second largest river in America.

In 1855 there were no settlers living beyond the Des Chutes river, but after that date they began to spread out over the country pretty fast. Previous to that date, the government had given transportation companies nearly all the carrying they had. But by 1860 the natural growth of the country was making considerable business. In 1861 the discovery of gold on Orofino awakened new life in the valley of the Columbia. As if by magic the tardy wheels of commerce were unfettered; human thought and energy unshackled and turned loose with determined purpose to meet the great emergency and reap the golden harvest.

From Portland to "Powder River, Orofino and Florence City" mines the country resounded with the busy whirl of trade. All the steamboats and portage roads were taxed to their greatest capacity. So great was the demand for transportation the Oregon Steam Navigation Company had to build new steamboats and improve their roads at the Cascades. The old portage wagon road at The Dalles was entirely inadequate to do the immense business, and the company was obliged to build a railroad from Dalles City to Celilo, fifteen miles. So enormous were the charges for freight and passage, I am creditably informed, that the steamer Okanogan paid the entire cost of herself on her first trip. It makes my head swim now, as memory carries me back to those wonderful rushing days, when the constant fall of chinking coin into the coffers of the company was almost like the flow of a dashing torrent. The Oregon Steam Navigation Company had become a millionaire-making machine.

The price of freight from Portland to The Dalles, about one hundred miles, was $40 per ton; from The Dalles to Celilo, fifteen miles, $15 per ton; from The Dalles to Wallula, $55 per ton; and from Portland to Lewiston, $120 per ton. All freights, excepting solids, such as lead, nails, etc, were estimated by measurement; forty cubic feet making a ton. Passage from Portland to The Dalles was $8, and seventy-five cents extra for meals. From Portland to Lewiston passage was $60, and meals and beds were $1 each.

* * * H. D. Sanborn, a merchant of Lewiston, in 1862 informed me that among a lot of freight consigned to him was a case of miner's shovels. The freight, $120 per ton, made the freight on each shovel $1. A merchant at Hood River said that, always, before the railroad was built, freight from Portland to Hood River, 85 miles, on a dozen brooms was $1. To better illustrate the method of measurement, I will have to relate an anecdote:

When O. B. Gibson was in the employment of the company at The Dalles, he was down to get the measurement of a small mounted cannon that had to be shipped for the government. After measuring several ways and figuring up the amount, he seemed so much perplexed that he attracted the attention of two soldiers who were lying in the shade of a pine tree near by. One of them finally called out, "What's the trouble, Cap?"

"I am trying to take the measurement of this blamed gun, but somehow I can't get it right," replied Mr. Gibson.

"Oh, I'll show you," said the soldier, leading up a pair of harnessed mules that stood near, and hitching them to the gun, "try it now, Cap." "Thanks; that makes it all right. I see now why I could not get the correct measurement." (Evidently he measured the mules, too, as would seem from the following:)

In measuring a wagon or any piece of freight, the full length, height and thickness were taken and carried out full size, the largest way of the piece. To make the method of tonnage clearer, I will give you one more illustration. "Old Captain" T. W. Lyles, of San Francisco, was a large stockholder in the company, and frequently visited Portland to look after his interests. Once while here he attended a meeting of the board of directors. After the principal part of the business had been transacted, Captain Lyles arose and said:

"Mr. Chairman, I move that Eph. Day, a purser on one of our boats, be discharged from the service of this company."

Now Eph. Day was one of the favorite pursers, and everybody sprang up to know what was the matter with Eph. Day. After quiet had been restored Captain Lyles said:

"I see, gentlemen, that Eph. Day is purser on a boat of only 150 tons register, yet I find that he comes in at the end of every trip with a report of having carried from 250 to 300 tons of freight, and, gentlemen, he substantiates his report by bringing in the cash for those amounts of freights. Now while I do not claim to be much of a steamboat man, yet I can see, gentlemen, that if you allow our boats to be overladen in this manner and made to carry twice as much as they are designed to carry, they will soon be worn out and we will have no boats."

The meeting adjourned amidst roars of laughter and Eph. Day kept his place and still measured up big loads of freight.

The Florence gold excitement of 1862 brought the Oregon Steam Navigation Company a flood of prosperity. They could not possibly take all the business offered. At Portland the rush of freight to the docks of the company was so great that drays and trucks had to form in line to get their turn in delivering their goods. Their lines were kept unbroken day and night for weeks and months. Shippers were obliged to use the greatest vigilance and take every advantage to get their goods away. Often a merchant would place a large truck in line early in the morning, then fill it by dray loads during the day. That great rush continued for months. * * *

Unquestionably the Oregon Steam Navigation Company held in check and kept back the growth of the country east of the Cascade mountains for years, though perhaps unintentionally on its part. It had so long been accustomed to receive such exceedingly liberal compensation for its service, that I have no doubt that they believed farm products could not be carried to Portland at rates that would leave anything to the farmer. Captain James W. Troup, who commanded one of the boats on the upper river, said to me that he had so many applications to bring wheat to Portland, which he had no authority to do, that he finally went to the president of the company and asked for permission to do so, but he was informed that it was impossible; that wheat was not worth its transportation. The next season the people fairly begged him to carry their wheat to market, and he made another appeal. This time the company yielded, and President J. C. Ainsworth said: "Well, Captain Troup, you may try it; do the best you can." Wheat has been pouring down the Columbia ever since, and the Inland Empire is one vast wheat field. * * *

In reviewing the career of this most interesting corporation one can but view with wonder and amazement the ease and rapidity with which colossal fortunes were made. And I can but regret, on their own account, that not one of that company has left any little token of good will, or any memento of kindness to the place or people where they were so splendidly favored by fortune, and so liberally patronized by the business public. Had they even erected a small drinking foun-

The discovery of gold in what is now Idaho, and the subsequent rush to the upper country, was a means of bringing Wasco county to the fore. The Dalles, then the only town, evolved into a city; much of the county's history of the Dalles. The increased activity at this town also '60's will be told in the chapter devoted to The had the effect of settling the adjacent portion of the county. The mining rush created a lucrative market for stock; the stock interests of Wasco county began to attract attention abroad; The Dalles became a center of this important industry. New settlers scattered themselves among the bunch-grass hills; cattlemen drove their herds into Wasco county, where the abundance of feed and mild climate were favorable to the interests of stockmen. Before many years had elapsed the products of the ranges contributed as much wealth as did the mines of the northern and eastern sections. True, lack of facilities for transportation to the markets of the east proved a serious drawback, but adventurous spirits were soon driving large bands of beef cattle across the plains and mountains to railroad connections at Cheyenne. The entire summer season was required to complete the drive. The sheep industry received an impetus, and has since proved a lucrative resource.

PASSING EVENTS—1862 TO 1905.

Previous to the discovery of mines in eastern Oregon and Idaho, in the early '60's, the greater part of the population of the mammoth county of Wasco was at, or near, The Dalles. But with the influx of miners to the camps in the John Day, Birch Creek and Powder river regions, it became almost an impossibility for new settlers to transact official business with a county seat so far removed from their neighborhood. Petitions were therefore presented to the legislature in 1862 asking for the establishment of two new counties; one to include the Powder river regions; the other the settlements on John Day and Umatilla rivers. The legislature passed two bills, one of which created Baker, the other Umatilla, county. In the compiled session laws of Oregon, 1862, will be found the following:

Boundaries of original Baker county: All that portion of Wasco county, commencing at a point where the 46th parallel of latitude crosses the summit of the Blue Mountains; thence east along said line to its intersection with Snake river; thence up the middle of the channel of said river to the mouth of the Owyhee river; thence south to the 42d parallel of latitude; thence west along said line to its intersection with the 118th parallel of west longitude; thence north, along said line to the summit of the Blue Mountains; thence along the summit of said mountains, between the waters of Burnt and Powder rivers, and the waters of John Day's river to the place of beginning.

This act was approved September 22, 1862.

The same year Baker county was amputated from Wasco county. It then embraced the territory in the present counties of Baker, Union, Wallowa and Malheur counties. The session laws of 1862 also thus describe the boundaries of the original Umatilla county:

All that portion of Wasco county, beginning in the middle of the channel of the Columbia river opposite the mouth of Willow creek; thence up the middle of the channel of said river to the point where the 46th parallel of latitude crosses said river; thence east along said parallel to the summit of the Blue Mountains; thence southwest along the summit of said mountains to the divide between the middle and south fork of John Day's river; thence northwest along said divide to its intersection with the south fork of John Day's river; thence down the channel of said river to its junction with the north fork of said river; and from thence northerly along the ridge dividing the waters of John Day's and Willow creek to the place of beginning.

This act was approved September 27, 1862. The boundaries of Umatilla county included the present counties of Union, Grant and Morrow. By act of the Oregon legislature of October 14, 1864, Grant county was cut off from Wasco and November 7th, of the same year the new political division was organized. The territory at that time cut off as Grant county, embraced the territory now comprising Grant, Harney, Lake and Klamath counties. But a small portion of this territory, it will be remembered, had already been separated from Wasco county, the upper part of the present Grant county having been set off as a part of Umatilla in 1862.

In 1865 the population of the territory then included in Wasco county, according to a state census, was 1,898. The United States census of 1870 accorded it a population of 2,509. Until this latter year little attention had been given to agriculture. When the whites first settled in this section the entire country was covered with a luxuriant growth of natural grasses; this fact suggested to the husbandman its adaptability to stock-raising. Wasco county was one vast cattle range, only so much land being cultivated as was necessary to supply home demand with flour and hay; nothing was raised for export and, as has been shown in our story of early steam transportation on the Columbia and Snake rivers, freight rates left no profit to the shipper. Wasco county agriculture was—for a period—smothered at its birth by transportation monopolies. From the period of its earliest settlement to 1870 this county was the range of the "cowboy;" but gradually cattle ranches gave way to wheat farms; the bunch grass hills were converted into fields of golden grain.

At first this agricultural industry was confined to the verdant valleys through which coursed the sparkling streams. The pioneer hill farmer—the typical western Highlander—was Mr. Edward ("Dutch") Mahn, of Fifteen Mile creek. In 1864 he planted a wheat field on the summit of the hills surrounding that creek. While his experiment was unqualifiedly successful, for a number of years thereafter only a few followed his example. But in 1875 hill farming became general; large tracts of bunch grass land were sown to wheat and heavy harvests were reaped. It was simply a duplicate of the agricultural history of Oregon's neighboring Territory to the north, Washington. Not until late in the '60's was the hill country of Wasco county considered fit for agricultural purposes. January 1, 1898, The Dalles Times-Mountaineer said:

"Up to late in the '60's the hill lands of Wasco were considered worthless for agricultural purposes, and were valuable only as pasture lands for countless herds of stock; but some time in this decade 'Dutch' Mahn, a settler some four miles east of the present site of Dufur, planted, unknown to himself a few grains of wheat that had accidentally become mixed with other seeds; to his astonishment the grain produced well and matured; the experiment was successfully repeated and soon small fields began to appear on the higher lands. Strange to say the first settlers were the last to take advantage of the wonderful adaptability of the soil to grain, and to this day many of the old timers hold that before the land had been trampled and packed by stock it would not produce a crop of wheat."

And now, in addition to being an important point for the outfitting of miners, the city of The Dalles became the center of an extensive farming community, and fully enjoyed that substantial prosperity which is only attained through the development of natural resources.

In 1875 the taxable property of Wasco county amounted to $1,622,515; the levy being 19 mills for state and county purposes. The same year the population of the county, according to the state census, was 3,853. By 1879 the county's property had increased to a valuation of $2,496,894; the levy was 18½ mills. The United States census of 1880 showed gratifying increase in population, it being that year 10,228, an increase of 7,719 over the census of 1870; over 307 per cent. With the exception of Clatsop, Wasco county had made the heaviest gains per cent. of any county in the state. And in 1880 it ranked fourth in size in the state. August 31st, of this year, the Dalles Times acknowledged obligations to Mr. S. J. Newsome for the following statistics of his last assessment, turned over to the board of equalization August 30th:

Another severe winter was experienced in 1880-81, nearly as memorable as the boreal season of 1861-2. Again there were heavy losses in stock. Accustomed as were the ranchers to usually mild winters, they had not provided sufficient feed; because of heavy snow cattle and horses, especially cattle, could not pick their feed on the ranges. The county of Wasco, even then, included a wide scope of country in eastern Oregon. In March the editor of The Dalles Times conversed with a number of stockmen who said:

"The snow belt has been confined to the region of country along the Columbia river; in other portions of the county the snow has not fallen to any great depth, and not lying on the ground any great length of time. For instance, from Antelope, seventy miles southeast of The Dalles, to Canyon City, a distance of 130 miles, the winter has not been severe, and the loss of stock is not so large as last year.

"From Mr. A. Scherneckau, of Cross Hollow, we learn that the loss may average about fifteen per cent of cattle and sheep; not any more. One man in his neighborhood had kept exact figures of the loss in his flocks and it will amount to fifteen per cent. of the whole. Others in that section have not lost over five per cent. He thinks the average will be about fifteen per cent. West and south of Cross Hollow the loss has been slight, the snow not having been over three inches deep at any time, and soon disappearing from the effects of chinook winds. North and east (along the Columbia) the snow was much deeper and consequently stock suffered much more. In Grass Valley, for instance, he averages the loss of cattle and sheep at fully fifty per cent. Horses have not, as a general rule, suffered much, and the percentage of the loss of these will be much less than that of cattle and sheep.

"Mr. Charles Schutz, from Rock creek, came in town and from him we learn the winter has been very severe in that neighborhood. A great many cattle and sheep have died. The loss, he says, will be fearful among these. Strange to relate, those which were fed in the first part of the season suffered the most when the severe weather came. These did not struggle to find feed like those which had none at all. This section is situated in the 'snow belt' mentioned above.

"Messrs. Nickelsen & Fredden have received a letter from Mr. W. H. Colwell, of Lone Rock, in which he says that only 175 head of sheep have died in that section out of 8,600. In Hay Creek, Mr. Colwell writes, the losses have been fearful. Out of 18,000 head of sheep there are only about 8,000 left. Cattle, he says, will average a loss of 80 per cent.

"This winter is now an event of the past. The hills are covered with green grass, furnishing good sustenance for stock. It has been, without doubt the longest winter experienced in eastern Oregon for over twenty years. The pioneers of 1861-2 say the snow lasted on the ground longer this year than that. In the common course of events we may not expect another such winter for a long number of years. The weather has not been as cold as many years previous, but the great detriment was the length of time the snow laid on the ground. The last winter the lowest range of the mercury at The Dalles was not at zero. We cannot believe, in the mind of any intelligent man, this year will be taken as an average one in Wasco county. We still claim to have the finest grazing section in the state and feel fully assured time will prove the truth of this assertion."

A correspondent of The Dalles Times writing from Wapinitia, under date of February 13, 1881, says:

"* * * * The late thaw caused very high water in the streams in this section, so as to stop all travel on the roads. The mail from The Dalles to Prineville could not make regular trips for ten days. The bridge over White river is partly washed away, so that it cannot be used until repaired.

"Since the beginning of December to the present, the loss of sheep has been heavy in this sections. The losses are as follows: William Lewis, 1,500 out of 3,000; J. Curtis, 1,000 out of 2,000; J. Abbott, 400 out of 3,500; Jerry Young, 1,000 out of 2,500; J. Kelly, 220 out of 300. The loss of cattle is not yet ascertained. One lot of 18 head were found dead in Oak Grove creek, under some rim rock where they had sought shelter during the deepest snow. Probably 100 dead cattle have been found in the settlement so far. Horses have not suffered extremely yet, and I learn of none having died."

Railroad building through Wasco county commenced in 1880 and resulted in great activity and an inflow of many who became permanent settlers. Previous to this golden era of railroad development in eastern Oregon The Dalles was the one rich trading center of all that portion of the state lying east of the Cascade mountains. The enormous steamboat traffic on the Columbia river was transferred at The Dalles; from that point freight teams departed for their heavy trips into the interior of the country as far distant as Yakima and Ellensburg, in Washington Territory; Prineville and Canyon City, Oregon. Completion of the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company to The Dalles, and subsequent construction of the Northern Pacific across the Cascade range to Puget Sound, deflected much of the trade formerly controlled by The Dalles. However, rapid settlement of the country directly tributary in a great measure compensated for the loss of the trade which railroads diverted to other points.

Undoubtedly The Dalles was, during the first era of northwest development, a rather more important factor than it is at present. But, as the Times-Mountaineer said, in January, 1895: "its glory has not departed, although its citizens have never manifested the spirit of public enterprise commensurate with the natural advantages of the place. Since the completion of the Northern Pacific railroad, the trade of Yakima and Ellensburg has been attracted to the Sound; but Canyon City, Prineville, and even the Silver Lake country, 225 miles distant, have The Dalles as their market. Every season wool and produce from these portions of the state are brought to this city, and our wholesale merchants send the country dealers in these regions their supply of goods."

In May, 1880, work on the first railroad was progressing rapidly. The track was laid a mile beyond Celilo; grading had been done seven miles beyond the mouth of the John Day river. In June a portion of the right of way of the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company had been purchased as far as Hood River, the company paying from $1 to $100. This was for the line from The Dalles to Portland. Some of the farmers were highly pleased to have a railway pass through their lands; others strenuously opposed it, and demanded heavy damages. Thursday, March 16, 1882, the last of the iron was laid between The Dalles and the Cascades; the day following two locomotives and a number of flat cars were sent to the Cascades.

In September, 1881, the returns of Wasco county's assessor showed the following:

Number of horses and mules, 15,295; last year, 17,000.

Number cattle, 30,745; last year, 71,000.

Number sheep, 98,842; last year 280,000.

Number swine, 1,223.

A large proportion of this loss of stock may be accounted for by the fact that much of it had been driven to eastern markets; still a certain percentage had, undoubtedly, been killed by the unusually severe winter of 1880-81. Despite this loss the assessor stated that the assessable property of 1881 would approximate somewhere in the neighborhood of $3,250,000 in comparison with $2,800,000 in 1880. As a matter of fact the total taxable property of 1881 amounted to $3,221,200.

Thursday, May 5, 1881, bids were opened at The Dalles applying for the contract for the erection of a new court house. Following were the amounts of each bid: J. R. Addison, $25,895; W. R. Ransome, $25,868; A. R. McPhee, $24,500; C. Kron and W. S. A. Johns, $23,719; C. A. Stowell, $22,933.50; R. W. Crandall, $22,200; H. Glenn, $22,162; N. J. Blagen, $22,000.

Mr. Blagen being the lowest bidder was awarded the contract. For this commendable purpose the levy of an 8-mill tax was made. And yet there was, as is usual in such cases, opposition to the project. Saturday, June 4, 1881, a bill in equity was filed with the county clerk, praying for a temporary injunction against the county judge, clerk, commissioners and Mr. Blagen, the successful bidder, until a judicial hearing could be had at the next term of circuit court, when a permanent injunction would be prayed for. Upon this bill in equity appeared the names of thirty-five of the heaviest taxpayers in the county. Among the numerous allegations was one to the effect that Wasco county was already in debt above the amount of $5,000, the constitutional limit, and therefore the special tax levy illegal.

It appears from such fragmentary data as can be obtained concerning this court house that the legal obstacles were swept aside and new bids received as follows: W. E. Sylvester, $24,400; C. A. Stowell, $24,000; R. W. Crandall, $21,700; N. J. Blagen, $23,000. The contract was awarded Mr. Blagen, although his bid was $1,300 above that of Mr. Crandall. In 1883 the building was completed and it is the structure now used for county purposes.

In 1882 the assessed valuation of Wasco county was $3,221,200.

Another large slice of territory was lost to this county by the legislative act of October 24, 1882. She gave up what is now Crook county and that portion of Wheeler county lying south of the John Day river. To Wasco county was then left the territory now embraced in Wasco, Sherman, Gilliam and the northern part of Wheeler counties. The new Crook county contained over 8,000 square miles.

During the early '80's the sheep industry greatly increased in importance. Large bands of sheep were driven on to the range and wool became one of the principal exports and revenue. The assessor's rolls for 1883 show a valuation of $3,160,170; and the rate of taxation 17 mills, producing a revenue for state and county of $53,983. At this period Wasco county was free from debt. There were at this time in the county 13,022 horses, valued at $419,000, and the number of men engaged in breeding these animals was 698. There were 531 persons and firms engaged in cattle raising; the number of cattle was 12,725 and their valuation $252,726. The number of sheep was 172,148, the property of 124 men or firms. The total valuation was assessed at $400,259; an average value of sheep of $1.70. From these animals the total value of wool derived was $123,947.28, the average clip being four pounds per sheep; the average price per pound being estimated at 18 cents.

We copy the following from the assessment roll of 1884: Deeded lands 178,391 acres; value $775,991; value of town property, $553,430; improvements on railroad and government lands, $327,964; value of merchandise and implements, $521,965; money, notes and accounts, $796,746; furniture, etc., $189,198; horses 18,763, valued at $619,179; cattle, 16,523, valued at $330,540; sheep, 270,386, valued at $540,772; swine, 4,409, valued at $13,227; Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, $665,000. Gross value of all property $5,334,021. Indebtedness, $1,246,956; exemptions, $297,000. Net value of property, $3,790,056.

At this period the estimated population of the county was 14,000. It must be remembered that about one-half of Wasco county had been lost in 1882, consequently the gain was a large one during the past four years.

February 16, 1885, Morrow county, as it is today, was formed. Of its territory the greater portion was taken from Umatilla county, but a part was, also, sliced from Wasco, and thus the "Mother of Counties" suffered another curtailment. In this year, also, Gilliam county was organized by legislative act, and more territory was "abstracted" from Wasco, although a portion of Gilliam, came from Umatilla county. The Oregon state census of 1885 gave Wasco a population of 7,757. In 1886 the total valuation of taxable property was $2,281,015, and in 1887 it had increased to $3,085,360. In 1888 it rose to $3,246,700.

Although nothing materialized there was some talk in 1889, of dividing Wasco county, and converting the town of Antelope into a county seat. Another mutilation of Wasco county occurred February 25, 1889, when by act of the Oregon legislature Sherman county was created and 684 square miles of land diverted from Wasco. County division was still in the air, and a meeting was called for November 15, 1890, to take up the matter of petitioning the legislature for a new county comprising portions of Wasco and Crook counties. But this movement failed of fruition, and the proposed meeting did not assemble.

A short time previous to the convening of the legislative assembly in January, 1891, an attempt was made to set off the Hood River country into a new and distinct county division. To the legislature a petition to this effect, quite numerously signed, was presented, asking that the western portion of Wasco county to the amount of 525 square miles be set off and organized into Cascade county. Thus it was seriously proposed to reduce what had once been the largest county in the United States to a position among the smallest in the state of Oregon. It was alleged in the petition that within the territory asked for there were about 1,900 people, and that the assessment rolls of 1889 showed the taxable property to be about $415,000. Hood River county admitted that she would consent to become the county seat. Of this project the Times-Mountaineer, January 3, 1891, said:

"The movement did not have the solid support of even that part of the country proposed to be made into a new county, and a remonstrance petition was at once put in circulation."

On the 10th the same journal added:

"The effort being made to create a new county out of the west portion of Wasco is premature, and should receive no support from our senators or representatives. There is not sufficient taxable property in the proposed new county to warrant action by the legislature, and it would be a hardship upon taxpayers to saddle upon them new burdens. We understand that the petition for division has not received many names in the proposed county limits, and that a remonstrance has already received numerous signatures."

This "remonstrance" petition, dated at Falls Precinct, January 1, 1891, signed by over one hundred tax-payers, respectfully represented "that we are not in favor of a new county as prayed for by the petitioners. That we do not believe that the interests of this part of the county would be subserved thereby, and we respectfully, but earnestly remonstrate against the said division or formation of a new county embracing this precinct."

Organization of a county to be named Cascades was opposed by the residents of The Dalles. The Dalles board of trade passed a resolution condemning the attempt and worked against it. February 4, 1893, the Times-Mountaineer said:

The legislative air is full of county division schemes and proposals to create new counties. The divisionists of Wasco county undeterred by emphatic protests, are seeking to almost obliterate that division of the state from the map of Oregon. The proposed new county of Stockman cuts out a large slice from the southern portion; Tygh county appropriates a big section out of the heart of the old county, and the projectors of Cascade county, commencing at the eastern boundary of Multnomah, takes in Cascades, Hood River and Mosier, even running its eastern line within sight of The Dalles, but graciously leaving the city itself and the cemetery to the old regime. The only property within the proposed new county that will pay any considerable amount of taxes, is the railway line of the Union Pacific Company, thirty odd miles of which is to be taken in. There really doesn't seem much chance for the lines of Wasco to be disturbed. The delegation from there is divided on the question, and the protests against any kind of a division contain the names of all the prominent taxpayers of the county. Not satisfied with thus cutting up the mother of all eastern Oregon counties, the Sutton county boomers propose also to take four townships from the remaining portions being appropriated from Crook and Grant.

This lot of bills for the formation of new counties were all killed. By January, 1893, the bill to create Stockman county had reached the second reading in the Oregon assembly. It was noted on the 28th inst. that no remonstrance had appeared, and it was urged that if the friends of the old county did not wish to see it still further dissected in a "most unseemly manner," it was high time that something was being contributed to the legislature in the way of information, as there were a number of citizens who were not favorable to the proposed division. This direct appeal was, evidently, followed by a remonstrance, and the division was not consummated.

What is now universally recognized as the "Hard times era" of the United States, from 1893 to 1897 was, of course, prevalent throughout Wasco county, and will be more particularly referred to in the chapters of this work relating to The Dalles. The gross valuation of Wasco's taxable property in 1894 was $3,194,477; net, $2,974,183. The population of 1895 was found by the assessor to be 10,354, and from July 1, 1894, until July 1, 1897, 188,207 acres of government land was entered by actual settlers.

The principal event of the year 1896, within the confines of Wasco county, was the opening of the "Locks of the Cascades." Millions of dollars and more than a score of years were required to construct this magnificent boatway around a formidable obstacle to navigation. Colonel W. E. McArthur, writing in the East Oregonian in 1884, is authority for the statement that in 1872 the importance of constructing a canal at the Cascades was brought to the attention of congress, but that it was not until 1877 surveys were made by the army engineers. Careful examination of each side of the Columbia river determined them to locate this canal on the Oregon shore. By July 1, 1884, congress had appropriated for this purpose a total amount of $955,000; of this $826,000 had been expended.

Illustrative of the deep and absorbing interest manifested in this enterprise by Oregonians it should be noted that in the legislature, October 20, 1876, a law was passed with only one dissenting vote, authorizing the United States to take proceedings for condemnation of all land required for canal purposes, provided such property could not be purchased. Ultimately forty-three acres were bought from the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, with a perpetual right of way across the company's land to the county road, and the use of its houses so long as work on the canal was in progress.

It has been stated by a Portland journal that a proposition to build a canal around the obstructions in the Columbia river at the Cascades was first broached in congress so late as 1875. However, in 1876 a government appropriation of $90,000 was made for the commencement of the undertaking. In 1878 the original contractors, Bell & Platt, of New York, undertook for the sum of $340,000 to excavate for the locks and a portion of the prisms. Various sums were subsequently appropriated by congress for continuing the work, and in 1892 J. G. and I. N. Day contracted, for the sum of $1,521,265, to complete the canal according to the plans and specifications then at hand. The work was sufficiently advanced by November, 1896, to permit the passage of boats engaged in regular river service. In 1899 another appropriation of $100,000 was made. This was to complete the walls of the locks. When these were finished the grand total of expenditures to date had been $3,733,187.80. October 30, 1896, Captain W. S. Fisk, of the United States Engineer corps, issued the following bulletin:

"The Cascade Canal and Locks will be opened to navigation at 2 o'clock P. M., Thursday, November 5, 1896. For the present they will be operated for the passage of boats during the hours of daylight, and it may be necessary to still further limit their use to certain hours of the day in order not to interfere too much with work still in progress."

On the arrival of this eventful day numerous excursions from all river points were made by rail and steamer. Thousands of people assembled; The Dalles brass band enlivened the occasion with strains of stirring melody; Battery A, Oregon National Guard, fired salutes. The Regulator, from The Dalles, with full complement of passengers; the Water Witch, Sadie B. and Maria, working boats for the contractors, floated in the basin, while below were the Dalles City, Sarah Dixon and Harvest Queen, from Portland. The craft from above steamed into the locks at 2:30 P. M., greeted by the sternutation of whistles; fanfare of horns and pealing of bells. The boats from below, forming a nautical procession of seven steamers, entered the locks and passed through one at a time. On to The Dalles steamed the Dixon, Regulator and Dalles City. Here the citizens had erected two handsome arches, brilliantly illuminated by electricity; through these marched one of the largest and most imposing parades ever before witnessed in the Inland Empire.

The first boat to make the round trip between The Dalles and Portland was the Regulator, but the honor of the first trip from Portland to The Dalles belongs to the Sarah Dixon.

Some idea of the immensity of this work at the Cascades may be gleaned from the following: Width of lock-chambers, 90 feet; length of lock chambers, 400 feet; depth of lower lock, 46 feet; depth of upper lock, 40 feet. Difference in level at upper and lower ends of canal: high water, 13 feet; low water, 24 feet. The fourteen upper gates weigh 325 tons and are 55 feet 2 inches high, and 52½ feet long on the curve—each leaf. The middle gates weigh 250 tons; are 41 feet two inches high, and 52½ feet long. The lower gates weigh 305 tons, and are 47 feet two inches high. The lower guard gate weighs 252 tons; is 37 feet two inches high. It is only to be used when the lower lock is to be pumped dry for repairs. The total length of the canal is 2,900 feet. The gate engine cylinders are 18 inches in diameter with a thirteen-foot stroke. One foot travel of the engine moves the gate four feet. The culvert-valve engine cylinders are fifteen inches in diameter and have a six-foot stroke.

The locks are filled and emptied through large culverts built in the walls and the flow is regulated by vulvert valves. These engines are supplied from a ten-inch pipe line, 1½ miles long, with a head of 500 feet, making a pressure of 217 pounds to the square inch.

Two 12-inch centrifugal pumps are placed in the pit near the lower gates and run by a 70-horse power turbine water wheel, which is supplied with water from a 13 to 24-foot head through a culvert built in the south wall. The high water of 1894 was (at the lower end of the canal) 60 feet above the low-water mark. The high water of 1894 would be four feet above the present upper guard gates.

By the opening of the river to The Dalles the farmers of Wasco and Klickitat counties have annually reaped thousands of dollars on wheat alone. This does not include wool, live stock and other freights shipped out, or goods of all kinds brought in. In 1888 a bill was passed by the legislature appropriating $60,000 for a portage road around the Cascades, although at that period the canal was in process of construction. Prior to the opening of this road freightage on wheat from The Dalles to Portland was $4.50 per ton; passenger rates $5. Following the opening of the locks the rate to Portland was $1.50 per ton, and the passenger rate has ruled as low as twenty-five cents. Of the portage railway at The Cascades Mr. P. W. Gillette wrote in 1900:

F. A. Chenoweth, afterward Judge Chenoweth, of Corvallis, settled at the Cascades, and in 1850 built the first portage road on the line of the old Indian trail, which had been in use so long "that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." His road was a railway built entirely of wood, and the car was drawn by one lone mule. The road was on the north side of the Columbia, at that time in Oregon.

Then there were no settlers east of the Cascade mountains, and no immediate prospect of any; so he sold his road to D. T. and P. F. Bradford, who were either more hopeful of the future or had better foresight than Judge Chenoweth. They rebuilt the road in 1856, making many improvements. The Indian massacre at the Cascades occurred while this improvement was being made. The men were attacked while at work and fled in all directions, one or two of them being killed. This road was rebuilt in 1861, with iron rails, and had steam locomotives. It was the first railroad of the kind built in Oregon and though small was the beginning of railroading in the northwest.

Sometime later in the '50's, Colonel Ruckel and H. Olmstead built and operated a portage road on the south bank of the Columbia. Before the portage roads and steamboats combined their interests, the portage company received half the freight charges on all freights to their destination. If the price was $40 per ton from Portland to The Dalles, and that was the regular price for many years, the portage men got $20 per ton for carrying it around the falls, six miles.

Mr. Lyman, in his Oregon work says that the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, in 1859, established the first railroads with iron rails, over which ran steam engines. These were portage roads on the Washington Territory side of the Columbia, from the lower to the upper Cascades, and from The Dalles to Celilo.

For the year 1897 the assessed valuation of Wasco county property was $3,013,386. For the year 1898 the tax rolls showed an increase of $59,463 over 1897. The average of deeded land increased 9,019 acres and the value of improvements on town lots totaled $41,085.

Among the varied Wasco county resources of 1897 wheat took the lead, 500,000 bushels being exported and 100,000 retained for home consumption and seed. The average price ruled at seventy-five cents a bushel, making the crop of 1897 worth $450,000. Aside from this generous cereal return there were raised 90,000 bushels of oats and 70,000 bushels of rye, valued at about $60,000; also 15,000 tons of hay worth $150,000. There were exported no oats, barley, rye or hay, all having been retained for home consumption. Among Wasco's resources sheep come next in importance. The 123,529 sheep in the county yielded an average of nine pounds of wool per head, or 1,200,000 pounds, which at an average price of 11 cents brought into the county some $132,000, to which may be added $30,000 for mutton exported, totaling the receipts for the sheep industry alone $162,000.

Third in importance was the fruit industry. In the county about 6,000 acres were set to orchard, and some 300 acres in grapes. Fruit sales were handled by so many different parties, and fruit was shipped to so many points that it is impossible to furnish an accurate estimate of receipts. But during the season of 1897 there were shipped from The Dalles, Hood River and Mosier sixty car-loads of green fruit. These were the principal fruit shipping points in the county. Half of the above amounts was, also, shipped in less than car-load lots. The leading market for these fruit exports was Chicago, yet a number of carloads went through direct to New York, while Butte, Montana, received a number of cars and some went to Texas. Aside from the fruit marketed green, six carloads of dried prunes went from The Dalles, and quite an amount of dried peaches and pears. The "kitchen garden" had become a resource of considerable importance among farmers located near transportation lines. Large quantities of vegetables, cabbage, beans, peas, tomatoes, celery, melon and egg-plant were this year shipped to Sound cities. It is needless to say that this industry has since largely increased.

Through the world the Columbia river is recognized as an important fish-food producer. Along its banks in Wasco county has been built up a great source of wealth. Yet the seasons of 1896 and 1897 were not profitable, the salmon run having been extremely light. The two species of fish caught in this stream for market are salmon and sturgeon. Fish wheels capture the former; the latter are taken on hooks sunk to the bottom of the river.

For the year 1899 the tax valuation of Wasco county was $3,367,607, an increase of $72,153 over that of the year previous. By 1901 it had risen to $4,077,405, and in 1902 to $4,302,535; in 1903 it was $4,640,800.

There was a serious attempt in 1901 to make the Columbia an open river. An address delivered by Civil Engineer Ernest McCullough before the Lewiston (Idaho) Commercial Club that year is so lucid and clearly explanatory of the details which it exploits, that we cannot resist the temptation to here reproduce a portion of it, as follows:

To secure the open river and free competition, the obstruction between The Dalles and Celilo must be overcome. Then at high water a boat can go clear through from Lewiston to Portland laden with the products of the country. * * * This twelve miles of rocky river retards the complete development of a country with an estimated area of 104,000 square miles, and if we would liken the Snake river to a bottle we would say that a little bit of cork twelve miles long stops a bottle nine hundred miles away.

The project for making an open river consists of the canalization of a portion of the river between The Dalles and Celilo, and the construction of several locks. The estimated cost is about $4,000,000. In the distance of twelve miles we have Three-Mile rapids, 1,500 feet long, narrow crooked and full of rocks; then Five-Mile rapids (The Dalles), where for a mile and a half the river rushes with great velocity between steep basalt walls; then Ten-Mile rapids, a similar gorge half a mile long; and lastly Celilo Falls, with a sheer drop of twenty feet. In these twelve miles the total fall of the river at low water is 80 feet.

Many examinations and surveys have been made and the reports at various times fill many books. But there is one little sentence ever recurring in all the reports and that is to the effect "that further improvements to give an open river to the sea would not involve any insurmountable difficulties from an engineering point of view."

In 1874 and in 1879 examinations were made and projects proposed for widening and straightening the river. They were made at a time when little was known regarding the physics of the Columbia river and its tributaries. The estimated cost was $7,645,495.51 to provide for navigation during high water stages and a supplementary estimate to make the river navigable at all stages brought the estimate up to $10,517,343.17. But this was a lot of money, and in 1888 a board of engineers recommended a boat railway to cost nearly $3,000,000. Boats were to be lifted at one place to a height of 77 feet and placed on a cradle, in a car, on a broad gauge track. The road was to be nine miles long and at the other end the boats were to be lowered 62 feet into the water. A free portage road was recommended to be constructed to serve until the requirements of navigation demanded the boat railway.

In 1892 another board of engineers was appointed and the majority report condemned the boat railway and recommended a canal and locks as being better adapted to the needs of the country and a more permanent improvement. The idea of the free portage road until the canal and locks were constructed was advised. The minority report opposed the boat railway project and said nothing about the free portage road. Congress made two appropriations aggregating $250,000 to commence the construction of the boat railway. Surveys were made and very complete plans prepared in 1892, 1893 and 1894. Nearly all the land was obtained that was necessary for the right of way, and it looked as though the thing would be a go. The estimated cost was $2,264,467.

But there were grave objections to be urged against the boat railway. In the first place it would be, practically, an experiment, the only other boat railway which is known to be operating successfully being used to convey boats which navigate the ocean near the coast and are built to withstand all kinds of strains. The river boats here are of extremely shallow draft and might be seriously damaged if lifted out of their natural element and placed in cradles on cars. It would render necessary a complete change in naval architecture on the Columbia and Snake rivers, and increased cost in building and operating boats. The owners of boats did not like the idea, and it was urged by many people that the men who principally favored the construction of the boat railway were those whose interests were best served by the presence of the obstruction in the river. It was urged that these men believed congress would never listen to any other project if the boat railway was built and proved a failure.

Congress was besieged and the boat railway scheme was dropped, and the people hoped the canal and locks would be built. Then Mr. Mohr jumped in and commenced building a private portage railway. It was thought that this would stop the clamor if the people saw that the obstructions were to be overcome. But it only made matters worse and the people became vociferous in their attempt to make congress see that it was a free open river that was wanted; not one where a man stood at the neck of the bottle and charged corkage. So the Mohr company quit work and it now looks as if the open river project will consist of a canal and locks between The Dalles and Celilo, a sensible way of doing the business.

Saturday, May 24, 1902, what was known as the Paul Mohr portage road, on the Washington side of the Columbia, was sold at sheriff's sale at Goldendale. This forced sale was to satisfy outstanding claims held by contractors who had built it, and the road was bid in for $36,592. But there was destined to be a more extensive field for portage road construction. In 1903 an act of the Oregon legislature appropriated $165,000 for a portage railroad around the obstructions to navigation of the Columbia between The Dalles and Celilo. Governor Chamberlain approved the bill February 19th, and it became a law. Following the enactment of this measure difficulties were encountered in securing the right of way, it being necessary to purchase land owned by the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. The project was vigorously fought by that corporation, and the matter carried into the courts.

December 23d, both houses of the legislature, in special session, passed a bill appropriating $100,000 more for securing the right of way for the "Celilo canal," it being then understood that congress would appropriate sufficient money to construct the canal provided the state of Oregon would furnish the right of way. In the early days of 1905, congress did make a small appropriation, despite the hysterical efforts of the scandalous railroad lobby which continually haunts the corridors of the nation's capitol, for commencing this mammoth and invaluable undertaking. It is probable that at some distant time in the future it will be completed.

The right of way for the canal had been given by the state of Oregon. Construction on the portage road, funds for which had, also, been provided by the legislature, lagged for a time; the permanent improvement partly promised by a lobby-ridden congress, seemingly having the effect of indefinitely postponing the temporary relief of the portage road. At last work was begun and at this writing is nearly completed.

During a period comprising many years Wasco county labored under the handicap of an enormous public debt. Upon this was paid thousands of dollars in interest, and at an exorbitant rate. This financial condition retarded development; drove away capital that might otherwise have been invested in this locality; prevented homesteaders from locating, as no one feels disposed to settle in a county where extremely high taxes prevail. It was the testimony of the Times-Mountaineer, May 6, 1904, that at that date Wasco county was out of debt. It, also, invited capitalists to invest in new enterprises. The following statement of Wasco's fiscal condition in 1904 will prove of interest for future comparison:

An attempt was made in the 1903 session of the Oregon legislature to form a new county from that part of Wasco east of the Des Chutes river, and a portion of Crook county. This proposed new political division was to be known as Stockman county. By an almost unanimous vote the bill passed the house, but it was defeated in the senate. It was introduced January 15th by Representative Burgess, and located the temporary county seat at Antelope. February 10th it went down in the senate by a vote of 16 to 7.

So far the last attempt to sequester Wasco county territory, and convert the same into new political divisions, was made in 1905. A bill for the creation of Cascade county, embracing the rich Hood River valley, was presented in the house of the Oregon legislature by Representative Jayne, in January. This measure proposed to carve the new county out of the western portion of Wasco.

Representative Burgess came forward with another bill for the creation of Jefferson county, by which it was proposed to take a part from Wasco, and another portion of territory from Crook county. This last measure was similar to one introduced by the same gentleman in 1903, at that time the proposed name of the new county—anticipated—was "Stockman." Anent this matter the Oregon Journal, of Portland, said, January 19th:

"Popular sentiment in The Dalles is for the most part strongly opposed to the proposed secession of the Hood River valley from Wasco county, and Burgess is the exponent of this sentiment. But while opposed to the creation of Cascade county the people of The Dalles are more than willing to part with the territory which Wasco would contribute to Jefferson county. The territory that would be lost to Wasco by the creation of Jefferson county is sparsely settled and by no means so rich as the Hood River valley. Burgess is, therefore, opposed to the bill introduced by his colleague, Jayne, to create Cascade county, and is working industriously for the enactment of his own measure, creating Jefferson county.

"As it is practically impossible that both bills should pass, Jayne is of necessity forced into a position more or less antagonistic to that taken by Burgess. The latter has, however, the hearty co-operation of Senator Whealdon of Wasco, whose home is at The Dalles and who shares the popular sentiment there as to the two measures."

The bill for the formation of Cascade county and locating the county seat at Hood River, passed the house January 30th. Little, if any opposition was anticipated in the senate. February 3d it was the opinion of the Salem correspondent of the Morning Oregonian that the Cascade bill would "surely pass the senate." He even went so far as to say in his special to the Oregonian that "The senate committee on counties has practically decided to report favorably on the house bill for the creation of Cascade county."

And yet this same paper on February 16th was forced to announce in its head-lines that the Cascade bill had been "Slain in the Senate." And even this news had been forstalled by The Dalles Chronicle on the 15th by the following item:

"A late message from Senator Whealdon says: 'Senate committee this afternoon recommended that Cascade county bill pass with amendments to keep it in the fourth judicial district, but that no interference be made with present laws of Multnomah county. Senator Whealdon moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed for further consideration and finally succeeded in getting a standing vote which was as follows: Sixteen for postponement; one absent; twelve against postponement. So it will be seen Cascade county is virtually settled for this term. Good for Senator Whealdon and old Wasco."

All the county division fighting was now ended; Jefferson surrendered; Hot Lake was killed in the house and Cascade in the senate.

CHAPTER V

THE HISTORIC CITY OF THE DALLES.

In the previous four chapters concerning Wasco county, we have avoided such details as were more exclusively connected with The Dalles. Such historic facts and their corollaries have been reserved for these chapters bearing more particularly on the fortunes of Wasco county. The citizens of The Dalles have made a substantial portion of the history of Oregon. It is ours now to chronicle the stirring events of its half century and odd years of life—the first history of the city ever written—in as complete and reliable form as is possible with available data.

Perhaps it is within the limits of conservatism to say that in sensational happenings The Dalles remains unsurpassed by any place within the boundaries of Oregon. At one period, being the key to the entire Columbia basin, its possession was eagerly desired. During the earlier Indian wars it was the seat of military operations; it was the point where the immigrants of 1847, and later years, assembled and transferred themselves, their lares et penates, to boats and rudely constructed rafts to proceed down the Columbia to the Willamette valley. During the years of immigration following the passage of the donation land laws—the avant coureur of the Homestead Act of 1862—the bench lands above The Dalles were oft-times twinkling with the campfires of those who had won their toilsome way "across the plains" with ox teams from the Missouri river. Today many a grizzled pioneer of Oregon can relate thrilling stories, replete with historical interest of their experiences while encamped at The Dalles, and of their subsequent journey down the Columbia.

The geographical location of The Dalles—always the county seat of Wasco—is latitude N. 45 degrees 36 minutes 18 seconds; longitude west from Greenwich, 122 degrees 12 minutes; west from Washington, D. C., 44 degrees 20 minutes. Its elevation at the court house is 103 feet above sea level. Colloquially The Dalles is "on the Columbia river, at the mouth of Mill creek, in the northeastern part of Wasco county." By an amended charter granted Dalles City, February 17, 1899, the boundaries of the city were described as follows:

"Commencing in the middle channel of the Columbia river, at a point due north of the northeast corner of lot 4 of section 2, township one, north of range 13, east of the Willamette meridian, in Wasco county, Oregon; thence south to the southeast corner of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 2, in said township and range; thence southwesterly to the southwest corner of The Dalles City grant; thence north eighty and thirty-eight hundredths chains to the southwest corner of The Dalles military reservation; thence northerly along the westerly boundary of The Dalles military reservation to the line between The Dalles military reservation and the Methodist mission claim; thence north sixteen and seventy-nine hundredths chains to the northeasterly line of the Catholic mission claim; thence north, fifty-two degrees east, to the center of the main channel of the Columbia river to the place of beginning."

According to the last United States census The Dalles was the sixth city in size in Oregon, those having a larger population at the time the census was taken (1900) being Portland, Astoria, Baker City, Pendleton and Salem. On that date the population was given as 3,542. Since this, however, the growth has been rapid and The Dalles today undoubtedly has a population of over 5,000. This is a conservative estimate. A census at the present time would probably show a population of nearly six thousand.

The Dalles is an attractive city. This can be said without the least tinge of exaggeration. Situated on the hills it presents a decidedly picturesque appearance. To the southwest is Mount Hood, crowned with the snows of centuries; beyond the wooded hills of the state of Washington Mount Adams looks down with fatherly benignity. These imposing heights saw the vastly superior race that antedated the Indian tribes; they witnessed the rise and fall of the painted redskins of today; they were regarded with silent or exultant admiration by the earliest pioneers from Lewis and Clark to the hardy settlers of the '50's; they now stand in bold relief against a background of sombre scenery, all that is left to remind us of the days before civilization had hewed its way into the "forests primeval."

But years previous to the building of the white man's town that portion of the present city between the bluffs and the river—about half a mile in width—was the favorite camping ground of Indians and an oasis for weary voyageurs making the trip up or down the Columbia. Here the Lewis and Clark expedition paused to light their camp fires and smoke a friendly pipe with the savages; and in future years their example was followed by thousands.

In the current history chapters in re Wasco county, we have told of the Indian village, Win-quatt, which stood on the spot that later blossomed into The Dalles. And were data available what an interest-compelling history could be thrown into type concerning Win-quatt alone. There has been some confusion in the use of the names Win-quatt and Wish-ram, and the two have often been used as though they were one and the same place. Wish-ram was the Indian village at or near Celilo, ten or eleven miles east of The Dalles. It was always distinct and separate from Win-quatt. Lewis and Clark, in their journal, speak of Wish-ram, as also does Capt. Bonneville in the report of his expedition. By the Methodist missionaries the site of the Indian village Win-quatt was denominated Wascopum. It was a central point and was dominated by the ancient and powerful tribe of Wascos, a remnant of whom are yet to be seen about the streets of The Dalles, and whose shanties and rude wickiups fringe the western bank of Mill creek. "Win-quatt" signifies a place encircled, or surrounded, by a bold circumvallation of rocks. The following is an extract from a poem written by Ruth Gatch:

"By Columbia where the wild elk roams
The Indians grouped their rude, rough homes;
Where laughter from the Indian child
Mixed with songs and music wild,
Flowed out the wigwam's open door
To greet the wind's and water's roar.
The town the Indians loved the best
Was Win-quatt, place of peace and rest;
For mountains high, with rugged cliff
Kept from the village war and strife,
And the Wasco tribe through all the land
Was known a fearless, war-like band.

"Now on Columbia's yellow sands
The Dalles, a busy city stands;
But yet how great has been the change,
Since clothed with beauty wild and strange,
The Indians' homes alone were here,
Mid rugged cliffs and pine groves drear.
Now houses rise at every place,
Where Indians came from far to race.
And where the wild war-dance was held,
Large stores and happy homes they build.
Schools and churches crown the land,
And good will flows from every hand."

But we must, perforce, confine ourselves to the story of this town as builded by the white man. And this brings us to the comparatively recent year of 1850. A person hearing for the first time the name of The Dalles would be struck by its oddity; more particularly so were he to see it in print. He would be disposed to ask "What is the 'The' there for?" and if it would not be in better literary taste to omit the article. Certainly it would not, and should he desire to retain the good will of the good people of The Dalles, he must invariably refer to the town as such. The official name of the town is "Dalles City," but it is only known thus in official procedure. The town is "The Dalles" and, probably, always will be. The following in regard to the origin of the name is an extract from an address delivered by Dr. William C. McKay, an authority on the subject of names, at a festival given by the Ladies' Aid Society of the Congregational church in The Dalles, Tuesday, May 18, 1869:

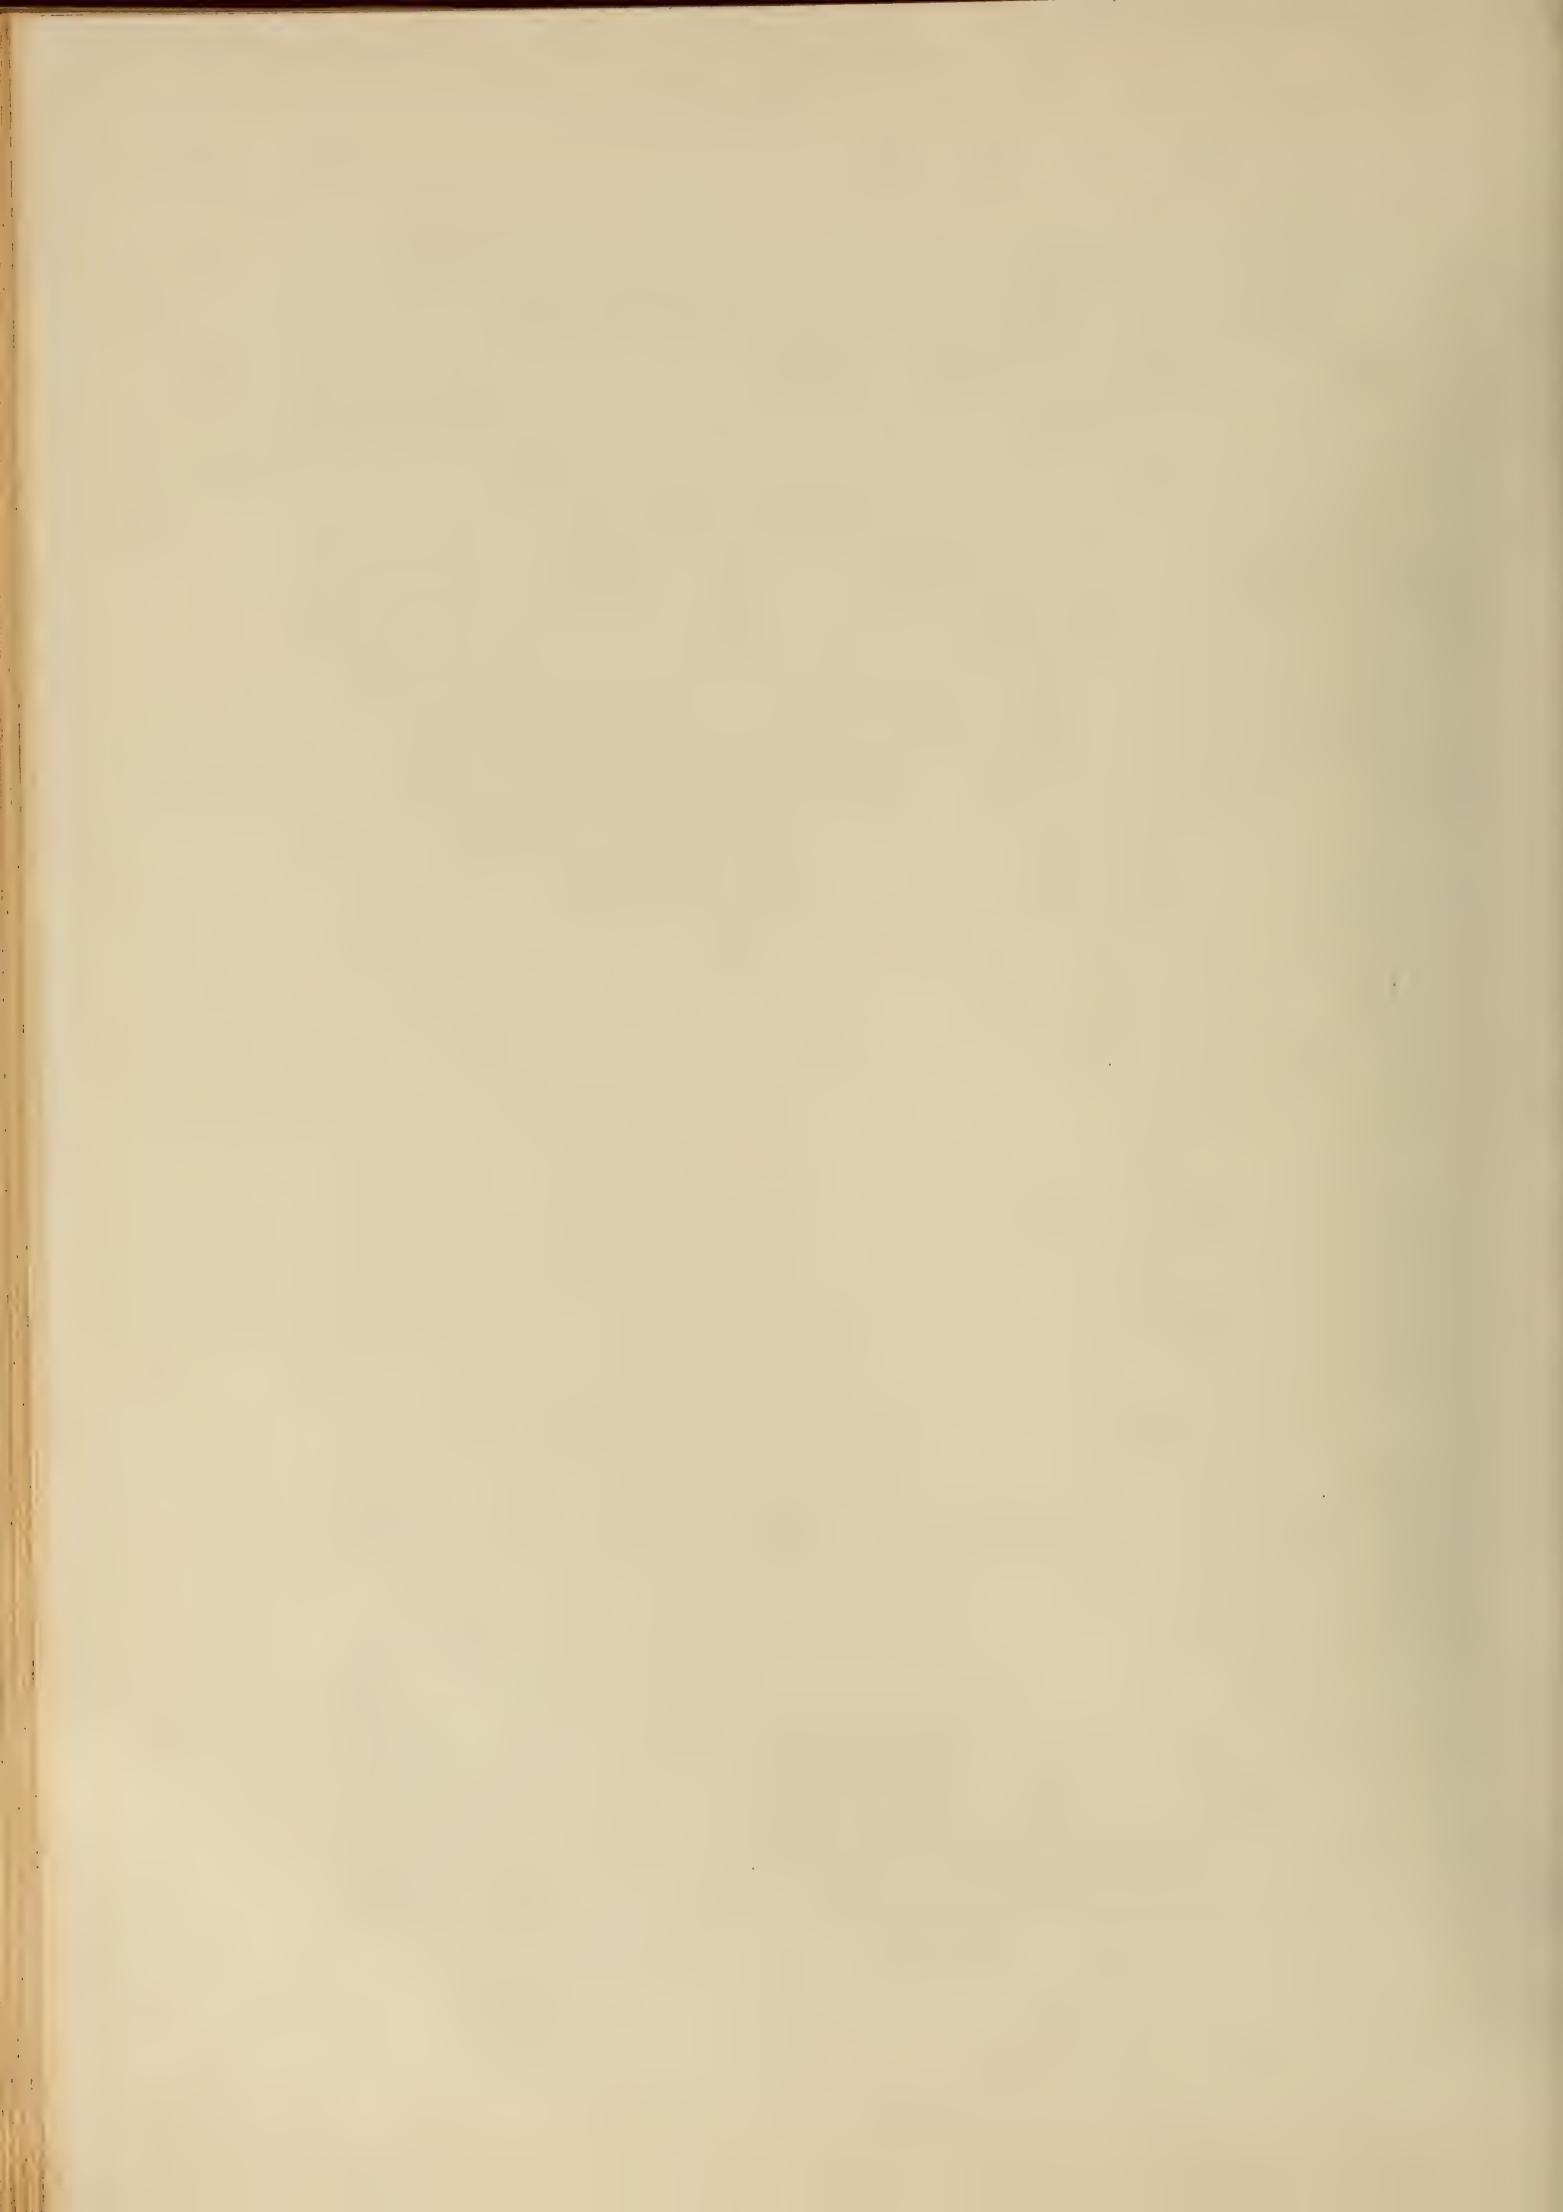

"The early French voyageurs knew the falls of the Columbia at the Indian fishery, six miles above this place, as Le Dalle, from the French word Dalle, signifying a trough—literally the trough of the Columbia. It has always been regarded by them as the most dangerous point in navigating the Columbia, and it was customary at the proper stage of the river to run their boats down the rapids, which always required great courage, dexterity and experience. But often, with all these accomplishments, many a poor voyageur found a watery grave in the whirlpools, and none can tell of his resting place. Within my own recollection many have perished in its turbulent waters. It is a noted point and much dreaded by them; consequently they gave it the name of Le Grande Dalle de la Columbia—The Great Trough of the Columbia."

When a town first began to appear where The Dalles now stands it was, for a short period, referred to as "The Landing," but was later christened The Dalles, taking the name from the old French designation of the falls some distance up the river. In 1889 the Times-Mountaineer said:

Frequent inquiries are made by settlers why this city is named The Dalles. The postoffice was known for many years as Dalles City; but a somewhat similar name in Polk county—Dallas—caused considerable annoyance, and on the postal register it was changed to "The Dalles." The municipality, in the charter, is still called Dalles City.

It will be entirely unnecessary to repeat here the events described in the current history chapters leading up to the founding of a town on this historic spot. Let it suffice that in 1820 a post of the Hudson's Bay Company was here established, but did not long remain; in 1838 a Methodist mission was founded; in 1848 a Catholic mission; in 1847-8 volunteer troops made this headquarters during the Cayuse war; from the days of pioneer immigration it was the point of embarkation for the down-river trip to the Willamette settlement; in 1850 a company of United States troops was stationed here to protect these emigrants from the predatory Indians.

This last named event led to the founding of The Dalles. In all the surrounding country there were only two or three settlers. First came, as an avant coureur the sutler's store; then others, attracted by the possibilities of this point as a trading place, opened stores, "grocery stores," and bowling alleys, all of which were institutions to be found in the vicinities of all government posts on the frontier.

The first "merchant" was John C. Bell. He came from Salem and opened a sutler's store at the garrison in 1850. In 1851 he disposed of his enterprise to William Gibson, and during the same year Allen McKindlay & Company, having obtained permission from the military authorities of the post, erected a frame building at a point near the intersection of what are now Main and Court streets, and stocked it with goods. They placed it in charge of Perrin B. Whitman and the following year built a more commodious structure. Possibly the purist or stickler for technicalities would not term this the inception of The Dalles, as Bell's sutler store was located on the bluff with the garrison, while the town proper is situated on the "flat." In fact Bell's store was rather more like an army canteen than the nucleus of a city. "An Early Settler" in The Dalles Times of March 2, 1881, says:

"In 1851 the first house was built in the town of The Dalles (then called The Landing), by Messrs. Allen, McKindlay & Company. They built a shanty and used it for a store, which was kept by Mr. Nugent the first year, and the next by Mr. Henry M. Chase; but was afterward taken charge of by Mr. John A. Simms, and I think Mr. O. Humason was in their employ at one time."

In her "Reminiscences of Oregon" Mrs. Lord says:

"In 1851 we had a mail route established. The carrier ad a boat which he sailed when there was wind, and when there was none he rowed. Remembering him as I do, I think he must have whistled up a breeze most of the time, even if he had to force it with a dollar to an Indian to row for him. The mail carrier was Justin Chenoweth."

William R. Gibson was garrison sutler in 1852, but moved his log store down to "The Landing," to a point now the foot of Union street. This business was subsequently purchased by Victor Trevitt. The same year Mr. William C. Laughlin secured a land claim and built a small frame house in the "town." W. D. Bigelow came up in 1852 with a small stock of goods, groceries and liquors, and "squatted," pitching a canvas house. Here, until 1853 he conducted quite a lucrative trade, then building a conventional store with lumber. There was a hotel built in the summer of 1852. This was a primitive affair and conducted by a man named John Tompkins, one of the commissioners named in the act organizing Wasco county. He had a family of several grown sons and one daughter, Minerva. Origen Thomson arrived at The Dalles early in September of that year. He described the town as "a dirty hamlet of a few mirerable huts giving no promise of the lively city of today," in a work published in recent years devoted to an account of his trip across the plains to Oregon.

There were several houses in the new town in 1853. Mrs. Lord says that in Allen & McKindlay's store, Perrin Whitman clerked for a time; also a man named Nugent, and a "young man named Chase." This explains the omission of Whitman's name by "An Early Settler" from whom we have quoted. Concerning the building of W. C. Laughlin's house, and the difficulties encountered in its construction, Mrs. Lord says:

I started to show that with the increased number of people resident and the large military post, there was a great demand for freight facilities, and but poor service, so it was a long time before father got any lumber to begin the house, and we did not get into it until August (1853). We had three tents, one for the kitchen, one for the sitting room and one for sleeping. The sitting room was floored and made as comfortable as such a tent would permit, but it was fearfully hot, without even a bush for shade. As soon as the house had the roof and sheathing on the outside and inside, we moved in all but the kitchen. The weatherboarding, windows and shingles did not arrive until long after. Father had drawn poles from up the creek and fenced the garden and a small field south of our home, where he had cut grass for hay the first season, and the next season raised the finest oats I ever saw in my life. * * *

By September all the material had come for the house. The doors and windows were put in (father made the doors) and the kitchen built with a rough stone fireplace. Father did not feel equal to building a chimney and fireplace in the main house from the material at hand, and wanted to have the comfort of one so much that he gathered up the loose stones lying about and built it on the low side of the long shed-room he had built for a kitchen and living room, and many a pleasant evening was spent around that wide, cheerful old fireplace. * * *

The house set up off the ground and contained two large rooms, but was ceiled up with rough lumber and lined and ceiled overhead with cotton domestic. There were two steps down into the kitchen, and that opened up into a large woodshed which I think was not built the first year. In the fall the yard was fenced in with poles to keep the Indians from riding over us, for they would ride up to the very doors and leave their horses stand there, and could see no reason why they should not. They made a great fuss about our fences, anyway. They claimed the right to ride anywhere they pleased, and after father fenced the field in the valley above town, which he did in the winter of 1853-4, they would very often throw down the fence and ride through. The fence was of rails and easily taken down.

Among those at The Dalles in 1853 were Messrs. Simms, Cushing, Humason, Low, Dr. Shaug, James Mosier, L. J. Henderson, W. C. Laughlin, Mr. Forman, and C. W. Denton. The same year there arrived a Methodist minister, Rev. James Gerrish. The latter preached the first sermon on the "flat," or "The Landing," now known as The Dalles. The Methodist and Catholic missions were some distance from this point. L. J. Henderson and Dr. Shaug had a store in a canvas house near the Oregon Steam Navigation Company's bridge. In 1854 they replaced this with a log structure. In 1853 Mr. Forman had erected a blacksmith shop. At this period Lieutenant Forsythe began a two-story frame house which he completed the following year. It was opened as The Dalles Hotel by Colonel Gates, and later was purchased by Moody & Company. In the '60's Cushing & Son completed a log store. Many immigrants located in the fall of 1853. Others came back from the Willamette valley to trade with these new comers, and the place assumed a business, bustling air. Although a city of tents with all descriptions of signs, those of restaurants predominated. Stores and cattle buyers were plentiful. Later some of these immigrants took up land, some erected houses and permanently established themselves.

The even of momentous import during the year 1854 was the creation of Wasco county and consequent elevation of The Dalles to the dignity of a county capital. At this period The Dalles remained the only town between the Cascades and Rocky mountains. There was none other to contest for county seat honors, nor has this position occupied by The Dalles ever been assailed except through the schemes of county division, some of which fructified; others failing. During the fifty odd years of Wasco county's existence no one has hinted at a proposal to remove the county seat from The Dalles.

Mr. W. C. Laughlin, as has been recorded, took up his land claim in 1853. At that period the military reservation had been reduced to proportions considerably smaller than those originally laid out. W. D. Bigelow, who had opened a store, also took a land claim which at present forms Bigelow's addition to the city. In 1854 H. P. Isaacs opened a saloon and bowling alley in the Cushing & Low building, the latter having erected a two-story board house, the upper part of which was used for living apartments. Subsequently it evolved into the Western Hotel. That year Dr. Craig built a house; James McAuliff a log store.

During the first years of the history of The Dalles, prior to 1855—the place remained without a platted townsite and with no official organization. The few business houses erected were located wherever fancy dictated, and with little regard to uniformity. Possibly the earliest residents did not believe that a townsite or town government would ever be necessary. However, organization of the county, combined with subsequent settlement of the town rendered requisite a townsite and some form of municipal government. Details of The Dalles townsite troubles would fill a good-sized volume; involving the various suits at law between contesting claimants. For these a brief synopsis must suffice.

Quieting of title to lands embraced within the corporate limits of The Dalles begins with the history of the Methodist mission established thereon in 1836, and claimed under the act of congress approved August 14, 1848, entitled "An Act to establish the Territorial government of Oregon." In this act, among other things, it was provided that title to the land, not exceeding 640 acres, then occupied as a missionary station among the Indian tribes in said territory, together with improvements thereon, be confirmed and established in the several religious societies to which said mission stations respectively belonged. Under the provisions of this organic act the Methodist Missionary Society claimed at The Dalles title to the tract of land as set forth in this patent, together with 353 acres, one rood and twenty-eight poles, which had been appropriated by Major Rains for the Fort Dalles military reservation, making in all 643.37 acres claimed by the Methodist mission.

By act of congress approved June 16, 1860, there was appropriated the sum of $20,000 to be paid the missionary society of the Methodist Episcopal church for their release to the United States of all claim to the lands embraced within said military reservation as established by Major Rains, and this patent was thereupon issued for the remainder of the said 643.37 acres lying outside of Rains' military reservation. But with this proviso; "That the patent shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States and shall in no manner interfere with any valid adverse right to the same land, nor be construed to preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunal between adverse claimants to the same land."

Dalles City having been laid out upon the fractional northwest quarter of section 3, township 1, north 13 east, outside of the Rains military reservation under the "townsite act" upon that portion of the said Methodist mission claim which falls within the said fractional northwest quarter of section 3, thus became an adverse claimant and brought suit as a municipal corporation to set aside so much of the patent of the said Methodist mission as was within the fractional northwest quarter of said section 3, upon which said Dalles City was laid out, and for which land the said Dalles City had applied for the purchase of at the United States land office April 18, 1860, for townsite purposes, the said fractional northwest quarter containing 112 acres.

This case was tried in the United States district court of the district of Oregon and the decree of the court was that so much of the premises described in the patent as was claimed by Dalles City, being the fractional northwest quarter of said section 3, containing 112 acres, be released from the operation of the said patent and the title thereto to vest in Dalles City in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof. An appeal was taken to the supreme court of the United States by the said Methodist Missionary Society, and upon hearing thereof the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, thus establishing the legal title to such land and the lots and blocks laid out thereon in Dalles City in trust as aforesaid.

Wasco county was established by an act of the Oregon legislature, January 11, 1854, and a board of commissioners selected who, acting under the act of congress May 23, 1844, "as judges of the county court," proceeded to enter the land embraced in the triangular tract, as the "fractional northwest quarter of section 3, township 1, north range 13 east," in the land office at Oregon city.

Inasmuch as the United States surveys were not extended over the land until February, 1860, no action was had in the land office until April 19, 1860, when the corporate authorities of Dalles City made application to enter at the United States land office the fractional northwest quarter mentioned, containing 112 acres more or less. before this, however, the commissioners, acting under the act of May 23, 1844, employed Lieutenant B. M. Forsythe, Fourth Infantry, to lay off into blocks and lots, streets and alleys, as they now exist the town plat of Dalles City. The commissioners' journal of April 2, 1855, contains the following entry:

"Located county seat at The Dalles and ordered the clerk of the board of county commissioners to take immediate steps to survey a tract of 160 acres of land, or as much as can be obtained without trespassing on private rights, the ground to comprise all the center of the town, running back to the hill."

These blocks and lots were settled upon under the township act of May 23, 1844, and the respective settlements were recorded in the Dalles City archives, by order of the board of town trustees, and they thus became the first record of title and the basis of title to Dalles City lots. But the clear and complete title was not until after the decree of the federal supreme court, in 1883, when the Methodist mission title thereto under their patent was overthrown.

In pursuance of the act of the legislative assembly of Oregon, approved February 25, 1885, (special laws, 1885, pp. 406, 407), the council of Dalles City proceeded, in the spring or summer, of 1885, to convey to settlers their lots under the new townsite law, which was re-enacted in place of the act of 1844, repealed (See United States Revised Statutes, Sec. 2387), and it was under this last act of congress that the titles were thus made to the original settlers or to those who had succeeded them by purchase. This act of 1885 was passed the next session of the legislature of Oregon, after the Methodist mission title was declared by the United Supreme court to be invalid. No title could be procured by them before that time. By the terms of section 2387, Revised Statutes of the United States, the legislative authority of the state had the right to make regulations for the disposal of lots under the townsite law, and this regulation of the disposal of lots as aforesaid the Oregon legislature thus provided for by act of February 25, 1885, special laws, page 406, 407.

In the proceedings of the board of Commissioners for Wasco county, of August 4, 1855, we find that the county auditor was authorized to advise with counsel as to the necessary steps to be taken to secure to the county the amount of land donated by the government for a townsite and other purposes, and they also authorized the auditor to procure a competent surveyor to lay out and survey a townsite at the present county seat. December 3, 1855, the commissioners authorized the payment to R. D. Forsythe, the sum of $150 for surveying the county seat at The Dalles.

Let us return to the Alpha—or beginning—of the municipal existence of The Dalles; to September 15, 1855, which existence was largely brought about through townsite difficulties. On the date mentioned the residents of the village assembled in mass meeting and formulated rules for the division of property and for the government of the city. A set of resolutions was adopted and a board of trustees elected who should by common consent be the executive officers of the settlement. The members of this board were W. C. Laughlin, president; R. D. Forsythe, J. C. Geere, W. H. Fauntleroy and O. Humason. These gentlemen served until their successors were elected and qualified the following spring. At this meeting it had been mutually agreed that the first election should be held April 7, 1856. The following is taken from the minutes of the first meeting of the citizens of The Dalles to take action in municipal matters:

Pursuant to previous notice a meeting of the citizens of The Dalles was held September 15, 1855. On motion N. H. Gates was called to the chair, and J. A. Simms appointed secretary.

On motion a committee of five, Messrs. W. C. Laughlin, R. D. Forsythe, J. C. Geere, W. H. Fauntleroy and O. Humason was appointed to draft resolutions for the government and security of the citizens in holding their town property in this place. On motion of Captain Fauntleroy, it was resolved that no person should pre-empt on lots or parcels of ground until the contemplated town site of 160 acres be disposed of. On motion the meeting adjourned to meet again Monday morning at ten o'clock, to hear the report of the committee.

PREAMBLE.

That, whereas, the title of the land now occupied as a town site at The Dalles of the Columbia is believed to be vested in the citizens thereon in so much as it is known to have been a portion of the United States reservation and entirely unoccupied by any other claimant and that after a village was built thereon by permission of the United States government officers commanding at Fort Dalles, the land was released by said authority for the benefit of the citizens of said village. We, the citizens, in public meeting assembled, after due notice, do therefore resolve:

1. That all persons are hereby warned from trespassing upon the public property of this village, which we declare and give notice to be all that certain property released by the United States government officers (Major Rains, U. S. A.) to the citizens of this village lying west of and being adjacent to the present east line of the United States government reserve, and embracing the survey made by order of the commissioners of Wasco county, for citizens of this village.

2. That there shall be on the first day of April, three trustees elected whose duty it shall be to hold monthly meetings and carry into effect the resolutions now and hereafter enacted. They shall be guardians of the public interests; shall determine all local disputes regarding town property before described; to prevent nuisance; to call meetings of the citizens. They may adopt a seal or seals and to superintend and direct the morality of the village; whose services shall be gratuitous; two of whom shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

3. That there shall be a clerk of record elected who shall be clerk to the board of trustees; that it shall be his duty to record all local titles and claims in a book kept for that purpose alone and who may receive for each and every record the sum of one dollar, which record shall be liable to approval monthly by the trustees. For each lot of land recorded the clerk shall charge and receive five dollars additional to his fee, which five dollars he shall pay to the trustees to be used by them for the benefit of the village, and that the services of the clerk to the board be gratuitous.

4. That all property shall be recorded and no title shall be valid unless recorded within ten days after this date.

5. That in all cases of dispute the rightful owners shall be placed in exclusive possession by the trustees.

6. That all persons that have improved or enclosed property in the limits of the village shall be confirmed in the same, and that in case such enclosure does not correspond with the survey as ordered by the county commissioners (which the committee recommends for adoption) that they shall be entitled to the same area contiguously after the removal of the lines so as to correspond to said survey, and that in all cases privilege of improvements shall have precedence.

7. That in case of unimproved lots the occupant shall be entitled, if a citizen, to two lots each upon recording the same as specified, provided, he shall fence the same within six months and build upon one of the two within twelve months, and in the meantime notice in writing on the property as the record shall be sufficient to hold possession.

8. That every free white citizen of the age of twenty-one years and upward, and no others, shall be entitled to the provisions of these resolutions.

9. That all persons entitled under the provisions of resolution sixth to two or more lots, shall not be entitled to the benefit of resolution 7th.

10. That the citizens of The Dalles hereby pledge their support to each other and the trustees to protect these resolutions.

11. That nothing in these resolutions shall be so construed as to interfere in any way with the laws of Oregon Territory or the United States government.

12. That notice shall be given by posting these resolutions in some conspicuous place within the limits of this village and by publishing the same in one or more papers of Portland, Oregon.

13. The privileges of resolution 8th are hereby extended to unmarried women.

After which we elected trustees and clerk.

O. HUMASON,

R. W. HALE,

W. C. LAUGHLIN,

Trustees of the Village of Dalles.

J. P. BOOTH, Clerk.

Local events at The Dalles were accentuated by the excitement attending gold discoveries near Fort Colville. Thousands were attracted to this portion of the northwest as The Dalles was, for many of these gold hunters, on the line of march to the country now known as Stevens county, Washington. The Dalles was at the head of navigation; merchants flocked thither; it became an important outfitting and shipping point.

Anterior to the Indian war of 1855-56, an account of which appears in a previous chapter, there was manifested considerable fear of Indians. Mrs. Lord writes of this period as follows:

Father kept us children so closely at home that when the Indians broke out and people were forced to seek refuge in town, we children enjoyed it, even though we suffered more or less with fear. Every house was full for weeks and many who could went below. Father had made up his mind that he ought to take us all to Portland for safety, as the severe frights we had received had rather unnerved mother, and the work was enormous, keeping open house as we did; but before we got started there came the massacre at the Cascades and by the time we could have passed there he concluded the worst was over.

As is always the case in any military movements, there was so much red tape that at times the townspeople felt they might all be killed before the soldiers would get down to protect them. There was a company for home protection organized on the quiet. One night some one rode furiously into town, saying the Indians were coming, and fifty men were on the move to meet them within a very short time, but when they got to Three Mile they met something; I can't be sure whether it was loose stock, a pack train, or just what, but it was something perfectly harmless.

After Major Haller made his unlucky reconnoitre through the Yakima country, The Dalles people felt very anxious. They would meet in gatherings on the corner of the street or in their houses and talk the situation over, speculating on what might happen until they were afraid for night to come. * * * In the spring of 1856, when the Cascades was attacked and the steamer came up after help, The Dalles went wild.

The town election provided for by the citizens' meeting of September 15, 1855, was held April 7, 1856. Those who were elected and served until the charter was granted by the legislature of 1856-7, were H. B. Isaacs, chairman; N. H. Gates and James McAuliff, board of trustees; J. P. Booth, recorder; O. Humason, treasurer. There were more than 300 people at The Dalles in 1857, and they were nearly unanimous for a city organization. Colonel N. H. Gates was sent to the legislature, where he introduced a bill for the incorporation of "Fort Dalles." The measure was passed and signed by Governor Curry and Speaker Grover, and in 1857 the village was incorporated as a city; a charter was written by Colonel Gates and a board of trustees elected. In the conclusion of the chapter relating to The Dalles will be found a list of all the executive officers of this municipality since its organization. June 26, 1857, the charter was granted to Dalles City, and from that time it is entitled to date its municipal birth. New charters were granted, or old ones amended in 1859, 1862, 1868, 1870, 1880 and one or two since. The first officers elected under the new charter were N. H. Gates, president of the board; E. G. Cowne, R.

Hall, B. F. McCormick and P. Craig, members of the board of trustees; C. R. Meigs, recorder; O. Humason, treasurer.

During the earlier years of the town's history the business portion was confined solely to Main street. Later Union street was utilized for a distance of one block from Main. And later yet, an effort was made to build up Washington street and a few business houses were constructed there. At present the principal business thoroughfare is Second street, and commercial enterprise has extended to the east quite a distance beyond the original business center of the town. It is recorded by Mrs. Lord that for nearly a decade a decidedly low state of morality existed at The Dalles. The town was under domination of gamblers and other representatives of the "tough" element. There were a number of murders and numerous cutting and shooting "scrapes." From an old resident we learn that in 1858 there were the following business houses at The Dalles:

Umatilla House, A. J. Nixon; Cushing Hotel and store; Restaurant and lodging house, N. H. Gates; Wasco Hotel, A. H. Curtiss; Bradford & Company's steamboat office; grocery, W. D. Bigelow; Mount Hood saloon, B. F. McCormack; saddle and harness shop, Powell & Company; saloon, Trevitt & Cowne; grocery store, James McAuliff; assay office, W. C. Moody; drug store, P. Craig; general merchandise, H. P. Isaacs; warehouse, R. R. Thompson & Company; cigar store, J. Juker; bakery, W. L. DeMoss.

A picture of The Dalles as it appeared in 1858 will be found in this volume.

A new charter was granted in 1859. It was written by Mr. O. Humason, and, among other provisions it changed the limits of the city from the first to the second bluff, and allowed the election of regular city officials instead of trustees.

The discoveries of auriferous deposits in Idaho and eastern Oregon in 1862 resulted in bringing The Dalles into considerable prominence as a business center and point for outfitting. For many years, and until the completion of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's line of railroad in 1881, it was the principal shipping point of the interior. With freight and passengers the boats of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company were constantly loaded, when en route to the new discoveries. For the entire country east of the Cascade range The Dalles was the center of trade. Long lines of freight trains and pack animals thronged the streets. At this period quartz mining was attracting but little attention. Placers were prime favorites and those of Canyon City and Salmon City drew thousands, many of whom would return to The Dalles to winter.

Coin was scarce; paper money almost unknown, or but faintly remembered as a species of currency which some of the older miners had seen in a far distant period of their lives. Gold dust was the circulating medium and everything was, literally, on a gold basis. There was, too, plenty of it, and it was possessed by men who possessed little idea of economical expenditures. They squandered their dust lavishly on whatever caught their fleeting fancy; verily The Dalles was lively. And during that Golcondian period ample fortunes were rapidly made.

Through the teeming streets of The Dalles passed prospecting miners, from California, Mexico, the eastern states and British Columbia, on to Orofino and Florence. While on the creek bottoms alone farming was prosecuted, all descriptions of produce were disposed of at fabulous prices. At one time The Dalles almost monopolized the trade of all the vast territory now comprising the states of Idaho, Montana and a portion of eastern Washington. Merchants from Boise, Missoula, Walla Walla and Colville—from all towns within a radius of a thousand miles assembled in the streets of The Dalles and freely canvassed financial conditions of the times. During the days of the Salmon river excitement it was not unusual for The Dalles to have within its limits an army of prospectors and miners numbering not less than 10,000. Its merchants ranked among the most enterprising and wealthiest on the coast. To a municipality located like The Dalles a mining fever was in those days a sincerely appreciated boon; it was the main stay of the city's prosperity. Later, however, other supply points sprang up, farther within the upper country; there was a decline in the industry of placer mining; The Dalles lost a certain proportion of its former glorious prestige. For several years it was permeated by an air of dullness and business depression. This, however, was merely a transition period. It soon exhibited renewed activity; a new and more substantial cause for prosperity had been discovered; The Dalles was surrounded by one of the most arable and productive agricultural districts of the northwest. The once despised "hills" were cut up into fertile farms; the produce was marketed at The Dalles; the town again became a scene of activity—but this is throwing us quite a distance ahead of our story.

February 25, 1862, to James S. Reynolds a right of way was granted to lay water pipes through the streets and alleys of Dalles City. September 6th, of the same year the franchise was transferred to R. Pentland. The latter immediately commenced, and soon thereafter completed the work. About November 1, water was pipied into the city. It was in July, 1862, that Mr. Pentland had first come to The Dalles. He made a careful survey of the ground and decided that the city was ripe for a system of water works. In 1877 Mr. Pentland disposed of the system to S. L. Brooks and the O. Humason estate. In 1883 the plant was sold to The Dalles Milling & Water Company. The present water system is owned by Dalles City, and was mainly constructed in 1891. Although a matter of small moment, the fact is a curiosity, May 25, 1862, a right of way was granted to James S. Reynolds to lay a plank walk from Union street to low water mark on the Columbia river, and the right to collect toll on the same "plank walk."

The melting of the snow in the mountains during the early part of summer greatly increases the volume of water in the Columbia and its tributaries; in exceptional years the river overflows its banks and at times works considerable damage to property at The Dalles. The first of these flood years is remembered as in 1862. Front and Second streets were submerged and water even reached as high as Third street. The highest stage of water was 48 feet ten inches above low water mark.

To J. K. Kelly belongs the distinction of being the first mayor of The Dalles. This was in 1863. Previous to that period the board of aldermen—or common council—were known as trustees. Mayor Kelly drafted a compendium of rules for the city which were promptly adopted by the new councilmen for their guidance. The "boom" days of the early '60's were accelerated by the establishment of many new enterprises—or new projects, rather, as some of them missed fruition. Among these latter was a gas plant. A franchise for such a plant at The Dalles was issued to H. D. Green, February 5, 1863. He commenced the work; abandoned it, and the plant was never completed. On oil lamps the town depended until the completion of the electric light plant in 1882. The erection of the shops of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company was an important event of the important year of 1863. Those first in charge of these operations were John Torrence, foreman; Thomas Smith, James M. Smith, John Wait, machinists; William Harman, blacksmith; William Marshall, boiler-maker. James M. Smith became foreman in 1866 and so continued until 1877, when the position was filled by J. F. Curtis, as master mechanic. In 1882 Mr. C. C. Hobart became master mechanic.

The nearest The Dalles ever came to possessing a United States Mint was in 1865, when a somewhat cloudy-minded and spasmodic congress appropriated $100,000 for that purpose. Work on the building was commenced by quarrying rock from about five miles up Mill creek. The enterprise gave employment to a large number of men. By the second summer the first story was completed. Then congress "threw another fit" and decided that it didn't want a mint at The Dalles. No further appropriation was made.

Several conflicting stories are told concerning a portion of this congressional mint appropriation. Some people have gone so far as to assert that a portion of the money was deflected into political channels, and used to defray campaign expenses of a certain place-hunter and corrupt politician of the sunset years of the '90's. It is claimed that the campaign was sharp, short and decisive, and that the candidate running on the "mint" appropriation was defeated by the narrow margin of one vote.

The second experience of The Dalles with high water was during the flood of 1866, when the Columbia again overflowed the lower part of the city. Again in 1871 occurred another "flood" year, in which considerable damage was wrought. The same year fully half of the city was swept out of existence by fire, and a number of citizens left penniless. Yet the town soon regained its activity; merchants and mechanics were again on their feet. The fire of August 17, 1871, broke out in the old Globe Hotel, corner of Second and Washington streets, destroying all the east portion of the town as far as Rev. Thomas Condon's residence on the corner of Third and Laughlin streets. This edifice was saved only by strenuous efforts of the citizens. The rows of handsome poplar trees surrounding the house were killed by the flames. The total loss by this conflagration was estimated at $100,000.

The first flouring mill to be erected in The Dalles was built by Robert Pentland in 1866. It was located in the west end of town and ran by water power from Mill Creek. It was of small capacity and used old-fashioned burrs of which it had two sets.

In 1867, a company was organized at The Dalles called The Dalles Woolen Mills Company. The incorporators were Zelek Donnell, Henry Marlin, and W. P. Abrams. The capital stock was $20,000. This mill was built in 1867 and was run by water power taken from Mill Creek. A knitting machine was installed and cloth, blankets, socks, etc., were made here and put on the market, but owing to the poor finish of the articles manufactured they became a drug on the market. The company fell behind and borrowed $17,000 from Benjamin Snipes. The property was turned over to him. During the 70's he sold the machinery and in 1880 with J. A. Smith converted it into a flouring mill of fifty barrel a day capacity. They continued to operate this mill until 1879.

In 1876 the population of The Dalles was given as 900. The same year the annual flood reached the highest point in the history of the town. June 23d the Columbia, at 4 o'clock a. m., was 51 feet three inches above low water mark. Following this instructive episode the business houses which before the flood had been on Front were rebuilt on Second street, and the latter thoroughfare became the principal street.

With the decline of gold production in Idaho and Montana, in 1868, combined with the establishment of other routes to the "diggings," The Dalles lost some prestige and for a number of years wore an air of depression and business stagnation. But this was the turning point of its civic existence. Heretofore it had depended solely upon the product of mines; now the time had arrived when it must look to other resources for prosperity. Happily they were all around them in the valleys and on the hills—thousands of acres of as fertile land as ever warmed to generous fecundity beneath the rays of a kindly sun. What may be termed permanent development of The Dalles may be dated from 1877. From a mining outfitting "station" the city evolved into a center of substantial, permanent and continuous trade. Immigrants poured in from all sections of the United States and from beyond its shores so soon as the railroad was an established fact.

October 27, 1878, another blaze licked up considerable property in The Dalles. It originated in Corumis' saddler shop on Second street, burning Wingate's store and residences and all the property between Federal and Washington streets below Fourth. At this fire H. J. Waldron received injuries from over exertion which caused his death. Mr. Waldron was a pioneer and at the time of the conflagration was proprietor of a drug store in the old stone building adjoining the Cosmopolitan Hotel.

May 21, 1879, The Dalles was afflicted by the most disastrous fire in her history, up to that date. The property loss was not so heavy as in the subsequent fire of 1891, but considering the size of the city in 1879 it was, really, more disastrous. Entire blocks melted away before the onward rush of the destroying element; within three hours the business portion of The Dalles was laid waste—a mass of black and smouldering ruins. It broke out in the Pioneer Hotel, Second street, about two o'clock p. m. East, west, north and south the flames spread from the hotel. Even the atmosphere joined in this fiery conspiracy, and the wind shifted so often that a large radius was swept over, the advance of which nothing in the way of fire-fighting appliances in the possession of The Dalles could check. The total loss was estimated at $500,000, a large portion of which was covered by insurance. However, the Times-Mountaineer of 1889, says that the loss was only $100,000, while The Dalles Chronicle asserts that this fire originated in the Kiss hotel, at that time located just west of Snipes & Kinnersly's drug store.

But this fire was followed by a "boom." The latter portion of 1879 and the whole of 1880 were lively periods. About that time the extension of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's lines to Walla Walla and Portland was under way. This gave employment to a large number of workmen; The Dalles again became a depot of supplies; merchants were rewarded by a brisk trade. April 7, 1880, the Dalles Times said, "Immigration is pouring so fast into our city that our hotels appear to be crowded to their utmost capacity." June 8th it added: "The increase of our vote yesterday shows the growth of our city in the last few years. Not long ago the population of The Dalles was not over 900, and now we poll 838 votes. Averaging three inhabitants to a vote (which we think quite small), and our population is over 2,500." The census of 1880 gave the number of residents in the city proper at 2,250; in the entire township, including The Dalles, there were 3,250. And now The Dalles ranked among Oregon cities fifth in size, the four larger being respectively Portland, East Portland, Salem and Astoria. The number of persons residing within the city limits in 1880 should be added to those on the military reservation, 350; totalling 2,600. In 1876 the population claimed was only 900 at The Dalles, including those on the military reservation, showing a gain in four years of 1,700.

Meanwhile The Dalles was building into a handsome and attractive city. Sills were planted one day to blossom into rafters the next. In places where a few years past not a building stood, were now clusters of dwellings and business blocks. There was not a sufficient number of carpenters and other workmen to supply the demand. Machine shops, car shops and round houses were established in the town. January 4, 1881, The Dalles Times said:

The growth of our city in the last three years has far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine and this growth has been substantial in every particular. Not such as in years past followed a new mining excitement when box houses would be built as if by magic, but such as will last. What is the cause of this? During the last few years a vast immigration has settled upon our lands, and the bunch grass hills have been made to produce abundantly. This has made The Dalles a market for a large agricultural population and is one reason for our prosperity. Another, and perhaps a more direct reason, is the great activity in railroads evinced by the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. This has made The Dalles a railroad center for eastern Oregon—not as regards location, but on account of convenience. Agriculture and the railroads have been the two principal factors in our present business importance.

Descriptive of these railroad buildings the Times-Mountaineer of January 1, 1889, said:

The works are located upon a peninsula jutting into the Columbia, containing about eighteen acres, but not more, perhaps, than ten acres are occupied upon which to operate the company's interests, comprising offices, tin shops, car-repairing shops, carpenter and machine shops, upholstering rooms, round-houses, blacksmith shops, drafting rooms, casting shops, pumping works and innumerable sheds, tanks and storage rooms. One would naturally conclude that great confusion would exist and that a chaotic condition would obtain; but such is not the case; the entire premises are kept scrupulously clean, the yards are swept regularly, a man being kept permanently employed for the work. Not the merest scrap of iron or splinter of wood will be found out of place—the system, the discipline, the mutual agreeability to do and perform can only be equalled by that upon shipboard, and a ship, it is said, has no better model upon earth for order and exactness.

As is the condition of most towns during railroad building, The Dalles in 1880, gained notoriety as being a "tough town." The undesired element flocked to the city and the result was anything but satisfactory to the law-abiding citizens. Robberies and homicides became of frequent occurrence and for a period almost a reign of terror existed.

June 18, 1880, The Dalles was again visited by a fire which, but for the efficient work of the city's department would have proved fully as disastrous as the one of the year previous. It was the diabolical work of an incendiary. To the amount of several thousand dollars property was destroyed, and the principal losses were Emile Schanno, building, $2,500, insurance, $1,500; H. Groeninger, liquors, $600, insurance, $1,500; Gerson & Liebes, stock in store, $3,000, insurance, $2,000; Fred Drews, barber shop, $600, insurance $500. Aside from this much property was destroyed in moving stocks, etc.

The July flood of 1880 fully warranted the alarm previously felt among the citizens of The Dalles. For two weeks the waters of the Columbia lapped the front portion of the town, and drove business back to other streets. So excellent was the description of this casualty published in the Times of June 29, that we reproduce it:

For many weeks past we have watched the river anxiously, fearing a flood at this place. All reports from the upper country left it beyond doubt that vast quantities of snow had fallen in the mountains during the winter, which had to melt and flow away through the Columbia. Until within the last three weeks the season had been propitious. The cold weather had kept the snow from melting and we had hoped a gradual thaw would take place, and the surplus water would flow off without doing any material damage. Last week in the Times we told our readers we thought the highest stage of water had been reached, for it began to recede at that time. The first part of last week the weather became intensely warm and all said if there was much snow in the mountains we should soon see the effect of its melting. Friday, June 25, the water began to raise, and kept gradually creeping over the surface of the town. On that evening it commenced to crawl over the street between the postoffice and the new Umatilla house. Friday night the river raised considerably and Saturday morning found it coming up Court street, between First and Second, and east through the alley to Moody's store. Early on that morning the machinists were awakened from their slumbers and hurried to their shop. They removed their lathe and some other machinery to the car-shop, some three or four feet higher. The machine shop was flooded during the day and the machinists had to stop work.

All day Saturday the water increased and at night the company's grounds were overflowed with the exception of the raised track and the buildings raised to the new level. Mr. Moody's store was completely surrounded and all day Saturday he was busy removing his goods to a new building which he had in course of construction on Third street, beyond Mr. Michell's planing mill. Sunday the river assumed gigantic proportions, and verily the flood was upon us. It was a day of intense activity throughout our city. The Front street merchants were removing their goods to other parts of the city, and drays and wagons were constantly employed. Snipes & Kenersley, of the drug store, completed removing their stock. The building stands on the old level, and on Sunday morning there were some five or six inches of water over the floor. By means of gum boots they worked faithfully in getting their goods out of the store. The drays in going to the drug store and to Moody's store had to go through water up to the hubs of the wheels.

The water had filled up Union street nearly to Third; up Court it covered the streets to near the intersection of Second, and on Washington it had come up to the alley between Front and Second. The railroad track was covered in a few places near the corner of Front and Court. In the afternoon the company removed their wharf-boat to the east end of Front street, and moored her in front of Mr. Fitzgerald's store.

Sunday night was an anxious night to all on Front street. The Columbia had become a torrent, and to look across, with the miniature white caps, it appeared like a raging inland sea. The dull roar and tumble of The Dalles could be heard and sounded like Niagara. To add to the dreariness of this, the waves of a swollen, angry river were washing and beating into spray at the doors of the occupants on Front street. Another hour might see them submerged. Messrs. Handley & Sinnott were determined to stand at their post and at 11 o'clock Sunday night, when the water of the river was up to the floor of the Umatilla house, we inquired of them whether they would move: "No," they said, "we shall have a false floor raised about two or three feet and try to weather it through." The sight on Front street at that hour was dismal in the extreme. The water covered the entire length of the street from Washington to Union. The river was the constant scene of attraction all day Sunday. Crowds of people thronged the sidewalks, anxious to get a sight of the swollen stream. They crowded the sidewalks where the water had not covered them and dazed gazing at the angry flood.

On Monday morning the river had submerged the lower part of town to a considerable distance. A clear sheet of water extended down Front street from the Columbia hotel. Mr. Nicholas maintained his position by making a raised walk to and from his hotel. The sidewalk of the Cosmopolitan hotel was even with the water's edge, and the proprietor moved his kitchen, etc. Six inches of water was on the floor of the Umatilla house and boats were going through Front street. Second street, between Union and Court, was covered with water. The sidewalks along Front street and the cross streets had been covered with stones which kept them in their places, and those who still remained had raised the contents of their store up on counters. Early in the day Freeman Brothers had occupied the building formerly used by Henry Groeninger, and Snipes & Kinersly had quietly ensconced themselves on Second street in the brick store under the opera house.

Everybody was anxiously watching the flood, not knowing where it would end. It had already surpassed the high water mark of 1871, and was fast approaching that of 1876. Looking down Front street at noon of that day nothing could be seen above the water but the buildings and a portion of the railroad bridge over Mill creek. That stream is truly at flood tide. It presents fully the appearance of a river, and has increased considerably on its banks. Mr. Baum, occupying the building formerly occupied by Mr. Alex. Smith, moved his household furniture, and we fear that the other residents on the bank of that stream will be forced to find other quarters. The amount of damage done by the flood cannot at present be ascertained. The cost of moving heavy stocks of goods will be considerable, and the necessary cessation from business will be a great loss. It will be some time before our city will again assume its former activity, as business has been interfered with by the flood. It comes unusually hard so soon after the conflagration of 1879, but we have great faith in the resuscitating power of our city. If she could raise, Phoenix-like, from the conflagration of 1879, she can raise herself from the loss by the flood of 1880. At 12 o'clock noon, yesterday, June 28th, the water lacked four feet two inches of the 1876 high water mark. The stage of water up to 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon was 47 feet two inches above low water mark.

July 2, 1880, the water reached 48 feet 7½ inches above low water mark. This was the highest point gained during the flood of this year. July 6, 1880, the Times said:

The present week will be known in The Dalles as "flood week." For eight or ten days a great portion of the business part of our city has been submerged. For nearly a week all business houses on Front street have been removed to other parts of our city and that active thoroughfare has been covered by a sheet of water. The waves of the Columbia for seven days past have washed Court street within fifteen feet of the court house; Union street to an equal distance from Third; Washington the same. Anxious faces have watched the water constantly, and the inquiry has eagerly passed, "Is the river rising or falling?" Boats have passed up and down Front street every hour in the day for a week past, passing business houses which only a little while ago were busy marts of trade. An air of desolation and destruction prevails that portion of our beautiful city. The river is king and we have bowed to its mandate. The Columbia has wedded The Dalles, and the nuptials were performed by hot, sweltering weather and swollen tides. We are not rejoicing over the bridal scene, but acquiesce. Our beautiful rivulet, Mill creek, generally not of sufficient proportions to be denominated a creek, has stretched out over its banks and fairly won the name of river. Buildings and bridges have been submerged by its outpouring waters, and orchards and gardens swept over by its angry floods. Second street has become the thoroughfare of the city and is thronged every hour of the day. This street can only be traveled in some places by means of raised walks, and it is here that that venerable individual so often mentioned by the press, takes his stand, and points to the raging, seething flood with his ominous finger and says, "I told you so."

Some of our citizens on Front street amuse themselves from the upper doors and windows fishing. Quite a number of salmon have been caught with a dip-net. We don't know that the parties had a license for salmon fishing, and we don't think they thought of anything except the novelty and fun of pulling up the silvery salmon over the place where the tread of business formerly sounded. The salmon unwittingly cavort up our streets with naught to fear save a stray fisherman.

Up to the hour of going to press the river has fallen about a foot from its highest stage. We hope the river will not rise any higher, but the present warm weather may swell the volume of water again.

Saturday morning, July 10th, the water began to recede, and by the following day the whole of Front street could be traversed. A little later the business firms moved back to their former locations. This flood reached the highest mark of any in previous history (white man's), except the one of 1876.

The Oregon legislature convened in September, 1880. During this session H. B. No. 3, to amend the city charter of The Dalles, was introduced. Monday, September 20th, the house passed the measure by a vote of 50 to 0; the vote in the senate was, also, unanimously in favor of it. Shortly afterward it went into effect and became a law. This bill was drafted by Judge McArthur. It conferred on The Dalles sufficient corporate powers to check the vicious element which, for a period, had everything their own way and, colloquially speaking, "ran the town."

To a former resident, who had not visited the town for three years, the improvements on exhibition in June, 1881, might have awakened no small wonder and astonishment. But a few years prior some of the finest and most attractive streets had been occupied by rows of dilapidated "shacks" and "shanties." The fire of 1879 wrought great destruction within a few hours; a trifle over two years elapsed and the burnt district was adorned by many substantial structures. The voice of the chronic croaker had been drowned by the din of hammer and saw. Only a few years prior to 1881 the Gates addition was a wheat field and garden patch. The latter year this space was occupied by lines of pleasant, comfortable homes and well-kept streets. Above them, on another bench, stood the Wasco Independent Academy; an edifice pronounced by many the prettiest educational institution at that period in the state. On nearly every corner new residences were being built; vacant lots were being utilized; and The Dalles assumed a more definite and compact appearance, with evidences on every hand of taste and culture. Still, following the completion of the railroad to Portland, there was noticeable a certain reaction in business activity, and minor towns along the line appropriated considerable business—piecemeal—that formerly went to The Dalles.

June floods in the Columbia have come almost as regularly as annual holidays. The flood of 1882 was a replica of many preceding ones, with the difference that citizens were, perhaps, better prepared to resist its devastations. Waters of the river rose to the level of the floor of the Umatilla house and adjoining sidewalks; those in the west end of the city were covered to a depth of several inches. Portions of the track over the old railway bridge were entirely submerged and it was not considered safe for engines to cross. A hurricane wind whipped the water of the river and from Front street across to the northern bank it presented a sea of white caps. Again Mill creek assumed the proportions of a river. Gum boots again became stylish articles of wearing apparel; raised sidewalks became a necessity to business transactions. The highest stage reached by the flood of 1882, 48 feet two inches above low water mark, was reached June 14, at 5 o'clock p. m. The great flood years had been 1866, 1868, 1872, 1876, 1880 and 1882.

In the spring of 1883 fish packing became a leading industry of the city. Two fish wheels were placed in operation in the river above The Dalles in 1884; thousands of salmon were thus taken each week. They were packed in ice and shipped in refrigerating cars to many points in the east.

A $53,000 fire by which half a block of buildings was consumed occurred January 23, 1884. Soon after midnight the fire alarm was sounded, and it was discovered that the flames had originated in S. Baden's building. From the lower corner of Second and Court streets the fire department laid a well-directed stream on the burning buildings, but the flames spread with remarkable rapidity. At once the owners and renters of business houses in the doomed blocks bent their energies toward saving such of their stocks of goods as was possible. Finally the brick building of Snipes & Kinersley stayed further progress of the flames to the east, and men were stationed on the roofs of buildings on the south, and by means of wet blankets and buckets of water kept the shingles thoroughly soaked. Fortunately only a slight breeze prevailed, and the fire department did excellent work. Following were the losses: Emile Shanno, buildings, $6,000; Handlay & Sinnot, $4,000; Dickerson & Neitz, $10,000; Wasco Sun, damages to presses and material, $500; Dumdi & Company, $300; Waldron & Covilland, $7,000; H. Gerson, $10,000; S. Baden, $3,000; D. A. Whitman, $2,500; M. T. Nolan, $7,000; R. Fulton, $2,000; W. E. Ganetson, $800; W. S. Myers, law office, $200. Insurance on buildings and stock amounted to about one-third of the total loss.

So rapid was the growth of The Dalles during the early '80's that at the close of 1884 the Times-Mountaineer estimated the population at 3,500. This was an increase of 1,250 over the census of 1880. During the years of 1884-5 there was a steady and marked improvement in the appearance of the city. Blocks destroyed by fire had been rebuilt in a most substantial manner, brick, in many cases replacing wooden structures. The suburbs were adorned by handsome dwellings greatly adding to the city's appearance, all contributing evidence to the patriotic enterprise of the wealthiest citizens of The Dalles.

It is a fact, notably attested in the series of wars participated in by the American nation, that the citizen soldier is far superior to members of the regular army. While the latter may be the better drilled machines, they are, almost invari-bly devoid of patriotism and weak of heart. The same truth applies to other nations as well as our own. January 1, 1889, the Times-Mountaineer said:

It is a source of gratification to know that the people of Oregon, while sleepy and sluggish in many other ways, are not without the old military ardor of the nation to which they belong, and that in forming militia corps for the protection of public peace and safety, they have done a laudable service. * * * It was in November, 1886, that Company C, of the Third Infantry, Oregon National Guard, was formed in this town by Charles E. Morgan, then captain of E company, First Regiment in Portland. At that time the gentleman issued a circular calling upon the citizens of The Dalles to meet him and aid in organizing a company to be attached to the Oregon National Guards. At the meeting a general response was made and some fifty men signed the muster roll for the purpose of forming the company. Immediately after the formation of the company an election of officers was held which resulted in the choice of Charles E. Morgan as captain, and William H. Sharp and George H. Bennett as first and second lieutenants.

At first, and for sometime after, inspired by the action of Colonel Morgan, much interest was shown to make the thing a success. As in all other small towns in a new country the uniform soon lost its attraction to some, and while the number of men was kept up, the spirit of the soldier deteriorated. Such, indeed, it may be regretted, is the case today and the condition of the company, in different ways, not all that could be desired. * * * At present the company is under the command of Edward M. Williams, second lieutenant, owing to the resignation of the late captain and first lieutenant. This is as it should be. It is never known when the services of the militia may be required. Since its organization there has always been a company of the National Guard in this city.

The Dalles was visited by another serious fire Sunday morning, September 2, 1888. Nearly two blocks between Second and Fourth streets were consumed. It originated about 2:30 and it was after 4 o'clock before the flames were under control. Losses amounted to about $42,500, and the insurance carried was about $22,500. This fire broke out in the rear of the furniture and auction store of Samuel Klein, on Washington street, and spread rapidly. It had a clear range along the alley between Washington and Federal streets, with the exception of the rear portions of the brick blocks on Second street. The flames then found their way to Third street, and although strenuous efforts were made they destroyed the entire block with the exception of a blacksmith shop, the brick buildings and I. C. Nickelson's book store. So soon as the old Baptist church and the red barn were afire it was known the block between Third and Fourth and Washington and Federal streets was doomed. Strong efforts were made to confine the fire to this block, but they proved unavailing. Crossing Third street the fire licked up Dietzel's corner, Mrs. Hutchinson's millinery store, Edward's store, Doherty's residence and justice office, Congregational church, Tenino Packing Company's store, Johnson's residence and Miller Brothers' butcher shop. Up Washington street the fire swept everything clear to, and including, one of the cottages of Mr. P. J. Nichols. Fears were entertained that the flames would cross Federal street and in that emergency the whole eastern portion of this city would have been doomed.

At last the flames were under control. There was but little breeze stirring or, with the progress the fire had attained, a much more serious conflagration would have resulted. Following are a few of the heaviest losses:

Max Vogt, $9,000; Mrs. Nichols, $1,800; French & Company, $1,350; George A. Liebe, $2,000; H. Glenn, $1,300; Mrs. A. Gray, $1,500; John Brookhouse, $1,500; W. Y. Wolf, $1,500; O. D. Taylor, $1,900; L. G. Sanders, $3,100; D. W. Edwards, $2,500; Dietzel Brothers, $3,000; A. H. Coy, $2,500; McFarland & French, $1,100.

The Times-Mountaineer of January 1, 1889, concerns the "building boom" of 1888:

When a town goes on increasing in its buildings, public and private, unobserved, as it were, from the force of local factors, position, surroundings, resources and railroad facilities, it may be taken for granted that town has a future which cannot be checked, and that when the day of progress comes its growth will be as rapid as it has been certain in the past. Such is The Dalles today. Few people have a correct idea of the number of buildings erected in the town during the year now closing. The following table speaks for itself and ought to convince the most skeptical of the future of the town:

Electric light plant .....	$20,000
Max Vogt, two buildings .....	5,000
Max Vogt, two stores .....	3,000
Max Vogt, two brick buildings in course of construction ($70,000) spent .....	20,000
J. C. Baldwin, four stores .....	5,000
S. L. Brooks, brick store .....	17,000
Lord & Laughlin, Armory Hall .....	2,000
A. Buchler, bottling house .....	600
Larsen & Saltmarsh, stockyards .....	600

George A. Liebe, barn .....	$250
Handley & Sinnott, ice house .....	590
A. R. Thompson, dwelling .....	2,000
Congregational Church .....	6,000
Barrels .....	3,000
Other items .....	2,000
	$87,040

The stockyards, stables, fences and other work were improved by Messrs. Larsen & Saltmarsh, $1,500. Mr. McCrum & Company also erected three new buildings—two private residences and one store, aggregating $3,600. The precise work done by other builders and contractors could not be ascertained, but taking it in all kinds of buildings, public and private, a leading contractor in town puts the total of this work at $50,000. These figures in the aggregate give a grand total of $142,140; quite a respectable showing. It is quite safe to say that next year the amount will be doubled.

The year 1889 was, also, one of unusual activity in The Dalles, about $500,000 having been expended that year in buildings, among them a roller mill, four stories high; an elegant brick opera house second to none other in the state. A resume of the combined enterprises of the '80's is found in the following from the same issue of the Times-Mountaineer.

The city now numbers over 4,000 population and boasts of many modern improvements. Within the last few years solid brick blocks have been erected and places which were once grain fields embraced within the city limits. A good system of sidewalks has been constructed, streets have been graded, fire limits established and other strides made in the direction of municipal growth. The industrial development has not been entirely neglected, and two large brick warehouses have been erected for the storage of grain and wool. Every season of the year large quantities of the rich products of the surrounding country find their way to these buildings, and create quite a stir in business life and send a large amount of money in circulation. Then the long established shops of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company give employment to several hundred men, and the monthly pay-roll adds very largely to the amount of the circulating medium. These are all factors of development, and add very materially to the prosperity of the city. The electric light system has been lately introduced and we have no doubt that when the arrangement is perfected it will add brilliancy to our stores and streets. There no doubt has been a healthy growth in the last few years (but nothing commensurate with the advantages offered. * * * Capital is not wanting. On a rough estimate there is $7,000,000 now the same as lying dormant, which might be invested in enterprises tending to increase the population and wealth. But a fatal lethargy appears to possess our business men. * * * There are exceptions, we are glad to state, to this class of citizens, but they are the exceptions to a very general rule.

Saturday, January 11, 1890, was the date, and 9:30 p. m., the hour of another destructive blaze at The Dalles. Flames could be seen shooting up from the Chapman block, corner of Washington and Second streets, and soon a steady stream of water was being piped on to the fiery element. A defective flue was supposed to have been the cause of this conflagration. Flames soon gained the wooden partitions and closets, and here the water appeared to have little effect. Three inches of snow on the roof prevented danger to other localities from the flight of sparks. About 1:30 a. m. the flames were under control; the people breathed more freely. The ladies of The Dalles were complimented by the hard-working fire department and volunteer assistants for their thoughtful contributions of coffee and other refreshments of a substantial character. The militia company was on the ground and afforded ample protection to goods on the sidewalks outside the fire zone. These were the principal losses:

Max Vogt, building, $12,000; W. H. Moody & Company, $30,000; L. Rorden & Company, $10,000; H. Solomon, $5,000; D. L. Cates, $200; Dr. Waters, $100; John Cocker, $100; Dr. Boyd, $200; Dr. Rinehart, $100; Dufur & Watkins, $5,000; James Webster, $200; S. F. Boyer, $250.

In 1890 the federal census enumerators found in The Dalles 3,500 people.

So far back as 1887 the electors of The Dalles municipality had voted in favor of a new water supply. During the following session of the legislature an amended charter was granted permitting Dalles City to bond itself in the sum of $100,000 for an adequate, healthful water supply. In April, 1890, the bonds were advertised for sale and purchased. But this action proved eventually, a trouble-breeder. The city council passed an ordinance enabling the city to purchase the old plant of The Dalles Mill & Water Company for $50,000. On this question opinion was divided as to the better plan to secure a practical water system. The ordinance was vetoed by Mayor Moody and over this attempted nullification of the ordinance the city council passed the measure. A warrant for $50,000 for the payment of the plant was presented to the mayor for his signature. He declined to sign it. At the behest of an interested party the city was enjoined from paying $50,000 or any other sum for the old plant. For some time matters remained in statu quo. Mayor Moody was impeached on charges of malfeasance, negligence and incompetency and reprimanded.

At length the injunction was dissolved and November 29, 1890, the council passed a resolution authorizing the purchase of the plant of the mill and water company, and it was, accordingly secured. The water works are owned by the city, a most excellent system—one of the best in Oregon—providing good water for domestic use and an adequate supply with strong pressure in case of fires. Although a trifle out of chronological order the following from the Times-Mountaineer of September 6, 1904, is interesting:

Last Friday (September 2), the water commissioners, accompanied by a number of invited guests, made an inspection of the new water system that has just been completed from the Wicks place, eight miles up Mill Creek, to the city, and all were well pleased with the work that has been done by Contractor Wakefield.

The new system consists of a reservoir at the Wicks place into which the water is fed from a flume that reaches from the Johns mill, receiving the water from the sources of Mill creek and Dog river, which are fed by mountain springs and melting snow, hence is perfectly pure. From the Wicks place it is led through a twelve-inch steel pipe, having a fall of some 500 feet in six miles, to a new reservoir at the Mesplie place, three miles from town, thence it is carried in a 14-inch main to the new reservoir on the bluff about 100 feet above the old reservoir. Thus it will be seen that the water is conveyed directly from the mountains into the supply reservoir without coming into contact with anything to impregnate it with impurities.

By a special arrangement of the reservoir at Wicks the overflow is turned into the creek below and may be used for irrigating purposes along the farms, but none of the water thus used can find its way back into the mains that feed the supply reservoir. This reservoir to which the mains that lead into the city are attached is constructed of concrete and is supplied with a contrivance that keeps the water in circulation, causing it to retain its purity. The new reservoir is connected with the old in which a stand-pipe is constructed so that only overflow finds its way into it, thus keeping the new as well as the old reservoir full all the time. The latter is to be used as a storage for water that may be utilized in case of fire.

Those familiar with water works estimate that The Dalles now has a sufficient amount of water to supply a city of 20,000 inhabitants, and besides the volume being large the quality is the best, it being as pure as water can be. The improvements to the system have cost the city $50,000, but unquestionably the outlay has been judicious, since nothing is of greater benefit to a city than an abundant supply of pure, fresh water.

The most destructive fire ever experienced at The Dalles occurred September 2, 1891. More than twenty blocks were burned to the ground; many of the finest business structures were destroyed. This disastrous blaze originated in Skibbe's house. It was quickly carried onward by a light wind from the east; within the space on an hour the flames were feeding on three streets at once, making a clean sweep of everything below the bluff. The flames ate their way to Pease & May's corner, consuming the city's best block, the ornate and attractive Vogt building. On Third street to Joshua French's; on Fourth street to George Ruch's, the flames swept, and on Fifth street many fine residences were destroyed, and beautiful trees and attractive gardens laid waste.

In the course of this fire two lives were sacrificed. Michael Diamond was burned to death, his body being entirely consumed; Joseph Fitzgerald died from the effect of burns received in the conflagration. It began with an incipient kitchen blaze; it developed into the most destructive holocaust ever experienced by the citizens of The Dalles. Assisted by a stiff gale the fiery element leveled everything in its pathway. The loss was estimated at $1,000,000.

From the dwelling house of Mr. Skibbe the flames shot across to the frame building occupied by Mr. Jones and the Eureka restaurant. These were soon wrapped in flames, and the saddlery shop of H. Kuck and Skibbe's saloon in the brick building were destroyed. The flames then ran along Main and Third streets, lapping up the frame buildings on the corner and Neabach's granger feed yard. On down Third street the flames rushed, leaving destruction in their wake. One by one the following edifices fell victims to the fire: Residences of Messrs. Sylvester and Alloway, the dwelling houses west of Madison street, Mitchell's planing mill; the dwellings on Third street and the buildings on Second, between Federal and Laughlin streets. During this time destruction was raging from Second street south to the bluff. The handsome Fitzgerald building was soon gutted, and Gibbons, McAllister & Company's hardware store was wiped out of existence. The two-story stable of William Wiley followed, and then the building on the corner of Third and Federal streets was engulfed by flames. The three-story Vogt block and the opera house were soon a mass of ruins. The Vogt building was occupied by Mays & Crowe, hardware dealers; George Anderson, gunsmith; L. Rorden & Company, notions, cutlery, etc., exhibits of the board of immigration; Eastern Oregon Co-operative Association, and Charles J. Strubling, saloon. The upper story departments were rented to lawyers, physicians and individuals, the latter for sleeping rooms. Residences fell in rows, leaving blackened trails inside the sidewalks, away up toward the bluff. Among them were the dwellings of Mr. Roscoe, Mrs. Clark E. Griffith and William Mitchell. The butcher shop of Chrisman Brothers and the grocery of Chrisman & Corson disappeared; the residence of J. Doherty and Adams' shoe shop rolled away in smoke and ashes. Then followed the grocery store of A. A. Brown and the First Baptist church. This was followed by the burning of the Methodist Episcopal church and the cottage of F. P. Mays.

Another long line of handsome residences were snuffed out after the destruction of the Methodist church, concluding with the old building known as The Dalles brewery. Down Court street tongues of flame were leaping from the roofs and soon the residences of Messrs. Corson, Fitzgerald, Sellers and Grey were laid in ruins. The block south of the old brewery was wiped away, comprising the dwellings of William McCoy, Mr. Glasius and P. Willig. To the west of Court street another block was sacrificed. Resolved into smoke and ashes were the homes of D. W. Vase, Mrs. Juker, Mrs. Knaggs, W. Weggerman and O. Kinersly, and the handsome edifice of the Congregational Society. Meanwhile the block between Washington and Court streets, on the south side of Third street, was in flames. These buildings comprised the residences of Thomas Kelley, Mrs. Lacy, Frank Hill, A. A. Bonney, the engine house and the extensive building of the Columbia Packing Company. On Second street the McDonald Brothers' saloon, lodging house adjoining, and Mr. White's restaurant, B. Wolff's residence, Max Vogt's tenement block, Wingate's brick block and D. W. Edward's art gallery, Mr. Berger's residence, also Mr. Cathcart's and Mr. Crowe's and the Pacific Fence Works were simply piles of coals. Then followed Filloon Brothers' implement warehouse; residence of Mrs. Laughlin on the north; Hood's livery stable and residence; Jackson House, occupied by lodgers; Mrs. Ruch's tenement house; Mrs. Mitchell's and Mrs. Blakeney's residences; Brown's fruit store and lodging house. At George Ruch's residence the flames fought for supremacy, but by herculean efforts it was saved from destruction. The list of personal casualties was small. There were a number of minor accidents and several prostrations from exhaustion.

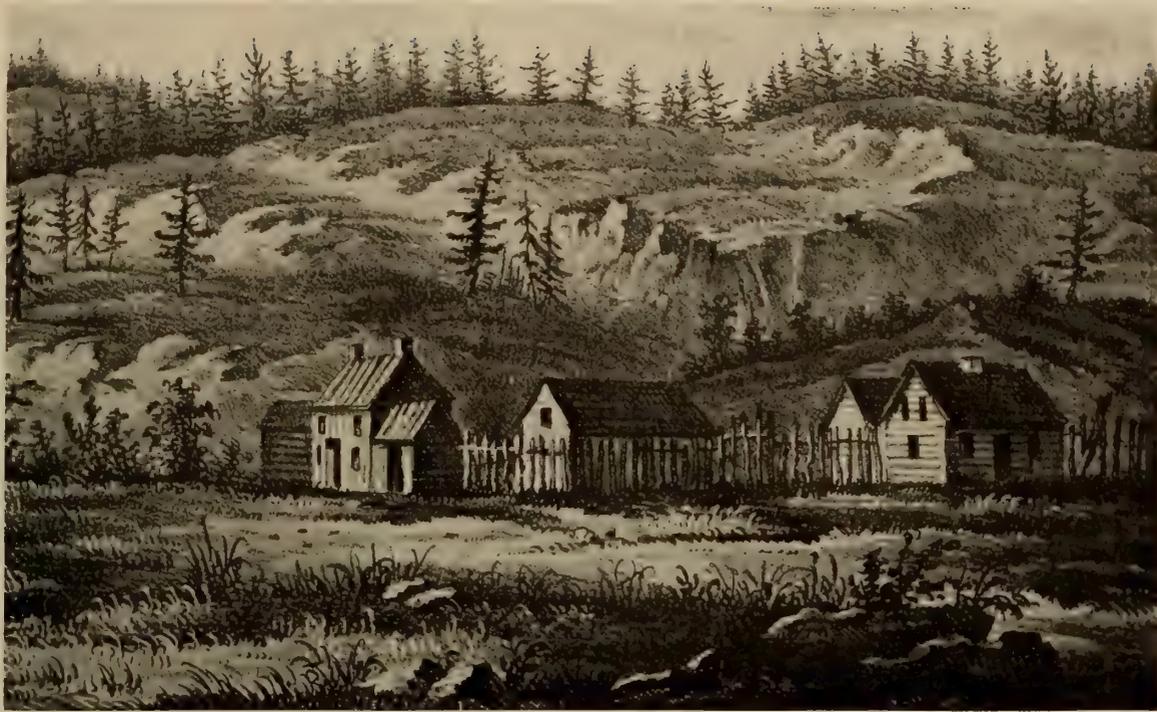

Michael Diamond, a carpenter, was missing; a search among the ruins of the Fitzgerald building where he was last seen, disclosed his charred remains. Joseph P. Fitzgerald, attempting to save goods belonging to his father and sister, fell into the flames. Wild with pain he ran out, was caught by bystanders, wet blankets thrown around him and the flames extinguished. Taken to the Sisters' Academy he died from the effects of his terrible burns. To Portland telegrams were sent for help. But the special train with a fire engine on board arrived too late to be of any assistance. The losses as reported in the Times-Mountaineer of September 5, 1891, were:

The damages awarded by insurance adjusters totalled over $200,000. September 3d Mayor Mays issued a call for the formation of a relief committee and a number of the leading citizens of The Dalles met and organized for this purpose. Sub-committees were appointed to ascertain where aid was necessary, and for receiving and distributing contributions.

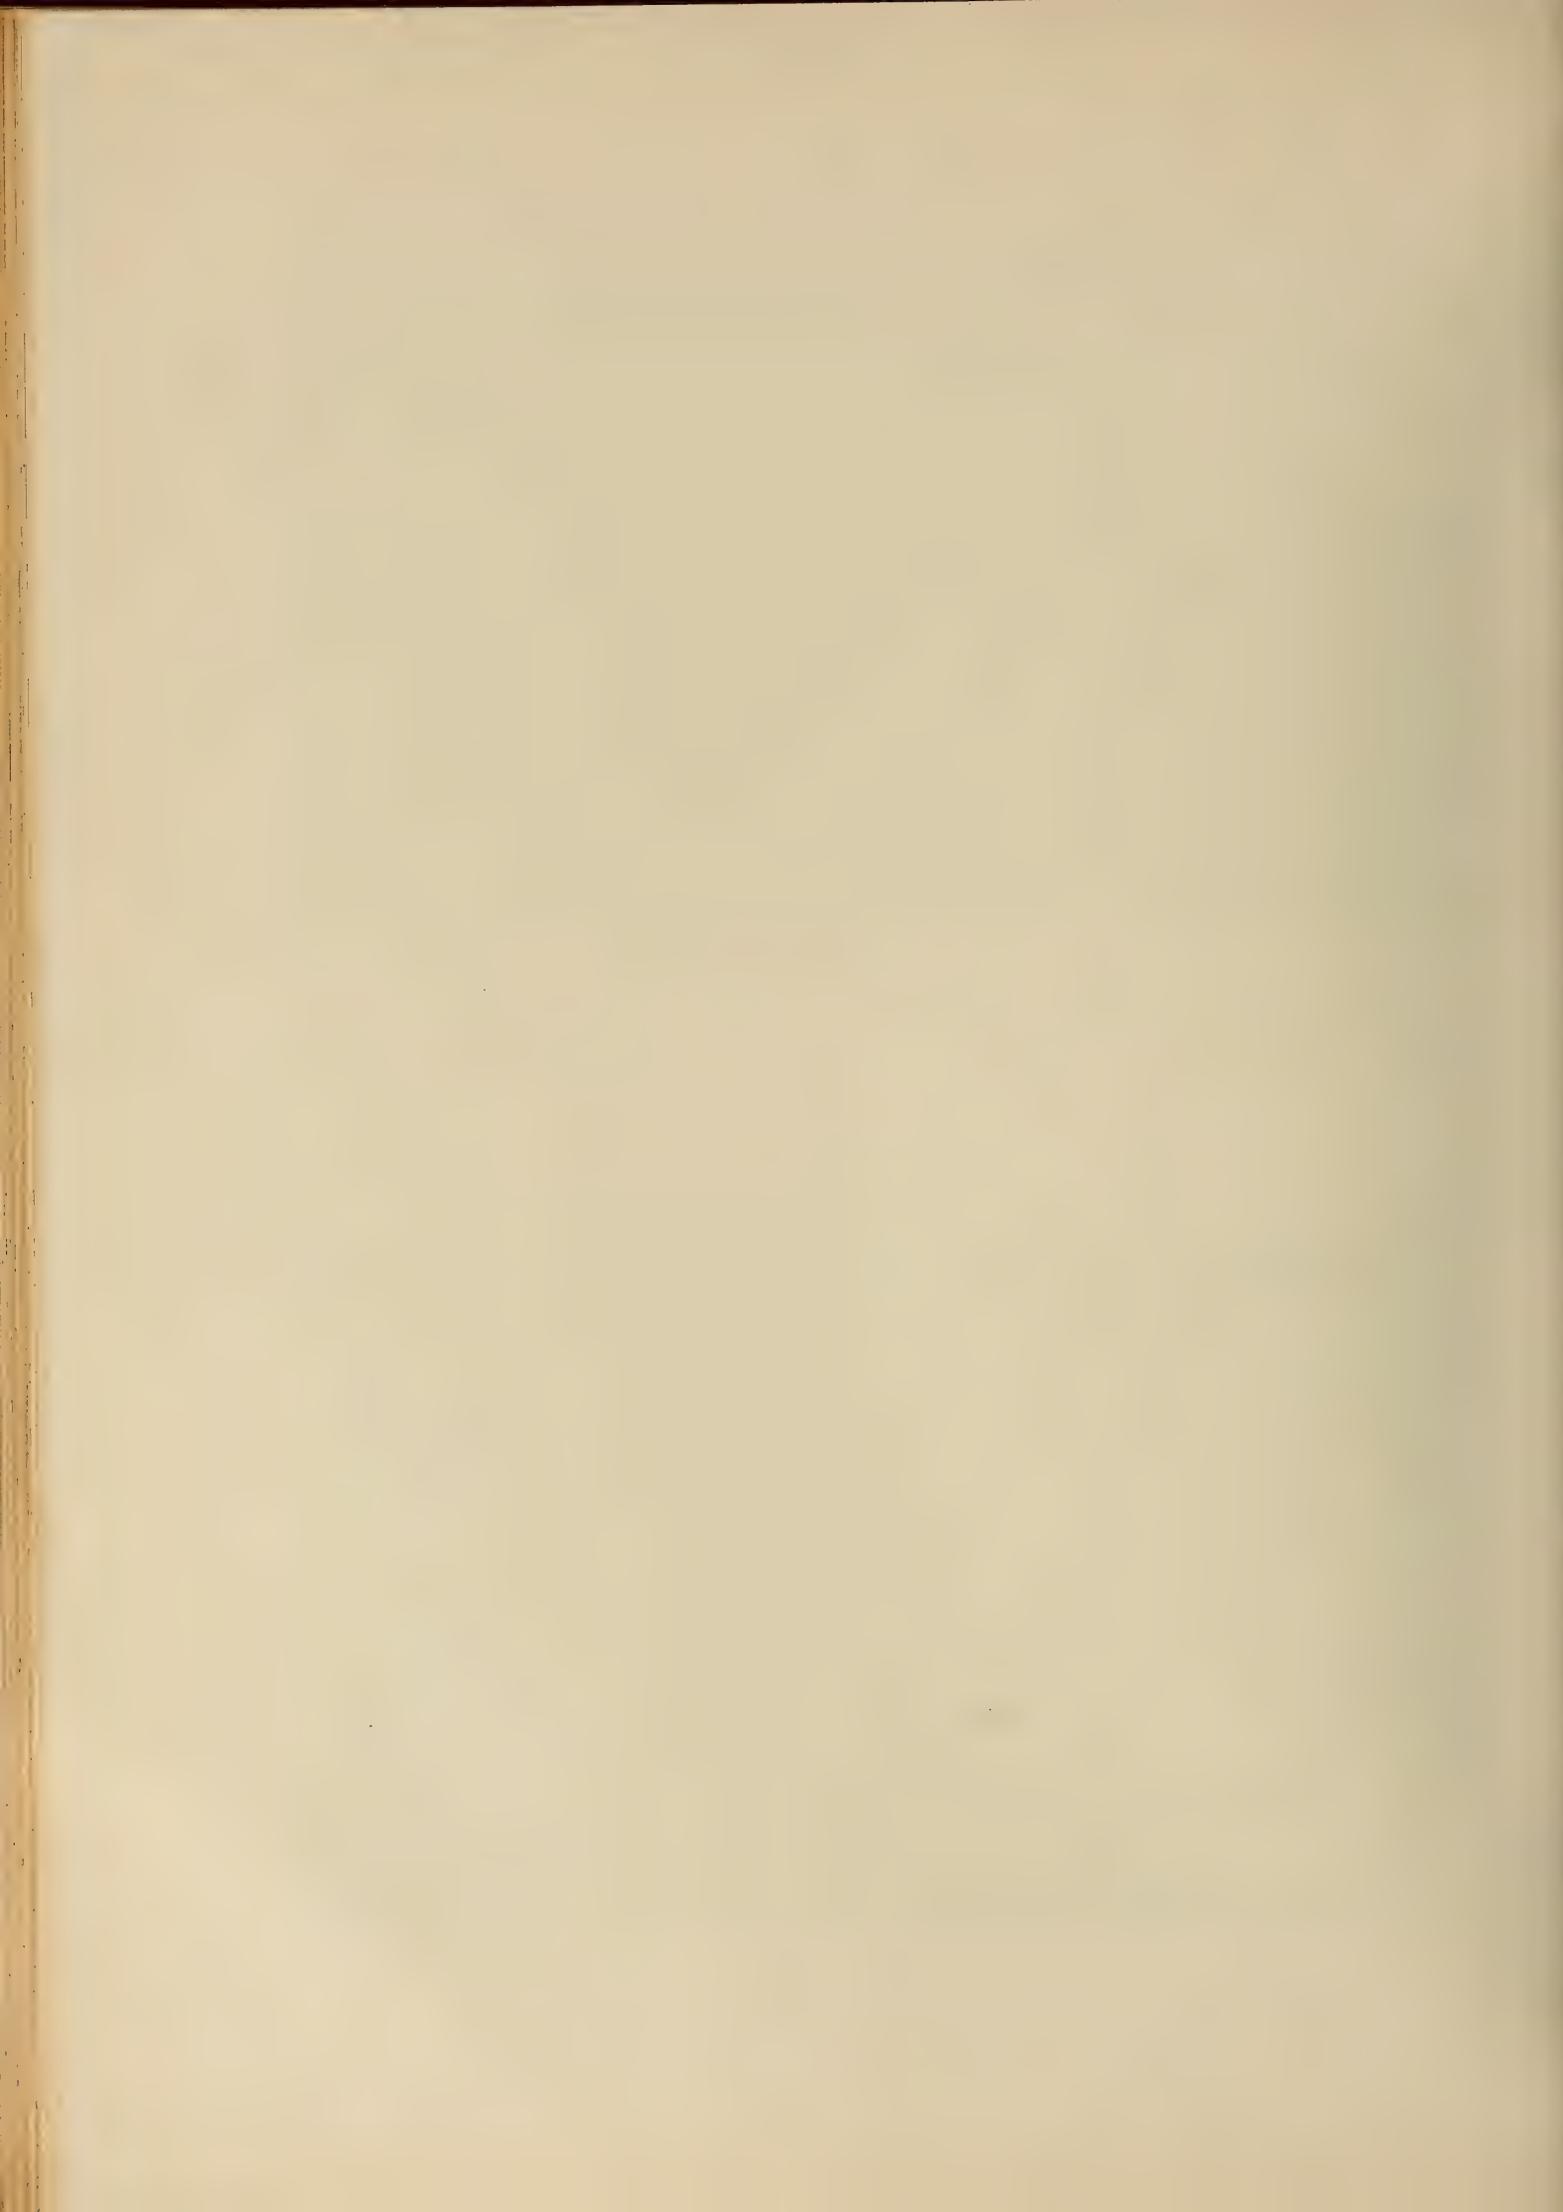

The investigating committee reported that 38 families had been found by diligent search, who needed, and who were deserving of help. But sixteen of these left The Dalles, or declined to receive help. Eleven others were families of men who were at work, and needed clothing for women and children, and household furniture for a short time only. Five were placed in the hands of different religious societies of which they were members, and were cared for. Six were families of widows and received assistance. With these facts at hand a committee was appointed to solicit subscriptions in The Dalles. Many voluntary subscriptions had been paid in; many offers from outside cities were received, but the citizens patriotically decided that The Dalles people could amply provide for their destitute. Still, the cities of Astoria, Salem, Seattle, Wasco, Hood River, Walla Walla and several others had sent in voluntary subscriptions, and for these expressions of good will hearty thanks were re-

What was colloquially known as "the hard times" of 1893 fell upon The Dalles as upon the rest of the state and country. Up to this period there had been a steady and marked improvement in the appearance of the city. Many new business structures and handsome residences had been built. The growth of the town had been slow but steady. Values had not been over inflated during the "boom" times of a few years previous and, as a result, what was known as the "financial crash of 1893" affected The Dalles but little. There were comparatively few business failures during the dark times when other localities were "hard hit" by the prevailing panic. January 22, 1898, the Times-Mountaineer said:

Of all the towns in the Inland Empire The Dalles has withstood the hard times better and came out with fewer business failures than any other city. * * * It is simply because The Dalles is more favorably located for doing business than any other city east of the mountain and because of the low freight rates it has enjoyed during the times when the prices prevailing in places located further interior, for the products of the country, would little more than pay the expense of getting them to market. Just before the hard times began steam-boat connection was established between here and Portland, made possible by the construction of the state portage at the Cascades, and while the producers surrounding other trade centers were paying out nearly the price of their products to get them to market, those here were getting lower rates and no matter how low the price, still had a little profit left for their labor; hence, as a rule were able to meet their obligations. The merchants also derived a benefit from these low freight rates, not alone in the matter of dollars saved on their freight accounts but by being able to offer prices that drew trade from all quarters.

At The Dalles the high water of May and June, 1894, is known as the "big flood." Early in April the Columbia river had commenced rising, and for six successive weeks was unusually high. The steady encroachment of the river was anxiously watched by hundreds daily and by many self-constituted sentinels at night.

On the morning of May 27th, about 11 o'clock, Frank Seufert arrived in the city after a furious drive, and sought to procure help to save from destruction his fish wheel which had been washed from its moorings. He secured the little steamer Inland Star, and steamed down the turbulent river, but was unsuccessful in saving the wreckage of his machinery. Later in the day a fish wheel owned by Winans Brothers was washed down stream by the angry current. This was the second one they had lost during the week, and their total lost was $10,000, not including the prospective catch of salmon which would have netted a considerable amount. Other wheels were in great danger and the fishermen passed the whole of one Sunday in securing their property. There were no arrivals of trains on time; the track between The Dalles and Hood River was in a dangerous condition and became, eventually, impassable.

Second street merchants who had goods stored in cellars moved them out, and later those on higher ground did the same. May 28th water had reached the stage of 49 feet; a report from Umatilla indicated a rise of one foot four inches that morning. Riparia reported a rise of one foot one inch. The high water mark of 1876 was eventually surpassed, and the flood stood at 53 feet 6 inches above low water mark. The water encroached on the floor of the Times Mountaineer building to the depth of three inches. Saturday, May 29th, it was impossible to work in the office, the water being 1½ feet deep: no paper was issued. There was hardly a business firm in the city who was not forced to move goods or erect elevated platforms. Front street was submerged its entire length from east to west. There was a small plot of dry ground on Second street near the block west of the Columbia brewery. Third street was washed by the river, with the exception of the block between Court and Washington streets, to the corner of Federal street, and on Fourth street the water covered considerable ground at the east and west ends. The night of June 3d the river rose about six inches and continued rising through the day of the 4th, when it stood 51 feet ten inches above low water mark.

At 3 o'clock p. m., June 6th, the river gained a stage of 59 feet 7 inches above low water mark. The night of June 10th the water receded sufficiently to permit some of the business men to clear their store rooms of accumulated mud and debris. June 12th The Dalles was once more in touch with the outside world. Mail from both east and west arrived. During the night of June 11th the river fell six inches, and on the following morning more houses were cleared of the accumulated sediment.

On the 13th the river fell seven inches and more land appeared above the surface. The debris left by this inundation was fearfully noisome and offensive, and disinfectants were used freely. Preparations were rapidly made by the Union Pacific Railroad Company for rebuilding such portions of their roadbed as had been washed away. This required a vast amount of work and heavy expenditure of money. One railway bridge half a mile in length, with the rails still adhering to the upper part of the timbers, while floating down the river, was salvaged above the locks, and saved. June 20, 1894, the Times-Mountaineer said:

Although some days have elapsed since the streets of the city have appeared above the surface of the water, incidents connected with the flood are still the principal topics of conversation. Last evening in company with some gentlemen this subject was again discussed, and also the high water of 1876. Mr. Ed Crate Sr., one of the Canadian voyageurs, who came to this state with the Hudson's Bay Company, says in 1842 he landed batteaux at the foot of the bluff near the Methodist church. This has been doubted until this year when, taking into consideration that there were no buildings here to furnish distinctive marks regarding particular localities, and that the contour of the bluff is much the same for a long distance, the feat was not only possible, but probable. The bluff was reached in places this season, and may have been in former years; but there is evidence that the highest water known for a long time was experienced in 1894. In the Columbia river are several islands which the Indians have used for the sepulture of their dead for ages past, and these have been washed over during this flood. If this had happened previously the bleached bones of chiefs and warriors could not have been found—as they have been ever since white men inhabited this region—to show the action of the elements for many decades. All former high water marks are obliterated, and the one for 1894 will stand out prominently in the future.

Some idea of the volume of business transacted at The Dalles in 1897, and the importance of the shipping may be gained from statements then furnished by the O. R. & N. Co., and the D. P. & A. N. Co., of the amount of traffic handled by each during a portion of 1897. The statement of the O. R. & N. Co. is for the months of January, February, August, September, October and November, and is as follows:

	MERCHANDISE		CARLOADS
	Received Pounds	Forward Pounds	Wheat	Cattle	Sheep	Hogs	Wool	Salmon
January....	1,075,825	2,276,675	37	14	—	2	—	1
February....	1,058,680	1,271,116	—	13	—	—	15	—
August.....	1,375,292	4,297,608	5	—	—	—	31	2
September...	3,233,320	6,597,660	86	11	95	—	53	29
October.....	2,591,505	9,239,482	118	42	59	6	5	5
November...	2,679,715	4,816,367	67	17	—	4	3	8

During the six months above quoted there were, also, shipped 24 carloads of horses and four carloads of prunes. The traffic handled during this period was about an average of that handled the entire year, and approximately there were 22,000,000 pounds of freight brought in and 60,000,000 pounds shipped out over this railroad each year. These imports, however, were not all consumed at The Dalles, as perhaps one-third of them was reshipped by wagons to interior points. The D. P. & A. N. Co. made the following statement of the aggregate amount of traffic handled for eleven months of 1897. The figures show the amount both shipped into and out of The Dalles, from January 1st to December 1st, 1897: Cattle and horses, 2,181; sheep, $10,000; flour, tons, 180; lumber, tons, 220; merchandise, tons, 4,197.

The extension of the Columbia Southern railroad south from Wasco, in 1898, was, financially, a severe blow to The Dalles. Prior to that event the city had derived trade from a vast scope of territory throughout Sherman and Crook counties, but which was not deflected to other points on the new railroad.

Company G, Oregon National Guard, of The Dalles, departed from that city Saturday morning, May 14, 1898. They went to Portland where they were mustered into the United States service. This company left The Dalles sixty men strong. Reaching Portland much dissatisfaction was manifested in the manner of forming the regiment. Company G was annihilated. The men were distributed among other companies, and no fitting recognition was accorded the officers. It was claimed, with most excellent proof of authenticity, that "peanut" politics played no unimportant part in the organization of the Second Oregon Volunteers. However, the members of the disorganized Company G went to the Philippines where they performed duties assigned them in a soldier-like manner.

Saturday evening, January 14, 1899, Company D, Oregon National Guards, at The Dalles, was mustered in by Colonel J. M. Patterson, numbering 41 members. Captain O. C. Hollister acted as examining surgeon. This company was composed of active, hearty young men, capable of making excellent soldiers. The officers elected took a deep interest in the welfare of the company and greatly increased its efficiency. These officers were G. E. Bartell, captain; R. A. Spivey, first lieutenant; David Johns, second lieutenant. This company was organized to replace the one whose members had crossed the ocean to the seat of war. It is still in existence.

The federal census of 1900 gave The Dalles a population of 3,542. For several years preceding March 15, 1901, the city had been, comparatively, at a standstill in a business sense; perhaps it had a trifle retrograded. But at the date above mentioned there was a decidedly more favorable outlook. One of the causes of this anticipated prosperity was the establishing of a wool-scouring plant. June 14th twenty men were to be seen sorting wool and dividing it into four different grades preparatory to placing it in vats for scouring. Steam was raised in the boilers, machinery started and every appliance was found to work smoothly. In the store rooms were several hundred thousand pounds of wool, sufficient to supply the plant for a long period. Mr. Russell announced that he would keep the mill steadily in operation during the season, employing about fifty hands. This enterprise brought much wool to The Dalles that else would have gone to other points. The Times-Mountaineer said, March 15, 1901: "Another feature of importance to The Dalles is the proposed new flouring mill that the Wasco Warehouse Company intends building this season, that will be to the wheat market what the scouring mill has been to the wool market."

Building steadily increased. Some forty new residences were constructed in 1901, and one of the largest flouring mills in Oregon was rapidly nearing completion. Aside from these several substantial business blocks were constructed. January 7, 1902, the Times-Mountaineer published the following:

The Wasco Warehouse & Milling Company's plant at White river, just completed, is the most modern and complete on the coast. It consists of a concrete dam across White river above the falls, with the necessary intakes and headgates, with a 54-inch pipe line to convey water down the canyon to the power house below the falls, which is of masonry, with a steel roof, and in which are two impulse-turbine water-wheels of 650-horse power each. These wheels are directly connected with two large generators of the revolving-field type, with a total capacity of about 1,500 horse power, furnishing 2,300 volts to the transformers by which the current is stepped up to 22,500 volts, for transmission here. This voltage is received in the sub-station in this city, where it is stepped down to a voltage suitable for lighting and other purposes. It is the company that today supplies illumination to The Dalles.

In 1903 the total assessed valuation of the city was $1,218,804. Almost from its earliest settlement The Dalles has been recognized as the commercial center of Eastern Oregon. Before the building of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's line it was the distributing point for the entire Inland Empire, freights for all of Eastern Oregon and Washington passing through or being forwarded from this point. Since the completion of the railroad in 1882 it has lost some of its former business, still it retains a vast amount in this line. The large warehouses and banking interests of The Dalles naturally draw a large trade to this point, because it can be taken better care of than at any interior place. And the extreme low freight rates prevailing, and not obtainable at any other point in Eastern Oregon, induces a vast volume of trade to center here that would go elsewhere. Having competing transportation lines The Dalles not only secures very low freight rates to and from Portland, but also gets terminal rates on all transcontinental traffic. Since the opening of the canal and locks at the Cascades, The Dalles has obtained the very lowest possible freight rates. Besides its shipping interests The Dalles is well represented in the mercantile line. So close is competition that this city has the reputation abroad of competing with Portland on the price of all classes of merchandise. This fact, naturally, draws trade from a large scope of country, and farmers from Klickitat county, Washington, and Sherman, Gilliam, Grant and Crook counties, Oregon, some of them 250 miles away, are attracted here to purchase their supplies. The Dalles, too, enjoys the reputation of being the best wool market on the coast, and also the best wheat market in Eastern Oregon. Wool centers here from half a dozen different counties, and in consequence wool buyers from Boston, New York, and San Francisco visit The Dalles each year during the months of July, August and September and make purchases direct from producers of from 7,000,000 to 8,000,000 pounds.

In view of the many sensational fire episodes through which The Dalles has passed, a brief history of its fire department may not be out of place here. May 3, 1859, an ordinance was passed organizing Hook and Ladder Company No. 1. January 6, 1860, this was disbanded. June 14th of the same year an engine house was ordered built, and it was completed and accepted October 28th. January 15, 1862, Dalles Diligent Hook and Ladder Company was formed. At its primary organization this company comprised as members: R. E. Miller, William De Moss, A. Loch, J. Elfelt, G. A. Liebe, William Logan, H. Wilmer, M. Reinig, W. Moabus, J. Kaufman, C. F. Mansfield, A. Shellworth, F. Bolter, F. C. Brown, F. Wyckman, T. B. Kelly, A. Langdon, J. Michelbach, A. Wintermier, J. Eppinger, O. S. Savage, L. Brown, C. B. Koegel, G. Erkskine, R. Lusher, P. Mask, A. Stangler, H. Wentz.

January 15, 1863, Diligent Hook and Ladder Company tendered its resignation to the city council, which was accepted and on petition of A.

Lauer and nineteen others, Jackson Engine Company No. 1, was organized. The members were: A. Lauer, J. Eppinger, J. Michelbach, A. W. Buchanan, R. Lusher, F. C. Brown, M. Reinig, T. Kenny, F. Wyckman, G. A. Stangler, J. Elfelt, William Moabus, C. B. Koegel, F. Bolter, O. S. Savage, H. Gardiner, P. Mark, H. W. Headrick, L. Brown, F. C. Brown.

Grant Hook and Ladder Company was organized June 19, 1865, and the truck, etc., of Diligent Hook and Ladder Company turned over to them. Relief Hose Company No. 1 was organized September 28, 1865, and disbanded in 1868. Columbia Hose Company was organized May 8, 1875. Wasco Engine Company No. 2 was organized September 18, 1879, and disbanded in April, 1882. In 1880 a new steam fire engine was purchased by the city and given to Jackson Engine Company. In 1882 a commodious engine house was completed and turned over to the fire department. At present The Dalles has one of the best volunteer fire departments and apparatus of any town in the state. The apparatus consists of a steam engine, chemical engine, hand engine, five hose companies and one hook and ladder company, all thoroughly equipped with the latest improved appliances for fighting fires.

In a previous chapter we have told of the establishment of the two missions at the point where subsequently was built The Dalles. In 1854 Rev. James Gerrish, a Methodist minister, preached at The Dalles. In 1856 Rev. H. K. Hines was appointed to the charge, and through his exertions a church was organized.

The Congregational society was organized in September, 1859, under the ministrations of Rev. W. A. Tenny. Their church edifice was erected in 1863. Rev. Thomas Condon was pastor. A Catholic church was built in 1860 by Father Vermeersh. In August, 1869, the Baptist society was formed, Rev. Ezra Fisher being pastor in charge. This building was dedicated to religious services in 1874.

In September, 1873, services were begun by the Protestant Episcopal denomination, by Rev. Dr. Nevius, who held occasional services until the completion of the church building. The corner stone was laid May 28, 1875, and the edifice was opened for services Christmas Day, 1875. August 1, 1879, Rev. W. L. MacEwan assumed charge, becoming thus the first permanent minister. All debts having been liquidated the church was formally consecrated Sunday, November 23, 1879. It is our purpose to present a brief, yet concise history of the organization and progress of each church in The Dalles.

The Methodist Episcopal Church is, probably, the largest and most influential religious organization in Wasco county. We shall not recapitulate the very earliest history of Methodist church work at The Dalles, or rather where the city now stands, as it has been treated in extenso in the current history chapter of Wasco county. We shall here consider its progress from the abandonment of the Methodist mission in 1847, or rather, from the first church work here after the town of Dalles City was founded. There was no stated religious work done by any church at The Dalles for nearly ten years after the abandonment of the mission. In 1856 the Methodist Episcopal Conference in Oregon sent to this place Rev. H. K. Hines, a young man of 27 years. He organized into a class the few Methodists then residing in the vicinity. Rev. Hines purchased a beautiful quarter block of land on the opposite side of the street on which the church now stands, and one block nearer the river, paying for it $175, and donated it to the church. This was afterwards exchanged for the lot on which the church now stands, and some cash. A little chapel, costing about $200, was built two years later by Rev. A. Kelly, who was then in charge of the church here.

In 1861 and 1862 Rev. J. F. De Vore was pastor, and under his administration a good church for the time was erected on the lot where the present edifice stands. This remained unchanged until 1879-80 when H. K. Hines was again pastor, when the church was thoroughly remodeled and a fine parsonage erected at a cost of about $3,500. In the great fire of September, 1891, when a large portion of The Dalles was destroyed, both church and parsonage were consumed. With great recuperative vigor the members and friends of the church built, on the same ground, a larger, handsomer, building. In 1893 it was completed. The membership of the first church over which Rev. Hines presided comprised: Dr. Shaug and wife; George Herbert and wife; William Connell and wife; George Banburger; Mrs. Eliza McFarland; Mrs. Hall; Mrs. White; Mrs. Martin; Mrs. Cantrell.

The position which this organization has held among the churches of this coast is evidenced by the list of pastors who have been called to serve it since its organization, now nearly fifty years. They are as follows: H. K. Hines, J. W. Miller, A. Kelly, John Flinn, J. F. De Vore, B. C. Lippincott, I. D. Driver, J. T. Wolf, G. Hines, N. Doane, S. Van Dersol, J. C. Kirkman, E. J. Hawn, L. J. Whitcomb, J. D. Flenner, W. C. Gray, W. G. Simpson, John Whistler and J. H. Wood.

In a report of a meeting of the Methodists of

The Dalles, published April 12, 1882, the Times said, in part:

* * * Short speeches were made by Grandma McFarland, J. B. Dickerson, A. M. Walker and William Mitchell. Grandma recollected well the first sermon ever preached in The Dalles. It was at her house in 1855 by Rev. G. M. Berry, to a small congregation, at which time a Methodist class was organized. * * * J. B. Dickerson named the pastors—eighteen in all—who had served the church here since its organization, and said few could realize the struggle he and his classmates had in those early days to pay the preacher and build the church. He remembered that the first parsonage property cost $750, and that the main part of the present building was commenced and completed by J. F. DeVore, of the Oregon Conference.

Writing to the Times April 19, 1882, a gentleman signing himself "History," says:

As history should be accurate, if written at all, will you permit one of the olden times to give you an item or two about the M. E. church at The Dalles. In 1853 Rev. James Gerrish supplied the Vancouver and The Dalles circuit from the annual conference, in the spring of that year until October, when G. Hines took charge of it. Both of these men visited The Dalles before December, 1853, in the work of their ministry, but I am not aware that any class was organized. G. M. Berry followed them and probably organized the first class. H. K. Hines was the first pastor who ever resided at The Dalles, he removing there in the fall of 1856, and organized the first Sunday-school, with Grandma McFarland, her daughter and Mrs. Hines as teachers. Mr. Hines bought the first property for the M. E. church, paying $175 out of his own pocket for it and donating it to the church. * * * Mrs. Hines taught a private school to enable them to live. * * * The first quarterly conference was organized by Mr. Hines. The church was removed and remodeled into its present form, and the parsonage—the best in the state—built under the second administration of Mr. Hines as pastor, in 1880—twenty-three years after his first pastorate.

The Methodist Episcopal church at The Dalles at the present time has a strong membership, and an influential constituency, taking in many of the most substantial and influential citizens of the place.

The foundation of St. Peter's Catholic Church was the mission established May 16, 1848, by Rev. L. Rosseau. The first church edifice was built at the rear of what is now the Catholic cemetery. February 26, 1855, this church and all that belonged to it was totally destroyed by fire. The church records, also, perished. But according to an estimate made by Rev. Mesplie about 500 persons had been baptized, 30 confirmed and nearly 20 couples married in the old mission chapel. In 1851 Rev. Mesplie was appointed parish priest; he continued in this capacity until 1863. The charge of St. Peter's church was then given successively to Rev. Fathers Vermeesh, Dielman, Thibau, Mackin, Demers, Gaudon, and in the year 1881 to Rev. A. Brongeeest. During this last administration a new brick sisters' convent and an addition to the priest's residence were built. Mrs. Lord says:

"About ten years after the founding of the Catholic mission (which was in 1848), and after Father Mesplie came, Bishop Blanchett came up and they decided to build a church in town. They were quite in favor of a site between Fourth and Fifth, Laughlin and Federal streets. I don't remember why they decided on their present location." The following historical record of the Congregational church was contributed to The Dalles Chronical by S. L. Brooks, September, 23, 1899:

The Dalles—formerly called Wasco-pum—forty years ago (1859) was an infantile town of scarce 400 inhabitants, when Rev. W. A. Tenny, the pioneer preacher of Congregationalism, stepped ashore from off the little steamer Hassalo, at the "Gate City" of the Inland Empire—to be. After a few days' survey of the place and its surroundings, he found that the religion of the day, for the majority, was everybody for himself. Being a frontier town the revolver and bowie knife were the seat of justice outside of the courts. The roughs were in the ascendancy so far as court justice was concerned. Need I say that His Satanic Majesty reigned in what today is our beautiful city, with its church spires pointing heavenward?

A brave man was Mr. Tenny to face such a condition of affairs. He saw, after his arrival, the awaiting opportunity for active work in this Godless field. The better class hailed this herald of the cross with favor. The Master had called him to "Go and preach the gospel." With this command he came to bring good tidings to the people. Tact, patience, perserevance and forbearance were requisites he possessed. Zealous work was commenced at once in the mission on which he was called. Days, weeks, months passed. Evidences of his labor were unseen. He thought—

"We do not know it, but there lies
Somewhere, veiled under evening skies,
A garden all must sometime see—
Somewhere lies our Gethsemene."

Mr. Tenny had secured from the county court the privilege of using the court room for church purposes until such time as circumstances would allow a better place. Underneath the audience room was the jail, which was filled most of the time with criminals of various classes. I am told that during religious worship, vaporings of profanity and villainous songs mingled with the sacred exhortations from the minister's desk, and during the season of prayer the mocking "amens" would be heard from the inmates below.

With all these discouraging features Mr. Tenny pressed on in the work. As time passed on he concluded that steps must be taken toward the formation of a church society. After consulting with Messrs. E. S. Joslyn and E. S. Penfield in regard to the matter, it was decided to move in that direction at once. This encouraging conference resulted in Mr. Tenny making a call for a meeting of all those interested at the next Sabbath's morning service. At the stated time the acting pastor prefaced his invitation with a prayer, and asked that all those connected with the church assemble at his home on the evening of the 17th of September (present month) and formulate and complete an organization of the First Congregational Church of The Dalles. The following members appeared and signed the compact: Erastus S. Joslyn, E. S. Penfield, William B. Stillwell, Rev. W. A. Tenny, and Mrs. Tenny. This perfected the organization. Mr. Zelek, Mrs. Camilla Donnell and Mrs. Mary Joslyn not being in town at this time, were received into fellowship at a meeting a very short time afterward as charter members of this, the First Congregational Church of The Dalles.

* * * The church shed a fresh influence upon the people after its organization, and an interest showed itself in the small community, from which some eight or ten were added to the record prior to the close of the pastorate of Mr. Tenny. From the first, church financial support was an unknown quantity. Popularity did not prove a barrier against the needed want for proper support. In other words, to keep the wolf from the door. Providentially a call from the Forest Grove church came to him, and after due and prayerful consideration, he accepted the call and bade the little church farewell, late in the summer of 1861.

The little flock was left without a leader until the early spring of 1862, when Rev. Thomas Condon, of Albany, having heard of the vacancy, came and took up the work left by its founder. Mr. Condon, after a short sojourn in the embryo city, found it absolutely necessary that a house of worship other than the old court room over the jail should be provided. On the 12th day of July, 1862, Rev. Condon called a meeting of the church people to meet him at his residence to discuss the subject of erecting a church edifice at an early day. Mr. H. P. Isaacs, a prominent citizen of the town, was very enthusiastic, as were, also, Messrs. Andrew Clark, and J. M. McKee, in the matter. Although the population was then hardly 700 souls, they conceded that $1,000 could be raised from the people for that purpose. They felt that the people would be generous and do the right thing. They were not disappointed. After some discussion and deliberation, Messrs. H. P. Isaacs, Andrew Clark and J. M. McKee were appointed a building committee with authority to purchase grounds and begin work as soon as practicable. They found it difficult to secure material to prosecute the work with rapidity. However, a building 30 by 50 feet was begun and enclosed so that in the early part of January, 1863, with a rough floor thrown down, improvised benches, and an old box stove to warm the building, the church people were gathered under their own roof. The summer and winter of 1863 and 1864 saw the building finished inside and out; the seating was done by Messrs. Hogue and Abrams. The seats were made of cedar, covered with shellac varnish; the pulpit was an elaborate piece of workmanship and was presented to the church by Colonel J. S. Rickel, a prominent personage of transportation fame. The colonel was not strictly a religious man, yet was a warm friend of the church and pastor, Mr. Condon. In 1867 an addition was put on the front of the building; on the northeast corner was a tower in which a large 800-pound bell was placed. This addition was built by volunteer work. I well remember Mr. Zelek Donnell saying that his stock were fattening on the bunch grass and he could put in time for the Lord while his flock increased. * * *

In the spring of 1867 Messrs. Robert Pentland, Zelek Donnell and Erastus S. Joslyn filed articles of incorporation incorporating the First Congregational Church of The Dalles. The capital was fixed at $2,000. After incorporation the following trustees were elected: Messrs. E. S. Joslyn, W. P. Abrams, H. J. Waldron, Z. F. Moody and Zelek Donnell. Prior to the incorporation Messrs. E. S. Joslyn, E. S. Penfield, Z. Donnell, W. B. Stillwell and Rev. Thomas Condon were elected and served as trustees up to the time of incorporation. Each year following the first general election, the vacancies have been filled by the following persons:

E. B. Comfort, Zelek Donnell, H. J. Waldron, Robert Pentland, Orlando Humason, John P. Booth, James B. Condon, Mrs. Camilla Donnell, Joshua W. French, Samuel Brooks, William R. Abrams, Eben B. McFarland, Fred A. McDonald and R. A. Roscoe. The church clerks have been as follows: E. S. Penfield, Rev. Thomas Condon (acting), Rev. W. R. Butcher (ex-officio), S. L. Brooks, Mrs. E. E. Pentland, W. R. Abrams, Mrs. N. J. Simons, O. Sylvester, Mrs. E. J. Robinson, W. J. Strong, R. A. Roscoe, A. R. Thompson, B. S. Huntington and A. R. Thompson. * * *

Mr. Condon was a very popular man and minister; his labor was a witness of it. At the close of his ministry in the summer of 1873 the church roll numbered 97 members, or communicants. On his retirement Rev. W. R. Butcher, of Albany, accepted a call to fill the vacant pulpit and began his ministry in the early autumn of the same year. During his ministry the church forged ahead as usual in additions to the roll. The fore part of June, 1876, he tendered his resignation.

This church was without a pastor from the period of Mr. Butcher's departure until the summer of 1877, when Rev. J. W. Harris, of Evansville, Wisconsin, was called to fill the vacancy. In the early fall of 1878 Rev. D. B. Gray came and commenced work in the church. He remained until July, 1887. November 7, 1887, Rev. R. V. Hoyt accepted a call from this church and remained one year. In 1888 Rev. W. C. Curtis accepted the pastorate. On September 2, 1888, fire destroyed the old church building. Then the society, being left roofless, fell back on first principals and worshipped in the court room—not the old one, but the new. In this room the church conducted services until January 27, 1889, at which time the new and beautiful church edifice, erected upon property purchased of Judge O. S. Savage, was dedicated. The total cost of this building, grounds, furnishings, etc., was about $13,000.

September 3, 1872, the First Baptist Church of The Dalles was organized. Articles of incorporation were filed with the county clerk January 8, 1873. Until 1881 the church was served by various pastors. In December of that year Rev. O. D. Taylor came from Orange, New Jersey, where he had been associated with Edward Judson, D. D., and assumed the pastorate of the church. In 1883 their property on the corner of Third and Washington streets was sold, and a new church and parsonage were erected at the corner of Washington and Fifth streets. In 1889 it was considered one of the best church properties on the coast. In May, 1887, Rev. J. C. Baker was called to the pastorate, which he held for one year, when he resigned and Rev. O. D. Taylor again entered into active charge of the church. Like all others on the coast the First Baptist Church of The Dalles has encountered prosperity and adversity, but it is now on a firm foundation and its future most encouraging.

April 20, 1889, articles of incorporation were filed with the clerk of Wasco county by the Second Baptist Church of The Dalles. The incorporators were John Harper, M. J. and L. L. Hill. The capital stock was placed at $2,000.

Calvary Baptist Church was dedicated at The Dalles January 27, 1901. The cost of the edifice was $2,508.07, and when dedicated it was nearly free from debt. The building is a credit to the city and the funds for this handsome edifice were secured from a congregation of only about forty people.

A concise and excellent history of St. Paul's Episcopal Church was published in the Times-Mountaineer of January 1, 1898, and we are highly favored in being able to reproduce it:

Very little is known of the early history of this church in The Dalles. Some of the oldest residents remember visits from the Right Rev. Thomas F. Scott, D. D., Rev. H. M. Fackler, D. D., Dr. McCarthy, Dr. Stoye, Dr. Nevius and others. A child of the Hon. J. K. Kelly was baptized by Dr. Fackler, D. D., in 1866, and in 1871 Rev. R. D. Nevius held two services in the Congregational church, through the courtesy of Rev. T. Condon, the pastor. From 1871 to 1873 four services were held by Rev. R. D. Nevius, one by Bishop Morris, and one or two others by Rev. L. H. Wells.

At this time there were found ten communicants of the church, and Dr. Nevius baptized four adult persons in the Congregational church. With this as a nucleus a congregation was established and an effort made to build a church. In 1874 Rt. Rev. Bishop Morris gave $500 towards it on condition that a like sum should be raised in The Dalles. This work was undertaken by Mrs. G. H. Knaggs, and successfully accomplished by her, the sum of $655 having been raised. In addition to this $105 was realized from a strawberry festival. A chancel window was then given by General Joseph Eaton, in memorial of his son, and an east window was, also, given by the Hon. L. L. McArthur. May 28, 1875, Bishop Morris laid the corner stone of the present church, and deposited in it a copy of the Holy Bible, a book of Common Prayer, a copy of the Oregon Churchman of May 25th, and a copy of The Dalles Mountaineer, and copies of the Portland dailies, the Oregonian, Bulletin and Evening Journal.

January 11th the church received its furniture, leaving an indebtedness of about $800. On the day the church was consecrated a draft on New York was received for $100 from St. Luke's Chapel, Middletown, Connecticut, and a like amount was received from the Rev. John Bonney, from the east, a friend of Mr. William Beall. Bishop Morris also gave $100, and the balance of the indebtedness was provided for by the congregation. In 1877 a paten and chalice of solid silver was received from St. Mark's church, Augusta, Maine. From January 11, 1876, to July 7, 1879, sixty-three services were held by the Rev. Dr. Nevius, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. McEwen, who took charge of the church, having been sent by Bishop Morris. In September, 1880, through a subscription circulated by Miss Anna Thornbury and Mrs. Stansbury, an addition of the vestry room was made to the church, and about November, 1885, the present rectory was built.

The bell was purchased in 1883, and was on the Queen of the Pacific when she struck on the Columbia bar, and the framework of which was thrown overboard. The present mountings were made by Mr. John Clayton. About April, 1886, Miss Mary Wall, a communicant of the church, died and left a bequest of $500. The Rev. W. L. McEwen officiated as rector from 1879 to 1886, when he was succeeded by the Rev. John C. Fair, about April 1, 1887. From 1879 to 1886 there were four confirmation classes under Rev. Mr. McEwen, numbering seventeen persons in all, and from 1886 to 1887, under the Rev. John C. Fair, there were two confirmation classes, numbering eight persons. In the spring of 1889 Rev. Eli D. Sutcliffe took charge of the work and remained five years. Rev. Joshua N. T. Goss was rector for the year ending Easter 1897.

The Dalles Presbyterian Church was organized July 8, 1888, in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. This was at the termination of several weeks' diligent work by Rev. George A. Hutchison, of San Francisco. Membership of this initial organization comprised sixteen persons. Mr. J. M. Patterson and Mr. G. W. Filloon were elected ruling elders; Mr. G. W. Swank and Mr. W. J. Strong, deacons. Immediately afterward a Sunday school was organized with the pastor, Rev. George A. Hutchison, as superintendent; Mr. J. M. Patterson, assistant. Of both the church and Sunday school W. J. Strong was elected treasurer. Miss Sadie Whitman was named as secretary of the Sunday school. January 5, 1889, the Times-Mountaineer said:

"The Presbyterian society was one of the first to occupy the great northwestern country and has already become strong in all our larger towns and in all our cities. On account of an agreement for many years with the Congregational body she did not occupy this field. About two years ago the synod of Columbia, which covers Oregon and Washington Territory, felt free to enter upon work here and so determined; as a result the present minister was sent."

The Lutheran Church was dedicated Sunday, April 17, 1898. The building complete cost about $5,000. Prior to this the Lutherans had no church edifice and held services only when they could procure the use of a room. The pastor, L. Grey, should be credited with the work of raising the money to bring about the erection of the building. Rev. James F. Beates, of Seattle, delivered the dedicatory sermon. Rev. M. L. Zwizig, of Portland, conducted the dedicatory services, assisted by Revs. A. C. Anda, of Tacoma; W. Edlund, of Astoria, and L. Grey, of The Dalles.

Fraternal societies are well represented at The Dalles. There are many of them and by far the greater number are in a prosperous condition socially and financially.

The first order instituted in the city was the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. It came into being as a distinct organization November 1, 1856. H. W. Davis, deputy grand master, organized Columbia Lodge No. 5, the warrant for organization being issued by E. M. Barnum, grand master, and it was attested by Chester N. Terry, grand secretary. Petitioners for the charter were C. N. Shaug, E. G. Towne, J. M. Blossom, F. Harbaugh, L. Colwell and M. R. Hathaway. During the great fire of 1891 the records of this lodge were destroyed, depriving us of the privilege of giving a complete history of this pioneer fraternal organization of The Dalles. From other sources, however, it is known that during the first term the membership increased to the number of twenty-five. Officers of this lodge, so far as known, were C. W. Shaug, noble grand; E. C. Cowne, vice grand; Charles R. Meigs, secretary.

The second order to come into the local perspective of The Dalles was the A. F. & A. M.; name and number Wasco Lodge No. 15. This lodge was instituted March 28, 1857, a dispensation having been granted by A. M. Belt, grand master of the grand lodge of Oregon. A charter was issued June 8th, following; the dispensation having been granted to R. R. Thompson, M. J. Kelly, John P. Booth, Nathan Olney, A. G. Tripp, H. J. Pope and J. Whitney, of whom R. R. Thompson was named as W. M.; M. J. Kelly, S. W. and J. P. Booth, J. W. Two other charter members were present, H. P. Isaacs and J. R. Bates and the visiting brothers were Myers, Perrin and Geer.

At this meeting steps were taken to perfect the organization of a lodge by the appointment of a full list of officers and committees to draft by-laws, provide a place of meeting and purchase jewels and needed paraphernalia. The first home of the lodge was in the second story of a stone building occupied as a merchandise store by H. P. Isaacs, situated near the present site of the Columbia hotel. Some years after the lodge moved into Gates' hall in the second story of a building located at the corner of Second and Court streets. Both of these two homes were jointly occupied by the Masonic and Odd Fellow societies. Finally the Masons fitted up a hall in the upper story of the stone building on First street, occupied by H. J. Waldron as a drug store. In 1880 the lodge room was on the corner of Third and Court streets.

Aside from what might be termed the "old line" fraternal societies, there are a number of women's societies, or "clubs," in The Dalles. From the excellent Women's Edition of the Times-Mountaineer, issued May 17, 1898, we are permitted to give brief outlines of these organizations devoted to culture and social improvement:

In September, 1893, a few ladies assembled for the purpose of forming a literary society. As "Taine's History of English Literature" was decided upon for the text book for the year, the assembly assumed the name of "The Taine Class." For the two ensuing years the study of English literature was pursued, and in the third year Guizot's "History of Civilization in Europe" was adopted as the text book. After that followed Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe."

Women's work in St. Paul's church began with an offer from General Eaton, of Portland, of $500 on condition that a like amount be contributed by the people of The Dalles. The efforts of Mrs. Knaggs in realizing $655 has been mentioned in our history of the churches, and this was the nucleus of the present St. Paul's Guild. Organization was effected in 1876. The life of the church at times has languished, but was revived by the able assistance of this faithful band of workers.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the Congregational Church was organized in 1863. Mrs. E. M. Wilson was president; Mrs. C. Z. Donnell, secretary.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the First Christian Church of The Dalles was organized October 1, 1892, under the name of the Christian Church Ladies. It began with eight members and has steadily increased in numerical strength.

The Lutheran Ladies' Society was organized under the constitution and charter of Zion Evangelical Lutheran Church, May 20, 1896. On this day a number of ladies met at the residence of Mrs. Stubling in response to a call from Rev. L. Grey, who presided at the meeting.

The Women's Mission Circle was organized September 16, 1896, its aim being to raise funds for home, foreign and convention missions.

The Willing Workers Society of the Calvary Baptist Church was organized October 19, 1894, with ten charter members and the following officers: Mrs. E. K. Russell, president; Mrs. W. C. Allaway, 1st vice-president; Mrs. S. P. M. Briggs, 2d vice president; Mrs. H. H. Campbell, secretary; Mrs. M. Hill, treasurer.

The Good Intent is the title by which the ladies' aid society of the Methodist church is called. The organization was effected in 1879, the first president being Mrs. Eliza McFarland; vice president, Mrs. Sarah Michell. These two efficient officers served continuously for a number of years, being succeeded by Mrs. J. D. Lee, as president, in 1886.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of The Dalles was organized in October, 1881, by the first state president, Mrs. E. J. Hines, in the Third street Congregational church, with Mrs. Smith French, president, and Mrs. Louisa A. Stowell, secretary. The earlier years of their work were principally juvenile. A Band of Hope was organized in 1882. At one time it numbered 150 members. A free reading room was established in 1882, and was maintained continuously for thirteen years, when it was discontinued. Mrs. Henry Villard made the reading room a present of $100.

The Woman's Relief Corps is the auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic and was instituted April 17, 1889, its name and number being J. W. Nesmith Corps, No. 17.

Azalea Rebekah Lodge No. 99, auxiliary to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, was instituted April 9, 1898, with 39 charter members. The instituting officer was Mrs. Ida Foster, president of the Rebekah Assembly of Oregon, assisted by Mrs. Grace Swank-Laurie and Mrs. A. B. Manley, all of Portland. The following officers were elected and installed: N. G., Mrs. Lulu D. Crandall; V. G., Rebecca Wilson; secretary, Alice Lyle; treasurer, Elvira Neilsen; W., Anna Rawson; C., Almira Burget; I. G., Mary Ward; O. G., Anna Blakeney; R. S. to N. G., O. D. Doane; L. S. to N. G., Emma Doane; R. S. to V. G., Belle Cooper Rinehart; L. S. to V. G., Georgia Sampson; chaplain, Mrs. Mary Learned. Several visitors from Star-Rebekah, of Dufur, were present and assisted very materially in the instituting and installing ceremonies.

The German Ladies' Aid Society was organized in 1893. It has accomplished much good and it may be safely predicted that its sphere of usefulness will be greatly extended.

The ladies of The King's Daughters have accomplished much good, their object being to make clothing for the poor, mostly children, and their charitable deeds will not be forgotten by those whom these kind ladies have aided.

St. Vincent's Charitable Society of the Catholic church was established in 1885. Its aim is to help the deserving poor of the city and surrounding country.

One of the private institutions of The Dalles which is deserving of especial mention is The Dalles Hospital, which was opened to the public in May, 1901. This hospital building is beautifully situated on the bluff overlooking the business portion of the town. It is a two-story building. There are thirty beds, three physicians and from eight to ten nurses are employed. It is a private institution for the treatment of all surgical and medical cases, and is provided with an X-Ray bacteriological laboratory. In fact, it has one of the best, modern equipped surgery's in Oregon. In connection with the hospital is conducted a nurses' training school. From its inception this institution has been a pronounced success. Previous to its establishment there was no hospital of the kind nearer than Portland, and plans are now being made for its enlargement in the near future. A picture of the building will be found in this work.

In concluding this chapter concerning especially The Dalles we deem it appropriate to append a list of the city officers since the initial movement in planting a city. The member of the council whose name appears first was selected president of the board. This, however, refers only to that part of the roster prior to 1863, at which time the charter was amended and a mayor took the place of president.

CHAPTER VII

HOOD RIVER AND DUFUR.

Hood River, the second city of Wasco county in size, prominence and importance, is most eligibly located on the south bank of the Columbia river twenty-two miles from The Dalles and sixty-six miles from Portland, on the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. At present it has a population of 2,000 and this is steadily increasing. Very much alive are the citizens of Hood River; a class of cultured, refined and eminently business-like people. The year round the climate in this vicinity is ideal; the rigors of winter and the extremes of summers are unknown.

Few towns in the northwest equal Hood River—and none surpasses it—in the way of scenic attractions; rapidly is it forging to the front as the most popular summer resort of the Middle Columbia river; it offers the happy combination of rest and quiet—"the sweetness and light"—and pure, exhilarating mountain air. Here, in the foreground, winds the majestic Columbia; across this historic stream, in the state of Washington, towering high over its neighboring peaks, is Mount Adams, crowned centuries since with a "diadem of snow," 12,224 feet above the level of the sea; in the opposite direction—to the south 27 miles—Mount Hood rears its lofty head 11,225 feet, its torso clothed in a raiment of cloudlets; its peak like a crystal zone set into a background of ethereal azure, the eternal symbol of the heavens of every creed on earth. On the east and west are the forest-clad foothills of the Cascades.

Hood River is, par excellence, the hustling town of Eastern Oregon. It is provided with an excellent gravity system of water works; good electric plant, a number of substantial and ornate brick business blocks, with more in process of construction, and many beautiful residence houses, surrounded by handsome shade trees and well groomed lawns. A contract has recently been let for a complete system of perfect sewerage for the principal portion of the city. There are two elegant and commodious hotels—the Mount Hood, recently enlarged and refurnished, and the Waucoma, a new, three-story brick edifice, and a number of superior restaurants. All lines of business are well represented. Among the more prominent manufacturing interests are a large grist mill; the sawmill of the Oregon Lumber Company with a capacity of 1000,000 feet per day, and an extensive cannery. The altitude of Hood River is 243 feet. One year ago (May 4, 1904,) The Hood River Glacier said of this city:

The city of Hood River is a picturesque little town of 1,400 inhabitants. It lies nestled along the south bank of the matchless Columbia river on the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, 66 miles east of Portland, at a point on the west bank of Hood river, where that turbulent stream empties its waters into the Columbia. The river itself is a marvel of wonder and beauty from its source to where it mingles its crystal waters with those of the Columbia, and together they flow peacefully on to the sea.

The city is regularly laid out; has wide streets that are lined with oak trees—a species of that tree peculiar to the Pacific coast—with their wide, spreading branches under whose ample and inviting foliage restful moments may be enjoyed on a summer day. On the south is a rise of 200 feet. Fringed along the gently sloping sides of this hill and facing the city and Columbia, are groves of small oaks and pines, and hidden away among these are some of Hood River's beautiful homes.

The town has been called by the editor of The Dalles Times-Mountaineer "a spot of Arcadian beauty," and none will gainsay it who has ever lingered here for ever so brief a period. The stream upon which the city stands, and from which it took its name, was called "Labieshe's river" by members of the Lewis and Clark expedition in 1805. Prior to 1854 it was known as Dog river, as will be noticed in the current history chapters of Wasco county. In the year mentioned Nathaniel Coe, with his wife and four sons, settled on this place which had been abandoned by W. C. Laughlin. To the Coes the name Dog, was repugnant, and they rechristened it Hood River.

Anterior to all this, however, is another patronymic bestowed upon the stream by the Indians. This was Waucoma, and means cottonwood timber. It was so called by the natives by reason of the large groves of cottonwood trees on the flat below the present site of the town. On the authority of The Glacier the earliest settlement of the place was made by W. C. Laughlin in 1852. As has been related the following winter was a most severe one, and both Mr. Laughlin and a companion, Dr. Farnsworth, lost all their cattle, subsequently removing to The Dalles. The eldest son of Nathaniel Coe, L. W., became one of the organizers and principals of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. The three other sons were Charles, who died in 1872; E. F. and Captain H. C. Coe. With the Coe family came William Jenkins, who was drowned at the mouth of Hood River in the Columbia, together with his son and James Laughlin, in 1865. With Jenkins came, also, James Benson and wife and A. C. Phelps. They settled at this point.

During these pioneer days when the Columbia river was, practically, the only route between Portland and Walla Walla, Hood River was the ever welcome halting place. The Coe donation land claim on which the town is built is one of the oldest east of the Cascade mountains. For many years the influx of settlers was slow. In 1861 there were only eight permanent locators and a meagre floating population of transients. In 1875 Dr. Parkhurst journeyed to Pennsylvania where he induced thirty families to come to this section of the northwest. This colony arrived in November; some were dissatisfied, but a majority of them remained and permanently located. So near as can be ascertained the following is a list of the earliest settlers in the Hood River country:

Nathaniel Coe and family in 1854; they built the first permanent residence at Hood River in 1858. William Jenkins, brother-in-law of Mr. Coe, and N. S. Benson, came in June, 1854. W. C. Laughlin and wife, and Dr. Farnsworth came in 1852; James Benson came in November, 1854; Arthur Gordon and his cousin Henry came in 1858; Mr. Stadden, 1858; S. B. Ives and family and A. C. Phelps moved in from the Cascades in the summer of 1858. Others who came in 1858 were Cowperthwaite, Amos Underwood, John M. Marden and Mr. Wilson. Mr. and Mrs. Butler and Mr. and Mrs. Whiting came in March, 1859; Peter Neal in 1860 and in 1861 his son-in-law, Jerome Winchell arrived. William Moss also came in 1860. George P. Roberts came in 1857 or 1858, and Hardin Corum in 1861. D. A. Turner, William Odell, Laban Stilwell and Joseph Wilkins arrived in 1861 and located on farms. Daves Divers arrived in 1862 and Dr.

B. W. Mitchell and M. C. Nye came about 1863. In the fall of 1864 S. M. Baldwin and Harry Tieman settled here. The Parkhurst colony of Pennsylvanians arrived in November, 1875, and did much to assist in the development of the valley.

Available records are silent concerning the first postmaster of Hood River, but the date was probably in 1859. In his "Hood River Fifty Years Ago" Mr. H. C. Coe says that Mrs. Martha Benson was postmistress at that period, and that the office was at the place of N. S. Benson. Previous to that time mail had come by way of the pursers of the steamboats, was frequently delayed and sometimes lost. Following is a list of post-office officials at Hood River since 1859:

Mrs. Martha Benson, Charles Coe, H. C. Coe, W. P. Watson, Mrs. Delia Stranahan, R. J. Rodgers, George T. Prather, Mrs. Jennie Champlin, L. E. Morse and William M. Yates, present postmaster.

Practically the first venture in the mercantile line was made by Mr. Allen in 1877. Having conducted it a short time he failed and the stock was purchased by the veteran Hood River merchant, Mr. E. L. Smith. Later he removed his stock to Frankton. Dr. W. L. Adams erected a drug store and in addition to his pharmaceutical stock he carried a small line of dry goods. This building was erected in 1880, a short distance west of what was afterward the original townsite of Hood River; but this location is now within the enlarged city limits. The first building erected within the original limits was by John Parker in July, 1881; it was utilized by him as a general merchandise store. The second edifice was the Mount Hood hotel, built by T. J. Hosford in August, 1881. The third was by G. M. Champlin in September of the same year, and he carried within a general stock of merchandise. During the fall of this year and the spring of 1882, a number of dwellings were erected. E. L. Smith removed to Hood River in the spring of 1882, where he purchased a block of H. C. Coe for $250. On this he erected a two-story building and occupied it with a stock of general merchandise. This piece of ground is now valued at $15,000. Previous to this a grist mill had been built. In 1881, near the sanitarium of W. L. Adams a store building was erected by parties to whom Mr. Adams leased the ground on which it stood.

The townsite of Hood River was platted in 1881 by H. C. and E. F. Coe. It was a portion of the original Nathaniel Coe donation claim and consisted of four blocks. To any one who would erect buildings on them lots were given; those not desiring to build immediately could purchase lots for $50 and $75 apiece, and a prohibitory whiskey clause was inserted in every deed. After the division of the townsite by Messrs. Coe, Mr. E. F. Coe disposed of his half and abandoned the whiskey clause previously inserted in conveyance. May 25, 1881, the Dalles Times said: "We learn from parties who arrived in this city yesterday that a new town has been laid out on Hood river. The lines are just inside of Mr. H. C. Coe's farm, one of the most delightful spots in that section. The blocks, lots and streets will be surveyed this week, and the plat placed in the clerk's office for record. Mr. Hallet has located the switch, thus giving the residents an idea of where the principal business will be done in that locality."

Following the platting of the townsite settlers flocked in in greater numbers. Still the healthy, rapid growth of the town did not commence until 1899. In 1900 Hood River had a population of 622, and at the opening of 1904 it contained 1,402 inhabitants. A newspaper census taken by the Hood River Glacier in January, 1905, showed over 1,800 people within the city's limits, thus revealing a gain of 400 since the year previous. More rapid than this, even, was the business growth. A decade since Hood River was unknown, geographically, otherwise than a brisk little stream losing its identity in the Columbia at this point. Today its horticultural reputation is world wide; its apples find a market as far as Europe. In London in the early part of February, 1905, Hood River apples sold for $5.40 a box.

But we have dropped out of our chronological line of march. May 28, 1881, a Hood River correspondent of The Dalles Times said: "Mr. E. L. Smith, our obliging merchant, contemplates building a new store in the new town situated at Captain H. C. Coe's place, which is a most beautiful location. All honor and thanks to Dr. Littlefield, the surgeon of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, for defeating the only prospective saloon of our place."

Railroad rumors were in the air—rumors based on a solid sub-stratum of fact. The Dalles Times correspondent from Hood River October 16, 1881, said:

We have heard with much pleasure the rumble and turmoil which is the precursor of railroad communication with the rest of the world. We are to be favored with a depot, and a little town has commenced to grow under very favorable conditions. The proprietors, the Captains Coe, as we are informed, refuse to give a deed to any one who will not agree to the clause, "no liquor sold thereon." * * * There are now four stores in the settlement, all seeming to flourish, as you will believe when I tell you that one of these four sold in one day the amount of $300 worth of goods in the first part of this month. We have three flourishing schools, averaging about fifty pupils, recipients of public money. Two preachers have settled among us and are not idle in dispensing the truths of the gospel.

In 1885 it was admitted by the Times-Mountaineer that Hood River was surrounded by one of the best, perhaps the best, "fruit growing sections of the northwest." At that early day many of the solid business and professional men of Portland hied themselves to Hood River during the heated term to enjoy their otium cum dignitate under the luxuriance of its shady groves and beside its pellucid mountain streams. May 11, 1889, it was modestly claimed by the Times-Mountaineer that "Hood River is rapidly improving. Several immigrants have settled there during the spring and the resources of the town are being fully developed." Following is the text of articles of incorporation filed February 21, 1890, in the office of the secretary of state, Salem, Oregon:

"Hood River Townsite Company; duration perpetual; principal place of business, Hood River, Wasco county; capital stock, $10,000; divided into 100 shares of $100 each; incorporators, E. L. Smith, M. Y. Harrison, J. A. Wilson and L. E. Crowe; object, to purchase unsold portions of the townsite of Hood River and adjacent tract or tracts of land in Wasco county."

February 5, 1891, Company G, of the Oregon National Guard, was mustered into service at Hood River, including forty-eight members. The commissioned officers elected were: A. I. Bowers, captain; A. D. Stranahan, first lieutenant; A. Winans, second lieutenant.

During this year the progress of building improvement was satisfactory. Considerable real estate changed hands; cozy cottages dotted the hillsides in all directions; manufactories were breaking into the business scheme, and many of the rich, natural resources of the vicinity were being developed.

The first city election following the incorporation of the townsite company was held December 4, 1894, with this result: Mayor, C. M. Wolfard; recorder, C. P. Heald; marshal, E. S. Olinger; treasurer, M. H. Nicholson; councilmen, S. E. Bartmess, F. H. Button, J. E. Rand, J. F. Watt, O. B. Hartley and S. E. Morse. The vote for incorporation stood 49 for, and 35 against. A full list of the city's officials from the date of incorporation until the present will be found later in this chapter. The incorporation of the town in 1894 was, however, superseded in 1901 by a new corporation under a charter granted by the state in February. In December, 1895, the foundation of a public library was laid, and about 1,000 volumes accumulated. These were donated to the public schools in September, 1904.

In 1903 the total assessed valuation of Hood River was $208,927. A fair idea of the growth of this town may be gleaned from a statement published in the Glacier of August 20, 1903, which claimed that since June 1, of that year, there had been built, and were then in course of erection, twenty-five residences within the corporate limits, the aggregate cost of which would be, when completed, $40,000. In addition to this residence property business buildings had been erected the same year at a cost of $20,000.

Tuesday evening, June 19, 1904, the Hood River Commercial, or Hassalo Club, was reorganized at the Hassalo club rooms. Thirty-five representative business men of the city were in attendance. These were elected as officers: Truman Butler, president; A. W. Outhank, vice president; A. S. Moe, secretary. The organization of the Hood River Fire Department is thus reported, November 24, 1904, in the Glacier:

The Hood River Volunteer Fire Department is now ready to combat whatever fire should dare show itself within the city limits. While the boys have only the chemical engine as apparatus at present, the department expects to organize a hose company as soon as the fire hydrants are placed in, and a hook and ladder department will also be formed. The organization of the fire department has been officially recognized by the city council, and the care of the chemical engine has been turned over to the boys. An engine house is being erected next to the city hall, where the chemical will be stored. Room will also have to be made here for hose carts and a hook and ladder truck. The officers of the fire department elected last week are:

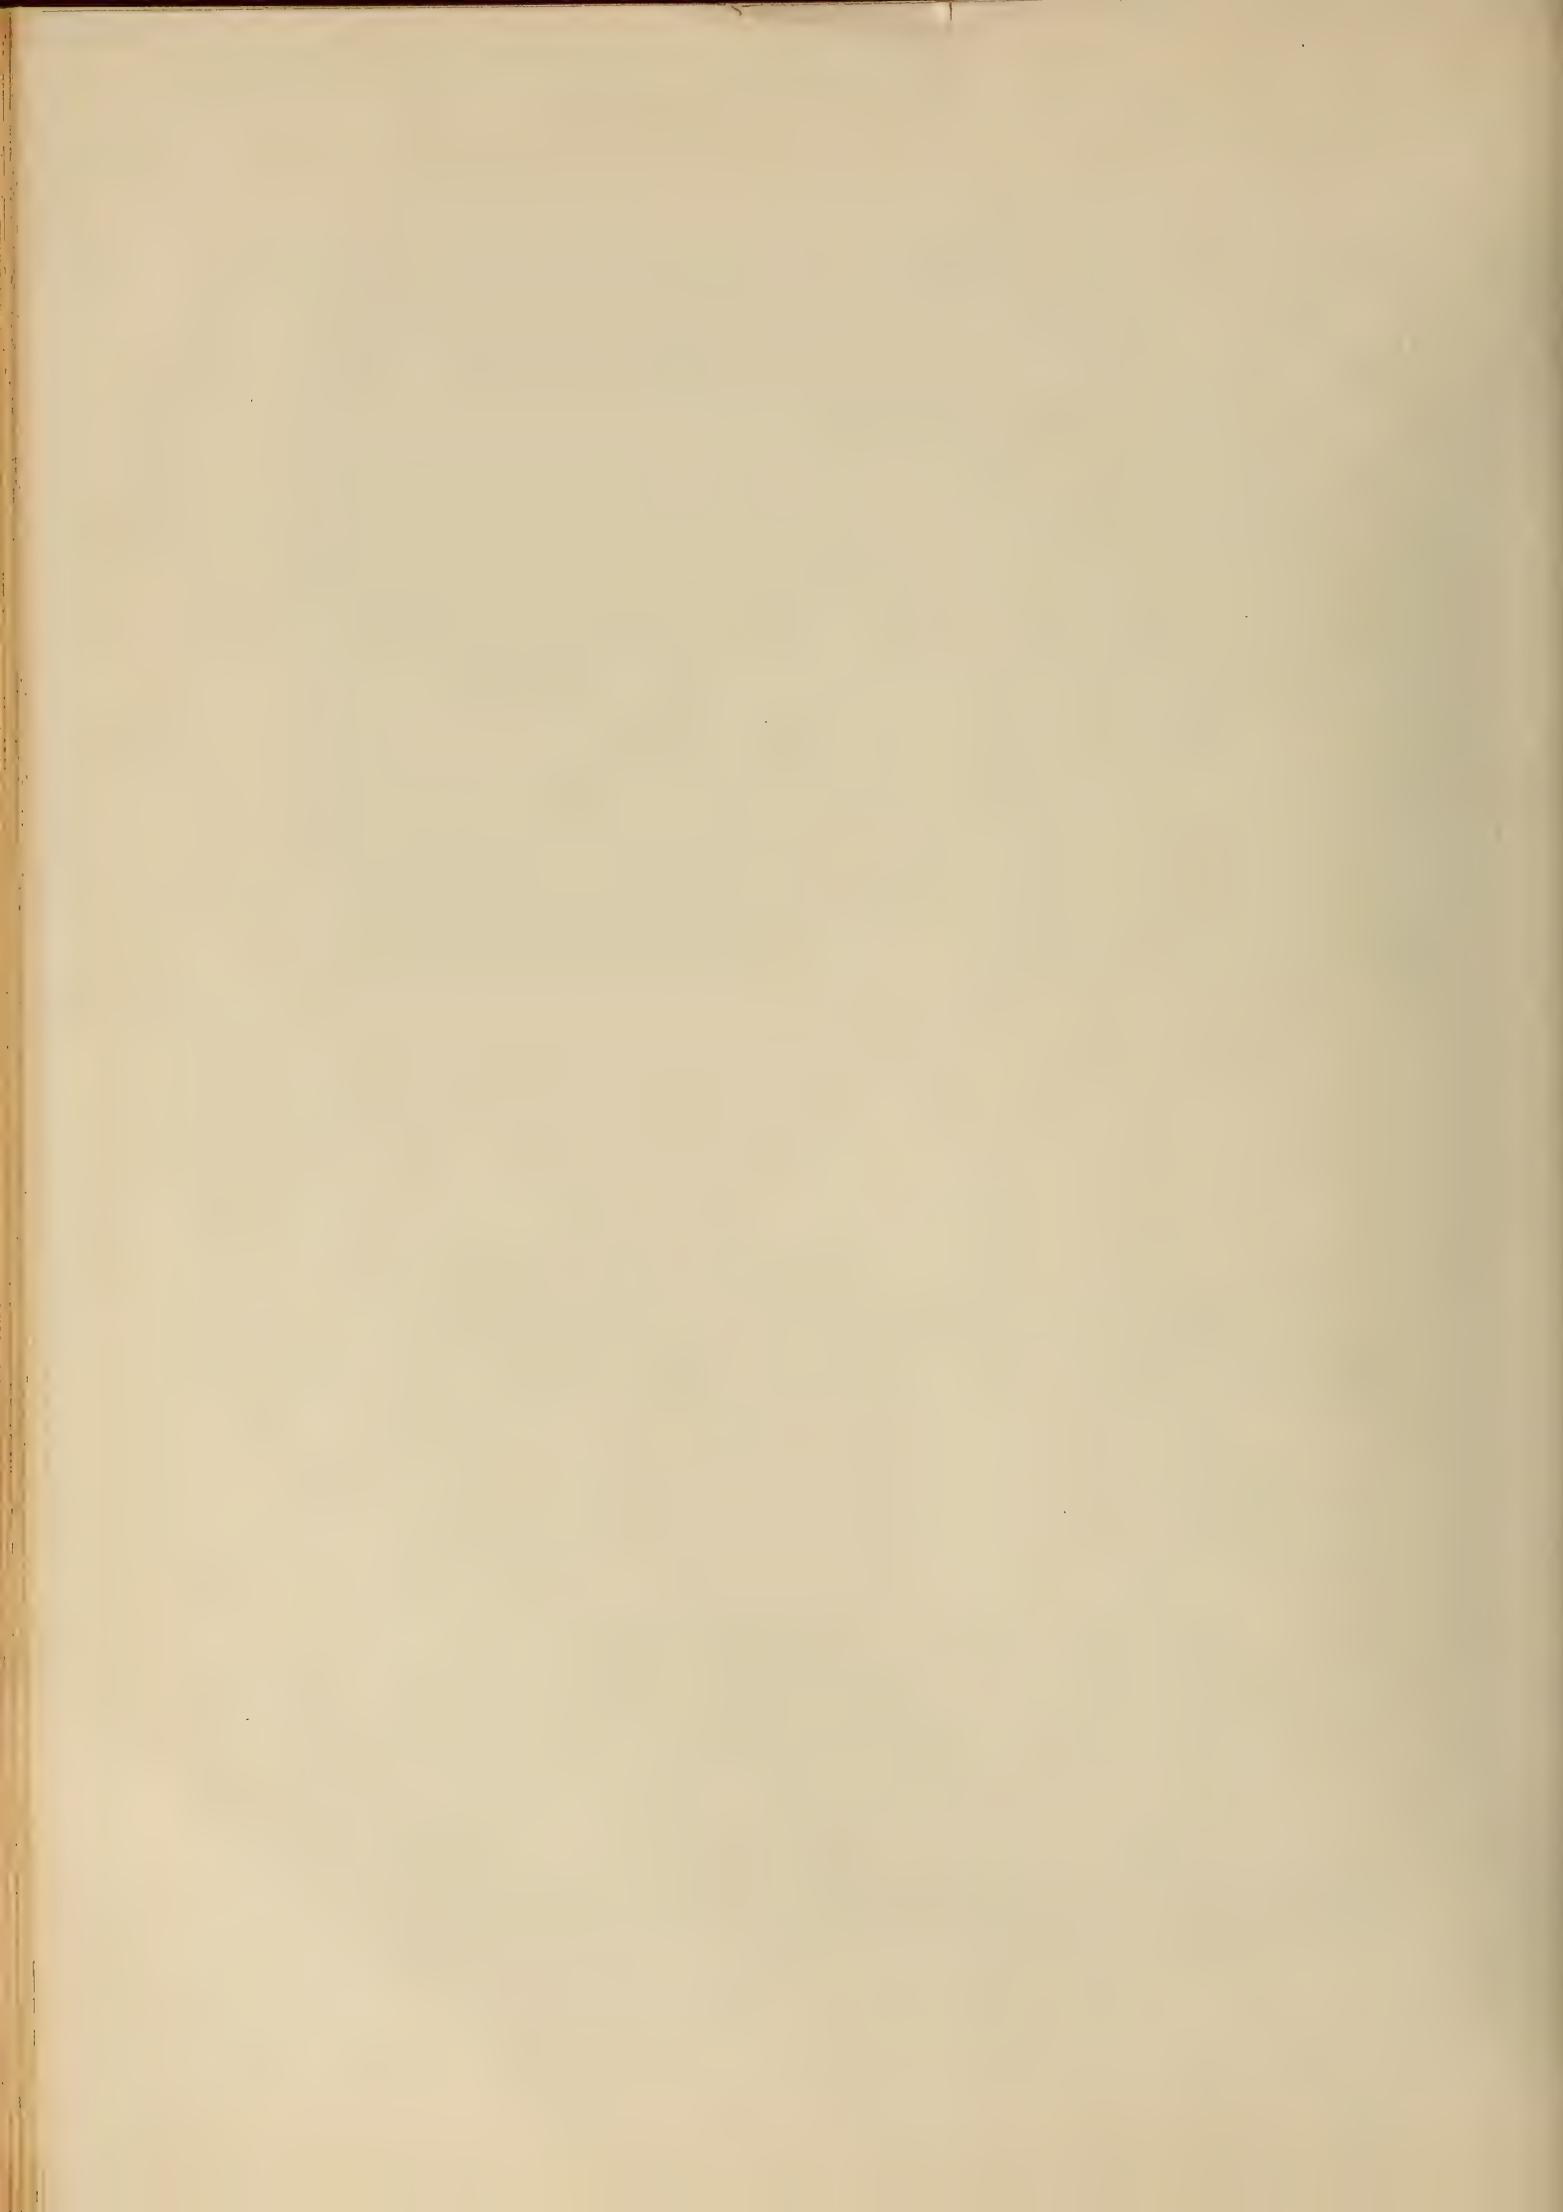

W. B. McGuire, president; Lou Morgan, vice-president; Earl Bartmess, secretary; Percy Cross, treasurer; W. E. Sheets, chief of department; S. J. Frank, assistant; W. J. Gadwa, chief engineer; Clarence Shaw, second assistant engineer; Winn Olinger, third assistant engineer. Many of the boys of the fire department have seen service in other towns and are tried veterans in the work. Sherman Frank, the assistant chief, held the same position at The Dalles. W. I. Gadwa, the chief engineer, was formerly a member of the Pendleton department. Will Sheets has won a number of medals for services with the Larimore, North Dakota, team. This team came to be the champions of the state. Mr. Sheets has belonged to fire companies since he was eight years old. Will Morgan was at one time a member of the Brookfield, Missouri, team. Walter McGuire saw service at McMinnville. The boys are arranging to give a Fire-

Scene on the Columbia

The Dalles, Oregon, in 1858

men's benefit ball on New Year night. Of course any thing like this will be a great success. No one will refuse to buy tickets, and it is intended to make it one of the most popular social events of the season.

The members of the Hood River Volunteer Fire Department are: W. E. Sheets, S. J. Frank, W. I. Gadwa, W. A. Morgan, Bert Stranahan, L. G. Morgan, A. Whitehead, Theo. Koppe, T. Osborn, Clarence Shaw, A. G. Dobney, R. J. Woicka, Joe Vogt, Winn Olinger, Percy Cross, Emmet Tompkins, W. I. Dickey, W. B. McGuire, E. C. Wright, C. S. Jones, William Shipman, Arthur Cole, Earl Bartmess, Webster Kent, Mel Foley, Edwin Henderson.

The Hood River Signal Station was established in September, 1889, by Dr. E. J. Thomas. However, a previous record of the rainfall had been kept by Dr. P. G. Barrett, who became the observer when Dr. Thomas resigned in 1891. Dr. Barrett continued the observation to within a few days of his death, which occurred January 7, 1900. Joseph Hengst was then appointed observer, keeping the records until May, 1904. He was succeeded by D. N. Byerlee. Until May 7, 1904, the station was situated about five miles from the town, but on that date Mr. Byerlee removed the instruments to Oakdale, his country home. The present station is in latitude 42 degrees 42 minutes N.; longitude 121 degrees 30 minutes W.; elevation 243 feet. The maximum and minimum thermometers are exposed in a standard shelter located 120 feet south of the observer's house, a one and one-half story frame dwelling; the bulbs of the thermometers are seven feet from the ground. The rain gauge is 46 feet west of the shelter and 108 south of the house; the top of the gauge is three feet above the ground.

The highest recorded temperature at Hood River was 103 degrees, on August 15, 1901; the lowest was 10 degrees below zero on January 31st and February 1, 1893. The average number of days each year with the temperature above 90 degrees is 9, and the average number of days with the temperature below the freezing point is 74. Average date of first killing frost in autumn, October 17th; average date of last killing frost in the spring, April 17th. The mean annual precipitation is 38.38 inches, and it is heaviest during the winter and spring months, and least in midsummer. The number of rainy days average 129, and the yearly snowfall is 77.8 inches. The prevailing winds are from the west.

The first school house erected in this vicinity was located two miles south of the present site of the town of Hood River, in 1863. The initial teacher was Mr. B. A. Lilly, and the school had an attendance of about fifteen pupils. Until 1881 this was the only school. That year a two-story school house was built at Frankton by subscription. During the fall of 1882 a subscription was headed by H. C. Coe, O. L. Stranahan and Dr. W. L. Adams for the purpose of raising funds to build another school house within the limits of the town of Hood River. About $800 was secured and a school house erected which was donated to the district clear of debt. The first teacher was Miss Nettie Cook, of Salem, and there were about twenty-five pupils. This building was enlarged in 1888 and another teacher engaged. It is still utilized for the primary grade of the present city system.

In 1897 the Park Street schoolhouse, containing six rooms, was built at a cost of $9,000. June 18, 1904, the total enrollment of the Hood River city schools was about 450; twelve teachers were employed. Ten grades were taught and the schools were then considered the best in the country. In the spring of 1905 a census of the Hood River school district showed a total of 629 children of school age; divided—297 boys; 332 girls. This was an increase of 90 over the census of 1904.

It is proper to here append a list of the city officials of Hood River since 1895, the year when incorporation of the town was consummated:

The social side of life in Hood River is well represented by all the leading religious denominations and societies, and by numerous lodges, courts, camps, clubs and auxiliaries. Within the city limits are fine church buildings in which services are held by the following denominations: Congregational, Methodist, United Brethren, Unitarian and Episcopalian, while the Baptists will have completed a beautiful and ornate church edifice before the publication of this volume. In "the valley" are Christian, Methodist, Latter Day Saints, Congregational, Seventh Day Adventists and Union Churches. The Catholics and Lutherans have organized congregations and church buildings will soon be completed. The churches, it is stated, are free from debt.

In the matter of transportation Hood River is highly favored. The Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, the western division of a great transcontinental system, furnishes six daily passenger trains, while competing boat lines reduce freight rates to a minimum, whereas in so many other sections they are nearly prohibitive. The rail and water service is first-class and all that could be reasonably asked by the traveling and shipping public.

Concerning telephone service the manager of the Pacific States Telephone Company recently stated that the city of Hood River utilized more telephones, in proportion to its population, than any other city on the Pacific coast. With telephone lines the beautiful valley of the Hood river is netted, and within the city limits there are over five hundred instruments in daily use. The service is in continuous operation and requires three daily operators. Long distance wires afford connection with all telephone towns on the coast.

With a daily mail two rural delivery routes supply the farmers of the valley. Competent, intelligent men are the carriers and faithful in the performance of their duties. Daily mail, telephone and electric light services afford the neighboring farmers with the most important conveniences of modern city homes.

The postal receipts of the Hood River office show conclusively the steady increase of population. For the quarter ending September 30, 1904, the receipts were only a few dollars short of the requirements to bring Hood River into the second class of offices. The total receipts for the year were $6,298.75, an increase over the previous twelve months of $1,046.68. Postmaster Yates has recently secured new quarters in a fine brick building.

Hood River supports two banking institutions, Butler & Company's bank, and the First National Bank. Both institutions are firmly established and enjoy the confidence of the business men and farmers. Reports from both houses indicate a healthy financial condition in the community. Three large sawmills and lumbering camps, a flour mill, box factory and cordwood camps furnish employment to a large number of men.

For manufacturing establishments Hood River offers exceptional advantages. An engineer's measurement of the stream shows 10,000 horse-power every mile for ten miles, which is a total of 100,000 horsepower, or sufficient motor force when converted into electrical energy to operate the machinery of the state. So far but little use has been made of this superior power. With exceptional transportation facilities at hand, the opportunities for investment of capital in industrial enterprises cannot be equalled in the state. The lumber industry brings to the valley over $350,000 annually. At the headwaters of Hood River there are millions of feet of standing timber, an amount sufficient to keep the big mills cutting 200,000 feet a day in operation for fifty years to come. Of the superior fruit resources the reader is directed to the Descriptive Chapter of Wasco county, published in this part of the volume.

DUFUR.

South of The Dalles, fifteen miles, is situated the town of Dufur, the third in size and importance within the limits of Wasco county. With The Dalles it is connected by two daily stage lines. At present the population of Dufur is between 400 and 500; the United States census of 1900 gave its number of inhabitants as 336.

It is a picturesque town and most eligibly located on the north bank of Fifteen Mile creek; that is, the larger portion of the town is thus situated. Above the level of the stream the town-site varies in height between twenty and seventy feet at the highest water mark. It is well watered by an irrigating ditch brought from the stream above the town, along the hillside to the north. This fluid is as pure and healthful as could be desired and at present the supply is ample. No one need travel afar from Dufur in quest of the most picturesque scenery. To the west is Mount Hood, one of Nature's grandest sentinels, whose snow-white poll is so familiar a sight from all portions of a large section of country. To the north and south lie the lesser heights of the great range commanded by Mount Hood, and yet in view are Mounts Jefferson, Adams, St. Helens and Ranier. They may all be seen, like commanding generals in grand review, from the hills immediately surrounding Dufur. A healthful town is Dufur, and the climate all that could be desired.

And what of the history of this thriving town in the northeast corner of "the Mother of Counties?" It is related that so early as 1847—the year of the Whitman massacre—Dufur became quite a noted place. That year the "Barlow Road" was opened; the famous route crossed Fifteen Mile creek at the present site of the town, and during that and the succeeding year many thousands of immigrants passed the place, yet none of them at that period entertained a serious thought of stopping in Eastern Oregon; the Willamette Valley was the bonne bouche of their pioneer aspirations. But Fifteen Mile Crossing was an eminently favorite camping place for these travel-worn and travel-stained argonauts of 1847; the industrial pilgrims who antedated the Californian pioneers of 1849. The location of this camping spot is still fresh in the memories of all who came to Oregon that year and for many succeeding seasons.

In writing the history of Dufur it is necessary to hark back many years to the pioneer settlement of the country surrounding it. It was in 1852 that the first settler took up his abode on Fifteen Mile creek. L. P. Henderson was his name and he played an important part in the early annals of Wasco county. During the succeeding few years he was followed by ——— Reynolds, John Marsh and J. P. Brown, all stock raisers, who located on Fifteen Mile within a small radius of the present Dufur. Up to the autumn of 1855 these were the only residents in the vicinity. In the latter year this slender colony was reinforced by ten families. The cause of their locating comprises one detail of the many in the historical annals of Indian outrages in Oregon. In 1855 many immigrants were wending their way to the "Upper Country"—the Walla Walla oasis. Some of these migrators to the Walla Walla country came from the Willamette Valley, as was the case with the ten families mentioned who settled on Fifteen Mile. The party arrived at The Dalles the very day word was received that Indian hostilities had begun in the Walla Walla country. They dared not face the grave dangers confronting them should they proceed to the vicinity of these Indian depredations. So they decided to build themselves homes on Fifteen Mile, and accordingly the ten families located here. At this period, it should be remembered, the entire country was seriously alarmed at the probability of a general Indian outbreak and, while they built homes, they, also, wisely constructed a fort. This defense was located about two miles up Fifteen Mile creek, from the present site of Dufur. Within this rude stockade they passed the winter of 1855-6, and a portion of the following spring.

During the '50's several more settlers located in the vicinity and their first thought was a school house for the education of their children. With indomitable will they began work, erected a building, and in time secured the formation of a school district. This pioneer institution was situated only one-half mile from the present site of Dufur. In the educational chapter of Wasco county the history of this school is given. It may be said here, however, that owing to dissensions among the patrons of the school it was abandoned in the late '60's.

The initial business enterprise on the site of the present Dufur was the Fifteen Mile House, erected in 1863 by David Imbler. While it was simply a farm house, accommodations might be obtained there for man and beast, and Fifteen Mile house became known far and wide. This primitive hotel is still conducted as such. It is located on the south side of the creek. While this may be claimed as Dufur's first "business house" it remains a fact that it began operations long before the idea of a town in this locality had entered the brain of man.*

What was the inducement offered to early settlers to locate near what subsequently became Dufur? Primarily the several hundred acres of valley, or meadow land, lying on both sides of the stream, and extending to the west for a distance of six or seven miles. The same old song was sung to the reverberating hills; "Land that Cannot be Irrigated is Not the Land for Us!"

Immigrants then believed—as did thousands of others in other sections of the country—that the hillsides were unfit for the production of anything but sage brush and bunch grass. So, of course, the valley of Fifteen Mile was chosen for homes, and all those taking them up plunged immediately into the business of stock-raising; some making a specialty of horses, others cattle and not a few sheep. For years this latter was the prominent industry of nearly the entire population. But the range, being overstocked, was soon eaten out. Then came, providentially, the discovery that grain could be grown with profit; farming came into vogue; each successive year is likely to witness its increase.

For several years following the downfall of the "school" there was scanty settlement in the neighborhood of Fifteen Mile Crossing. Affairs remained thus at a standstill until 1872, when A. J. and E. B. Dufur purchased a farm there and engaged in sheep-raising on an extensive scale. They secured adjoining lands, imported a large number of thoroughbred sheep and engaged in this prominent industry along extended lines. Gradually the rich fertility of the "Highlands" became known and appreciated—their sheep range became more and more contracted.

We have spoken, perhaps too previously, concerning the first "business house" of Dufur—the hotel. In 1878 opportunities in this section attracted the attention of a Michigan merchant, C. A. Williams. That year he came to Fifteen Mile, built a house and engaged in general merchandising. Shortly after this event the government was induced to grant a postoffice to the settlers on Fifteen Mile. It was named Dufur; Mr. Williams became the first postmaster. About this period the school house, of which we have spoken, was removed to the present location of the town, near Williams' store. Shortly after these important events in the town's history Edward Bohna built a blacksmith shop, and this added materially to the encouragement of the industries at, and surrounding, the place. Then Mr. Bohna erected a residence; by the time the townsite was platted there was quite a little settlement.

July 11, 1891, a correspondent of The Dalles Times-Mountaineer wrote:

A few years ago the traveler along the old military road would stop and rest his horses on the banks of Fifteen Mile, and while smoking his pipe after luncheon would remark: "What an elegant place for a town," but not until the Dufur brothers, A. J. and E. B., came into possession of the property was any effort made in that direction. They did no "booming," employed no real estate agents to photograph the Garden of Eden and pass it on an unsuspecting public as the townsite of Dufur, but confident of the superior advantages of their property, surveyed off a small plat and soon wide awake business men and others, desiring pleasant homes, purchased lots and the town was started.

December 1, 1880, the townsite of Dufur was platted by E. B. and A. J. Dufur, Jr. The patent to the land which comprised the original townsite was issued by the United States to C. W. Broback, September 16, 1872, and at once came into possession of Joseph Beezley. A few days later it was purchased by E. B. and A. J. Dufur who retained possession until the platting in 1880. Connected with the material advancement of Dufur will be remembered the names of Hon. A. J. Dufur, his three sons, Dr. L. Vanderpool, E. D. Bohna, William Heisler, A. J. Brigham, the pioneer merchant, C. W. Williams, D. E. Thomas, J. A. Guleford, A. J. Brigham, W. R. Menefee, George Nedrow, Johnston Brothers, (T. H. and G. W., who purchased the business interests of C. A. Williams.)

August 21, 1881, there were visible signs of permanent improvement in Dufur. The same year Ridgley Lodge, I. O. O. F., was organized and a commodious two-story hall and lodge room erected. It was the first "large building in the place, and as such, commanded a great deal of interest.

In 1883 another business enterprise was established. This was a general store opened by William Heisler who conducted the business until 1887, when it was disposed of to W. R. Menefee and A. J. Brigham. Describing the town of Dufur in 1885 The Dalles Times-Mountaineer said: "Dufur is the market for a large stock and farming country. Tri-weekly stages arrive at this point carrying the United States Mail and passengers. This is one of the oldest settled portions of the county and is constantly increasing in population and wealth. The merchants are very enterprising, and the town presents every indication of thrift and growth."

In 1885 T. H. Johnston and George Johnston came to the little town and bought out the store of C. A. Williams. T. H. Johnston became postmaster and retained the office for about ten years. The Johnston Brothers enlarged the business and have become largely identified with Dufur's progress. In 1888 Dr. Whitcomb opened a drug store. The actual building up of this town was brought about largely through the desire of the people living in the valley of Fifteen Mile creek to secure educational advantages for their children. The school building erected in the town in 1888 induced many farmers to purchase lots and build houses in the neighborhood of this school, which they, or a part of their families, would occupy during the school term.

In 1889 Dufur consisted of two drug stores, two hotels, two livery stables, one good school house, used also as a church at that period, a shoe shop, two general merchandise stores, one restaurant, a blacksmith and wagon shop combined, a roller mill, commodious hall and another for the use of the Odd Fellows. Many new buildings were in process of construction. This year and in 1890-1 a number of the suburban additions to Dufur were laid out and platted into lots. It appeared to have been the aim of the Dufur Brothers to sell property to those only who would improve the same.

Dufur was incorporated as a town by a charter granted by the Oregon legislature and filed in the office of the secretary of state February 10, 1893. An amended charter was granted February 17, 1899, and another in 1903. April 5, 1893, the first city election was held and the following were named for civic official positions: A. J. Dufur, mayor; W. L. Vanderpool, T. H. Johnston, L. J. Klinger, William Heisler, councilmen; A. J. Brigham, recorder; C. P. Balch, treasurer.

During the "hard times" of 1893-7 Dufur remained at a standstill. There was scarcely a building erected in town. But with the passing of the great financial depression the place quickly recuperated from its temporary stagnation and once more resumed its old time activity. Within the past decade Dufur has been, practically, built up and many are the improvements that have been made. January 1, 1898, The Dalles Times-Mountaineer said:

Without any attempt to boom but by legitimate advertising of the natural resources of the surrounding country, Dufur has shown a more rapid growth than ever before. In the past year there has been an increase of over 50 per cent. in the population. Twenty substantial residences and business houses have been erected and many old ones improved. An excellent water system sufficient for a city five times the size has been provided, showing the confidence in its growth. A large cemented reservoir on a hill some two hundred feet above the town, gives abundant pressure to the hydrants in nearly every residence, and with the large mains makes an ordinary conflagration easily controlled, thus making insurance rates reasonable.

Dufur has a population of about 500. While her growth in the past has not been abnormal, it has been steady and healthy. * * * Aside from the improvement in the town, over a million feet of lumber have been consumed in improvements in adjacent communities; over 600,000 bushels of wheat has been raised within a radius of twelve miles this season.

April 8, 1899, the Times-Mountaineer added the following:

"Two years ago Messrs. W. L. Vanderpool and T. H. Johnston bought a tract of land adjacent to Dufur and laid out 34 blocks of 200 feet square and placed them on the market. So rapid has been the sale of this property that they have found it necessary to plat another addition of 34 blocks to be known as the Fifth Addition to Dufur. In the sale of this property they have made it a rule to never dispose of any ground for speculative purposes, only selling to such persons as would agree to build homes on the land, hence it will be seen that Dufur has enjoyed a substantial growth of late."

The total assessed valuation of Dufur in 1903 was $68,450. Considerable improvement was made in the way of municipal progress in 1904. Two large, handsome brick business houses were erected and, altogether, the town took long strides in the line of material and industrial improvement.

In the air there was for many years agitation for the construction of a railroad to Dufur. Early in 1898 The Dalles, Dufur & Des Chutes Railroad Company was incorporated, with the object to build railway lines into the interior. One of these projects was a road from The Dalles to Dufur. The incorporators were E. E. Lytle, D. C. O'Rielly and W. H. Moore. The capital stock was $300,000. So far nothing has materialized, although the survey was completed September 15, 1903.

But at last this railroad "talk" which has kept the residents of this town on anxious seats for many years gives promise of something tangible. In the spring of 1904 the Great Southern railroad began active preparations to construct a road from The Dalles to Dufur. Grading was commenced, representatives of the company appeared at Dufur for the purpose of securing depot location, right of way, etc. At this writing (April, 1905), the grading of the Great Southern to Dufur is completed; the prospect is fair for finishing the line in time to move the crop of 1905. Needless it is to say that this road will wonderfully benefit the town, and more especially so provided Dufur remains the terminus.

Concisely speaking Dufur has an excellent water supply, fire department, electric lights, good schools, etc., and is universally up to date in almost every particular. The buildings of the town are substantial—there are no "shacks." The churches comprise the United Brethren; Rev. W. N. Blodgett, pastor; Methodist Episcopal, G. R. Moorhead, pastor, and the Christian Church P. P. Underwood, pastor.

Of fraternal societies there are Ridgley Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F.; Star Rebekah Lodge No. 23; Nicholson Encampment No. 44; Dufur Camp No. 215; United Artisans, Dufur Assembly No. 112, and Mt. Hood Lodge No. 1331, M. B. A.

CHAPTER VIII

OTHER TOWNS.

ANTELOPE.

In size Antelope ranks fourth among the municipalities of Wasco county. It is situated in the heart of a great producing country, and at one time was the headquarters of the most extensive sheep and stock ranges in the United States. Prior to the extension of the Columbia Southern road, this section furnished to the market more sheep and wool than any other country having double its area in the Northwest. Until Shaniko became a railroad town Antelope enjoyed all the wool prestige, but it yet remains the business center of a grand section of country.

The city of Antelope is situated seven miles southeast of Shaniko, the present terminus of the Columbia Southern Railway; beautifully located in a rich valley; surrounded by hills on every side; an ideal residence locality. From The Dalles it is 97 miles southeast. It is surrounded by cool, living springs and there are innumerable wells. Than Antelope a prettier townsite could not have been chosen. Green meadows stretch down to the west, and gradually sloping hills on either side render it a pleasant, desirable location. At present the population of the town is 300.

Antelope derives its name from the once vast herds of these animals that browsed upon the hills surrounding the townsite. In early days bands of hundreds of antelope could be counted on the hillsides any day and in any direction from the town. But at present these "pert and piquant" little animals have entirely disappeared, and it is many miles to the nearest antelope-range.

Howard Maupin was the earliest settler in the Antelope country. In the '60's he located on the site of the old Antelope, later moving to another place in the valley. This was about two miles from the present site of Antelope. At the time he settled there The Dalles-Canyon City road had not been built, but the place was on the pack-trail leading from The Dalles to the Canyon City mines. This trail crossed the Des Chutes river about four miles above Sherar's Bridge, or Maupin's ferry. August 12, 1872, a correspondent of the Antelope Herald said:

"What changes have been brought to bear on Antelope since the time when Chief Paulina roamed over the Antelope hills, stealing and committing all kinds of crimes, until one of the old pioneers, M. H. Maupin, caught him at one of his bold tricks on the hill just opposite the town of Antelope, to the northeast, and laid the chief low with a well aimed bullet from his Winchester, thus putting an end to the war-whoop of Chief Paulina and his braves. Then Mr. Maupin could look for and wide over the vast prairie, with nothing to disturb the monotony of the surroundings save the sight of his own hut. Those days are now gone, and look at the lovely valley and the beautiful town of Antelope today."

On the old Antelope location, two miles east of the present town, Nathan W. Wallace settled in 1870. And it was in 1873 that the old town of Antelope came into existence. It was on the place first tenanted by Maupin that Wallace located, and about the year 1873 he officiated as host at the stage station which he there established. He, also, secured a postoffice which was named Antelope, and of which Wallace became postmaster. The town had that pioneer establishment of all new western settlements, a blacksmith shop. In 1879 the business of this hamlet was increased by a store conducted by Nate Baird, who later became postmaster. These primitive business enterprises constituted the town of Antelope until its migration, in 1881, to its present location. The site of this "Hazard of New Fortunes" was then owned by N. R. Baird and B. F. Laughlin.

During the earlier days of the '70's hostile tribes of Indians made frequent incursions into this section of country, and the old Wallace home, built on Stockade plan, with loop holes through the heavy hewn logs, was a frequent rendezvous for the scattered settlers of the country. Mr. Wallace continued to live in Antelope until his death, September 10, 1904.

In 1881 the stage route was changed; no longer it passed the Wallace place. It was at this period that the town of Antelope changed its location. On the present site of Antelope a stage station was built by Dr. Owsley, and was shortly afterward purchased by Mr. Wallace, who moved it to the new location, and brought the postoffice with him. Nathan Baird also moved his store down, and a man by the name of Carter erected in the new town a building which is now known as Tammany Hall.

The patent to the land upon which Antelope is located was issued to Nathan Baird and B. F. Laughlin—that is the town was laid out upon land which had been homesteaded by these persons, the line separating their claims running through the town. September 14, 1882, the town-site was platted by Baird and Laughlin. But the official procedure did not, immediately, cause a stampede to the new place, nor did active building operations immediately begin. Not until 1887 was there much to show in the way of a town at Antelope. That year a store was moved down from Cross Hollow, one or two stores established, and, as Mr. R. C. Rooper said: "There was enough of a town so that you could see it with the naked eye." As an eye-witness of the town's sudden impetus in 1892 we quote from the Antelope Herald of September 2d:

"Antelope is at present witnessing a great boom. Lumber is being hauled from the mills and piled up here every day only awaiting the action of the carpenters to convert it into business houses, residences, etc. Everyone is improving his property and erecting new additions thereto. Town lots are selling at a rapid rate and at good prices. Outsiders are beginning to realize the superior advantages of living at Antelope and are investing in lots here in order to build residences thereon so as to send their children to school when the new school house is completed."

January 6, 1893, the Herald added this:

"The town of Antelope, during the past year, has undergone a greater change and has witnessed greater prosperity than during any previous year in the history of her existence. Prior to the above year the town neither improved very rapidly nor did it retrograde, but with the advent of 1892 the superior advantages and opportunities which the town of Antelope furnishes, became established to the outside world, and the consequence was that the people from nearly every county in the state pulled up and settled here."

Among other improvements this year, notable at the time, were the establishment of a general merchandise store by E. M. Wingate and Frank Irvine; the Antelope Herald; drugstore by Dr. Franke and J. Silvertooth; remodeling of the Laughlin Hotel; warehouse by W. Bolton; new school house; barber and shoemaker shops; organization of A. O. U. W. and W. C. T. U. societies, and a large number of residences.

Of course the "hard times" of 1893 were experienced in Antelope—as the epidemic was universal—but in proportion to her size Antelope did not suffer so much as hundreds of other communities in the state. The town improved considerably during the early days of 1893.

At last came the time when "incorporation" was in the air. It was in the summer of 1896 that the citizens of Antelope petitioned the Wasco county court for the privilege of voting upon the question of incorporation. They alleged that there were 170 inhabitants within the proposed boundaries, and the petition was signed by 51 electors. This movement was decided upon at a mass meeting held August 7th, at which were present nearly every male citizen in the town, and all there were solid for incorporation. At the September session of the county court the petition was granted and October 19th named as the day of election, and to select the first city officials. Judges of election named were T. J. Harper, P. A. Kirchheiner and W. Bolton; clerks, M. E. Miller and E. M. Shutt.

October 23, 1896, a canvass of the votes cast showed the following: For incorporation, 33; against, 14. These were elected: Mayor, John L. Hollingshead; Aldermen—S. W. Patterson, John McLennon, W. Bolton, N. R. Baird, W. H. Silvertooth, N. W. Wallace; recorder, (tie vote), Peter A. Kirchheiner and M. E. Miller, (Miller qualified); marshal, F. T. Cook; treasurer, Frank Irvine. This election was to name officers to serve only until the annual city election which was to occur December 8th. At this last election all the same officials were returned. The first meeting of the council was held November 18th, and from 1896 Antelope dates her existence as a city.

Highly prosperous was the year 1897 for Antelope. The sluggish effects of "hard times" were thrown off; the new blood of activity and business enterprise filled her veins. That year Antelope saw real prosperity; the greatest in her history up to that date. At the close of 1897 the present town had two large general merchandise stores owned by Bolton & Company and Frank Irvine; a commodious and complete drug store by Dr. R. J. Pilkington, who was, also, a successful surgeon and physician; two blacksmith shops by Peter A. Kirchheiner and Antone Nelson; three saloons by F. W. Silvertooth, McLennan & McBeth and McKay & Tunny; four large and well furnished hotels conducted by W. J. Ashby, W. Wallace, McLennan & McBeth and Mrs. M. E. Perrin; a barber shop and confectionery store owned by G. E. Patterson; two large livery stables conducted by W. J. Ashby and Henry Dyce; a harness and saddlery establishment by C. F. Perrin; a meat market by G. E. Patterson; the Antelope Herald printing office with M. E. Miller as editor and proprietor; a furniture and undertaking store by E. J. Glisan; also E. C. Dickerson had under construction a bowling alley and J. T. Bennett was erecting a new stationery store and post office building. Besides these were the A. F. & A. M., the A. O. U. W., the Woodmen and the D. of H. lodges all in a flourishing condition.

After many happy escapes from disastrous fire the town suffered by quite a serious conflagration. Monday, July 11, 1898, at 2:30 o'clock, a. m. Citizens were aroused from their slumbers by the cry of "fire;" in less than one hour and thirty minutes the business portion of Antelope was a mass of wreck and ruin. Only an apparently special act of Providence at an opportune moment, the changing of the wind, combined with the heroic efforts of the people, saved the town from destruction. This fire originated in the Condon bowling alley.

Within a few minutes the flames had spread so that this building was beyond saving. So rapidly raced the flames that before people were thoroughly aroused the Antelope hotel was ablaze. Without clothing or personal property the guests and other inmates managed to save their lives. From the south side the flames spread to the livery stable; thence onward down the street to Kirchheiner's blacksmith shop, Dr. Pilkington's drug store, the postoffice and store, Gilsan & Brown's furniture, McBeth's saloon and hotel and the Scott building. While the blacksmith shop was burning Silvertooth's saloon caught; Patterson's store and W. Bolton & Company's big store were the last aflame.

On the north side of Main street all the buildings between Kirchheiner's residence and Riley's little house were destroyed. On the south side of Main street between the Union House and Silvertooth's residence next to the Herald office. Very little was saved from any of the burned buildings. A conservative estimate places the loss at about $70,000, with insurance of $25,000, divided as follows: Masonic Lodge, $4,000, insurance, $1,400; Condon & Powne, $900; T. G. Condon, $250; W. J. Ashby, $2,000; W. D. Jones, $5,000; P. A. Kirchheiner, $2,500, insurance, $500; R. J. Pilkington, $2,000, insurance, $800; J. T. Bennett, $1,000, insurance, $250; Gilsan & Brown, $1,200, insurance, $300; F. McBeth, $6,000, insurance, $1,500; D. Scott, $500; F. W. Silvertooth, $1,250, insurance, $500; W. Bolton, $50,000, insurance, $20,000; N. W. Wallace, $500;

H. W. Gamble, $100; G. E. Patterson, $2,000, insurance, $800; F. M. Dial, $2,000, insurance, $1,500; John Ogle, $100; M. E. Miller, $100.

By September the town of Antelope was in a fair way of recovery from the terrible disaster that had overtaken it. The new store buildings which were rapidly rebuilt, were much better structures than had been the old ones, in every way. And the new Antelope bid fair to become one of the handsomest towns in the interior and, for its size, one of the best. A splendid gravity system of water works was constructed in 1898, and supplies the city with pure water from the hills a mile and one-half distant. This system together with 500 feet of hose, hose-carts, ladders, hooks, buckets and a set of resolute fire fighters, makes the town comparatively safe from a repetition of a similar disaster. March 31, 1899, the Antelope Herald said:

"The $4,000 of city bonds will be sold tomorrow. This will place the city's finances in fine condition, as there will be no other indebtedness except the bonded debt, and the city is well able to take care of that. To show for this debt we have a splendid system of waterworks, a good reservoir and well-equipped fire company. How many other towns of the size of Antelope can make so good a showing?"

By certain pessimistic "gloomists" it had been predicted that when the Columbia Southern railroad was extended and the town of Shaniko came into existence, which it did in the spring of 1900, Antelope would fade away from the surface of the earth. However, this was not the case; if anything Antelope became more prosperous than ever. The philosophical editor of the Morning Oregonian said, July 7, 1900:

"The theory that location of the town of Shaniko, at the terminus of the Columbia Southern railroad within six miles of Antelope would kill the place has been practically exploded. Trains have been running into that point now for about two months, and if there is any difference in the prosperity of Antelope, it is in Antelope's favor. While Antelope is, comparatively an old town, it is just as live and always has been as a new town."

The total assessed valuation of Antelope in 1903 was $48,600. The fraternal societies of the town now comprise: Antelope Lodge No. 116, A. F. & A. M.; Madeline Lodge No. 59, O. E. S.; Antelope Lodge No. 44, A. O. U. W.; Purity Lodge No. 39, Degree of Honor; Virtue Lodge No. 146, I. O. O. F., Sheep Camp, No. 367, W. of W.

The religious societies are represented by the Methodist Episcopal and Episcopalian churches. The town is supplied with splendid schools.

SHANIKO.

This town is the fifth in size in the county of Wasco, the youngest in age and among the first in business transactions. It is located some sixty miles south of the Columbia river; 2,500 feet above sea level. The views of the Cascade range of mountains; the snow-crowned peaks of the Three Feathers, Mounts Hood, Jefferson, Adams, St. Helens and Rainer (or Tacoma), cannot be surpassed from any other point in the entire state of Washington. Its location has been graphically described by the Morning Oregonian of January 1, 1900:

"The site is on a plain that slopes gently toward the northeast, in line with the prevailing winds. It is about 2,500 feet above sea level and commands an extensive view in all directions. From any part of the town eight perpetual snow peaks are visible. * * * No accurate data of the climate and temperature are available, but old settlers assure the writer that the mercury seldom touches zero, and the winters are usually short, and on account of exposure to the warm Chinook winds snow seldom lies on the ground for more than a few days at a time. The moderate elevation of the townsite secures it against oppressive heat in summer, and with abundance of pure air, the best facilities in the world for drainage, and abundance of cool, living water, Shaniko ought to make an ideally healthful town."

As might be readily supposed from the sound, the name of this new metropolis is not of Indian derivation. It is an Americanized patronymic of a former honest German resident named Scherneckau, whom his neighbors in proud defiance or all Teutonic orthography, persisted in calling by the name of the new town. Thus the honest German became, practically, named after the town instead of the town being named after him, which was the intention.

The earlier history of Shaniko, paradoxical as it may appear, begins long before there existed such a place. At present it is located near what was long an important station on the main wagon road between The Dalles and Canyon City, known as Cross Hollow. In no sense was Shaniko a boom town; rather a child of necessity. To any one acquainted with the topography of Eastern Oregon it is unnecessary to state that lines of communication whether by rail or wagon, almost invariably followed well defined routes. Thus, for many years the bulk of all the traffic between the interior of Eastern Oregon and the head of navigation on the Middle Columbia was conveyed over two wagon roads that converged at Bakeoven, a few miles west of the present Shaniko. From thence to The Dalles one single expensive toll road carried the greater portion of all the traffic of a territory nearly as large as the states of Vermont and New Hampshire. It was at once seen that Shaniko must eventually become a shipping point with railway facilities; the prediction has been verified. All roads from the great stock ranges of the interior lead to Shaniko.

While the history of the town of Shaniko does not begin until the spring of 1900, the site upon which it is built is an old one with an interesting history. Here, in 1878, A. Scherneckau built a place which he operated as a stopping point on the stage line, it being one day's journey from The Dalles. In addition to his inn he conducted a small store, a preponderance of his goods being of an alcoholic character. He was, also, the proprietor of a blacksmith shop. In 1882, the country having considerably developed by settlement, Scherneckau erected a separate building for his store besides making other improvements. He opened an extensive stock of goods and for several years conducted an immense business—some have estimated it as high as $50,000 a year. This place was known as Cross Hollow. But finally the "Hollow" began to wane. The place ceased to be a stage station. Mr. Scherneckau disposed of his property to William Farr who, for awhile, conducted the business and in 1887, considering the new town of Antelope a more favorable location, moved his stock, store building and all to the new town. Cross Hollow was no more.

Thus the site remained, a place in memory only, until the fall of 1899, when it became known that the Cross Hollow site had been selected as the terminus of the railway. In August, 1899, the surveyors, having laid out a site for the new town, returned to Moro. Moore Brothers, bankers, purchased the site and prepared to back the enterprise with hard cash. A bank, warehouse, hotel, general store with the terminal buildings of the Columbia Southern Railroad were anticipated as the nucleus of a thriving western city and the key to a vast region hitherto handicapped by a long haul to a railroad point. Anticipating the future of this town The Dalles Times-Mountaineer, September 20, 1899, said:

There is no longer any doubt that the Columbia Southern will be pushed on south from Moro to the town of Shaniko (Cross Hollow), as rapidly as possible, and that the latter place will for years to come be the terminus of the road, for when the road is completed to that place there will be little reason for building it farther, as it will be in a position to handle all the freight traffic for many miles south.

And so long as Shaniko is the southern terminus of the road it will be a lively and thriving place.

Recognizing this fact a number of Dalles people have interested themselves in the place and will endeavor to make what they can out of it. Messrs. Lord and Laughlin have taken stock in the Shaniko Warehouse Company, which proposes to erect a large wool and grain warehouse at that place and do a general forwarding, storage and commission business. They have, also, with other Dalles people, taken an interest in the Shaniko Townsite Company, incorporated yesterday with a capital stock of $48,000, the purpose of which is to acquire title to realty, build waterworks, electric light plants, etc. The incorporators are B. F. Laughlin, E. C. Pease, D. M. French, W. Lord and J. W. French, of The Dalles; W. H. and H. A. Moore, of Moro. The fact that these gentlemen have interested themselves in these enterprises is evidence that there is money back of the town of Shaniko, which is one of the principal things to put it going.

The plat of the Shaniko townsite was filed in the office of the county clerk September 8, 1899. It was platted on the property of W. H. and Laura Moore. The first building erected was by G. G. Wiley, in March, 1900; this was followed by the Shaniko Townsite Company, who built a fine two-story house. In laying out the townsite the company established grades for streets and sidewalks, planned a magnificent system of water-works and a complete sewer system. The original site comprised thirty blocks of 12 lots each, 50x100 feet in size. The business streets are 100, and the residence thoroughfares, 80 feet in width.

The Shaniko Warehouse Company was incorporated the latter part of September, 1899, with a capital of $42,000. The incorporators were W. Lord, B. F. Laughlin and W. H. Moore. In January, 1900, the officials of the Shaniko Townsite Company advertised in the Morning Oregonian, a newspaper printed at Portland, that the Columbia Southern Railway would be completed to Shaniko by April 1, 1901. In this advertisement the company stated that Shaniko was destined to become the largest wool market in the world. In March, 1900, more than one hundred persons were employed in various works in progress in the new town. All of these boarded and slept in tents. At that period there was only one wooden building erected; a mere temporary shack utilized as a saloon. Men were then flocking into town daily; material was coming in fast. But not until April 20, 1900, did Shaniko enjoy the privilege of a postoffice.

May 13, 1900, a railroad construction train rolled into the municipal boundaries of the town of Shaniko. Two days subsequently regular passenger and freight trains arrived and departed daily. On the 16th from The Dalles, went J. W. and D. M. French, E. C. Pease and W. Lord, of the Shaniko Townsite Company, to look over their new possessions. With them went William Henry for the purpose of establishing a drug store. The federal census of June 1, 1900, gave Shaniko a population of 172 permanent residents; the fifth town in size in the county. The water which supplies Shaniko is obtained from springs, pure and clear as crystal, gushing forth from the hillsides. These were cleaned out, cemented up and piped to a large receiving reservoir holding 120,000 gallons, and from that the water is pumped into the auxiliary reservoir which stands high above all the buildings and holds 60,000 gallons. The water system was completed and mains laid over the city and connections made in July, 1900. It is owned by the Townsite Company and cost $20,000.

Shaniko experienced its first fire October 2, 1900, when the Pease & Mays store, an iron structure, 100 feet square, was destroyed, together with Pease & Mays' general merchandise stock and Houghton & Henry's drug stock, which were located in the building. The fire, which was supposed to have originated from a defective flue, was discovered about 8:30 a. m., in the drug store, but had gained such headway that it was impossible to save either the stock or building. The latter was constructed a year ago at a cost of $6,000. Pease & Mays carried a $20,000 stock of merchandise and their store fixtures were valued at $2,000. Houghton & Henry's stock and fixtures were valued at $5,000, making a total value of $33,000. All was well insured. This was, of course, a serious loss to the town, since the stores burned were the leading mercantile establishments of the place. Since then they have all been rebuilt.

The election deciding the question of incorporation of Shaniko was held February 9, 1901. It resulted in the election of the following city officials: Mayor, F. T. Hurlbert; recorder, E. Lewis; marshal, Dell Howell; treasurer, Don Rae; councilmen, C. C. Cooper, N. M. Lane, Fen Batty, George Ross, H. Brunner, F. Lucas.

January 1, 1902, Shaniko was a populous, growing community. Besides the railroad shops it contains the most extensive wool warehouse in the state, from which 4,000,000 pounds were marketed in 1901. Throughout the country was a great cattle raising section, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 400 car-loads were shipped.

The total assessment valuation in 1903 was $72,435. June 14, 1904, there were sold in Shaniko 1,250,000 pounds of wool at prices ranging from 14 to 17 cents. June 2d, previously, 1,000,000 pounds changed hands. It was estimated that the total wool sales for that year ran close into the 5,000,000 mark. Shaniko, being the distributing point for an immense scope of country, is supplied with stages to all parts of the interior off the lines of railway. It is the present terminus of the Columbia Southern Railway, and the point of arrival and departure of Prineville and Bend stage companies.

The fraternal societies of Shaniko are represented by Shaniko Lodge No. 67, A. O. U. W.; Shaniko camp No. 1012, M. W. A., and Ollie Lodge No. 79, Degree of Honor.

The Methodist Episcopal Church is the only one in Shaniko.

CASCADE LOCKS.

This is a village on the Columbia river and the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, forty-five miles east of Portland, and forty-three miles west of The Dalles. The religious element is represented by Methodist and Catholic Churches; it has a population of about 300, a saw mill and a number of business houses.

The town of Cascade Locks has grown into prominence since the building of the "Locks" in 1880. At the time the government commenced the work was a matter of necessity, buildings were erected and a few business houses opened. For many years the existence of this town depended upon the locks, but with development of the fishing industry quite a number of wheels were placed in operation. The location is picturesque. The river, an angry current at this point, sweeps along a grass and moss-covered bank, and on either side giant mountains rear their summits often above the clouds. Groves of pine, fir, cedar and hemlock cluster in pleasant groups in the vicinity, affording a cooling shade in the summer and a pleasant resort for tourists. In the neighboring streams are many active yet sagacious trout; in the forests and on the mountain sides elk and deer. This locality has been called the Switzerland of the Northwest, and it is certain that no Alpine scene excels in grandeur and beauty the Cascades of the Columbia. The government work at this place was, practically, completed in 1896, but there have been appropriations since. As a summer resort Cascade Locks has acquired prominence; with the certain increase of Oregon population these picturesque hillsides will be dotted with the summer cottages of wealthy citizens, who will here resort for temporary seclusion from active business life. July 19, 1901, The Dalles Times-Mountaineer said:

Few Oregonians realize all the attractive features of Cascade Locks as a summer resort, else the "white city" there would be counted by the hundreds instead of being a few score of pleasure seekers who have learned of its comforts and are selfish enough to enjoy them without letting the rest of the world know what a paradise there is. Within a quarter of a mile of the depot is located the camp grounds, a romantic dell in the mountains, shaded so perfectly that the sun scarcely kisses mother earth during the entire day. The purest mountain water is led to the grounds by a pipe line, and the air is as perfect and exhilarating as could be encountered on the summit of Mount Hood.

Besides all these advantages of the mountains one is still within civilization and within reach of every comfort to be had in the cities. The stores and markets in the town of Cascade Locks are supplied with everything, and prices are as reasonable as in Portland or The Dalles. Six trains and four boats pass there daily, hence the camper is not removed from the outside world; in fact business men spending the summer there can superintend their business about as well from there as if they were at home, since they are an hour and one-half by rail from either Portland or The Dalles, and the place is also connected by telegraph and telephone with both these cities. True, Cascade Locks has not the attraction of mineral springs or anything to renew life except the pure water, mountain air and magnificent scenery, but it is only an half hour's ride by boat to either the Collins or Moffit springs.

But in May, 1880, conditions were somewhat different. There were then two stores, three hotels (one quite commodious,) a restaurant, two saloons, another devoted exclusively to the sale of beer, a shoe shop, butcher shop, and a number of private residences. A commodious school house was in process of erection. There were about one hundred residents exclusive of the employes on the locks who then numbered 350. Occasionally services were held by the Catholics.

It was in 1880 that Cascade Locks was the victim of a great flood in common with many other river towns at that period. At certain times the inhabitants were compelled to seek higher ground for safety. However, no great damage was experienced. By autumn, 1880, Cascade Locks had arrived at the following proportions: stores, shops and dwellings, 10; saloons, including a building soon to be opened, 12.

By July 20, 1881, there were 80 men at work on the locks. The town exhibited some signs of improvement, but business activity depended greatly on the government work. There was a line of coaches under charge of Mr. Bothwick, which conveyed passengers between the boat landings. In 1885 the population was transitory, numbering about 200, nearly all of whom were in government employment. The exceptions were those attending fish wheels. Up to the time the boats went through these locks the government had expended $3,000,000 in their construction to overcome the rapids in the river, a more extended description of this being given in the current chapters of the history of Wasco county. In March, 1905, the government appropriated $30,000 for improvements on the locks. The census of 1900 gave Cascade Locks a population of 248.

During the early history of the town Cascade Locks held its place on the map simply because of the government works. It now stands on its own business reputation; the fishing industry; its sawmills and general attractions as a summer resort.

TYGH VALLEY.

This village has a population of about 150. It is situated 30 miles south of The Dalles. Concisely speaking it has telephone connections; daily stage to Kingsley, Dufur and The Dalles; a newspaper, general store, blacksmith shop, etc. The religious element is represented by the United Brethren Church. The town is picturesquely located on the bank of Tygh Creek, a tributary of White River, amid groves of poplars and cottonwoods, forming an agreeable contrast to the bare and rugged hills of the vicinity. The postoffice was established in 1885.

"Tygh" is an Indian name, and Indians of the present day pronounce it with an accent difficult to imitate by speakers of English. At a time when there were few settlers in the neighborhood H. Staley built a store and conducted a thriving business with whites and Indians from Warm Springs reservation. Later he disposed of this store to J. M. and C. J. Van Duyne. The town was platted June 13, 1892, by Charles J. Van Duyne.

MOSIER.

So much has been written concerning the pioneer towns of Wasco county that present descriptions are necessarily abbreviated. The village of Mosier is located on the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, fourteen miles west of The Dalles and six miles east of Hood River. It is theologically represented by the Methodist, Christian and Catholic churches. It has a saw mill, two general stores, a box factory, blacksmith shop, etc. Mosier is, comparatively, a new town, but is named after one of Wasco county's prominent pioneers, of whom much will be found in the current chapters of Wasco county history. The Times-Mountaineer said, June 21, 1904: "J. N. Mosier, who was in the city today, said that the town of Mosier is showing a good and healthy growth this year. During the coming summer there will be a number of buildings erected, including a hotel, store, hall and several residences."

KINGSLEY.

This town is located seven miles south of Dufur, and is the center of a large farming settlement. It contains a store, blacksmith shop, saloon, etc. Three times a week the place is visited by a stage to and from Dufur. The town-site was platted May 16, 1893. Kingsley is one of the oldest settlements of Wasco county, in a rich farming country in the eastern portion. It is distant twenty-four miles south of The Dalles. There is located here a Catholic church.

WAPINITIA.

Lies forty-five miles south of The Dalles, with a daily stage and mail between the two points; has two stores; hotel; saloon and a blacksmith shop. H. T. Corum opened a store at this point in 1883 and became postmaster. It is one of the older towns of the county and in 1885 the Times-Mountaineer said of it:

"Oak Grove takes its name from the settlement. A stage line runs three times a week, and it is about fifty miles from The Dalles. This is on the Tygh route and has a tri-weekly stage. The name of the postoffice is Wapinitia."

WAMIC.

This place is located on Three Mile creek, a tributary of White River, thirty-seven miles south of The Dalles, from which it has a daily stage. It contains a store, saw mill, hotel and blacksmith shop. It is six miles southeast of Tygh, on both banks of the stream, and on the very edge of Mount Hood's timbered foothills. It is a decidedly pleasant and healthful location. Wamic came into existence in the early '80's, and for several years did business under the pseudonym of Prattsville, in honor of Mr. Jason Pratt, an old settler who owned most of the land where Wamic now stands; Mr. Pratt came to the place from the east some forty-six years ago. He came to Wamic with ox teams and assisted many an early immigrant to take his wagons over the bluffs of Tygh before there was any sign of a wagon road in the vicinity. Although in poor health at that period he lived and raised sons to plow and reap above the old time wagon trails. Wamic is surrounded by a good belt of farming country. In the summer of 1889 Wamic consisted of a general merchandise store and post-office, millinery store, brickyard, and two saw mills in the vicinity. It is now a thriving village of about 100 population.

BOYD

Is on Fifteen Mile creek, eleven miles south of The Dalles and three miles northeast of Dufur. It has two churches, Methodist and Adventists, and two general stores. It is situated in the midst of a rich agricultural country, and supports one store, church, school, etc. The post-office was established in April, 1894, and J. E. Barnett became postmaster. It is, evidently, a prosperous little city.

BAKEOVEN.

On Bakeoven Creek, is just south of the Sherman county line; 50 miles southeast of The Dalles and eight northwest of Shaniko. It has a postoffice, general merchandise store, a hotel and blacksmith shop. The elevation above sea level of Bakeoven is 2,200 feet.

Those who have seen the name "Bakeoven" on the map, or heard it pronounced, would be inclined to believe that it was a decidedly warm locality. Such, however, is not the case. Here is the story of its christening:

In the very early days when the settlers between The Dalles and the Canyon City mines could be counted on the fingers of one hand, and the Indians were inclined to be saucy, a Frenchman started from The Dalles with a cargo of flour for the mines. When he reached the point now known as Bakeoven he went into camp. During the night the Indians ran off with his mules. He was in a grave predicament, but did not despair. Gathering some rocks he built a stone oven, and then and there baked his cargo of flour into bread. This is the story related by old timers. But some links to this tale must be left to the imagination; for instance; he must have water and other ingredients with which to make bread that would not choke a mule. The story ends with the statement that the Frenchman sold the bread to the miners and realized a much greater profit than he would with the raw product. Old timers, to this day, will point out the blackened stones which were a part of the Frenchman's oven. Ever since this spot has been known as Bakeoven, becoming one of the early day postoffices of Wasco county.

Of this place Mr. H. C. Rooper says:

"In the early '70's Andy Swift located on the present site of Bakeoven, the meeting place of the Prineville and Canyon City stage roads, which here united into the road to The Dalles. He here built a stage house, opened a small store and secured the establishment of a postoffice which was named Bakeoven. This business was purchased by Burgess & Taylor in the early '70's. About 1877 Burgess bought his partner's interest and conducted the business there until recent years, disposing of it a few years ago."

CELILO.

With the construction of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's lines, in 1880, Celilo came into existence. It is located at the famous Celilo Falls of the Columbia, in the extreme northeastern portion of the county. Celilo is twelve miles east of The Dalles and consists mainly of a postoffice and fish-cannery. November 23, 1880, The Dalles Times said: "Though Blalock's is now the landing, and the up-river boats are moored there, yet the old town of Celilo still remains, and the long wharf-boat is still attached to the bank."

November 30th the Times added:

"Celilo not deserted—At present there are at this point 25 carloads of car material; 11,000 iron rails and about 1,400 kegs of spikes and bolts for the N. P. R. R., awaiting shipment. The car castings are now being transferred to Ainsworth, where employees of the N. P. R. R. are busily at work constructing flat and box cars. This material will all be shipped to Ainsworth so soon as the track is completed."

In 1885 The Dalles Times-Mountaineer said:

"Celilo is a historic point, but since the completion of the railroad it is a wayside station of no importance. All freight destined for the upper country had to be transferred from the cars to the boat, as this was the terminus of the portage around the dalles of the Columbia. For many years it has been used as a 'bone yard' for boats of the company."

Wrentham, named from an old town in Massachusetts, is a postoffice in the northeastern portion of Wasco county, a short distance east of Boyd. It is twelve miles southeast of The Dalles, with a semi-weekly stage from that point.

Wyeth is a station and postoffice on the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, between Cascade Locks and Hood River. It is 36 miles west of The Dalles and thirteen west of Hood River.

Mount Hood is the name of a postoffice midway between Hood River and the mountains. The postoffice was established in July, 1895, when Oscar Fridenberg became postmaster. All that remain are the store and postoffice, blacksmith shop and lumber yard. It lies about fifteen miles south of Hood River.

Viento lies twenty-nine miles west of The Dalles; a station on the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and the Columbia river. It has a saw and planing mill, one store and is accommodated with daily boats to Portland and The Dalles.

Victor is a small village thirty-seven miles south of The Dalles with a semi-weekly mail service. It is in the White River country, at the foothills of the Cascades.

On the Warm Springs Indian reservation is Simnasho postoffice, sixty miles south of The Dalles. It has a tri-weekly stage to Wapinitia and The Dalles. Sherar Bridge is a postoffice on the Des Chutes, at the mouth of White river. It lies thirty-one miles southeast of The Dalles.

Ridgeway consists of a postoffice located in a farm house and is fifteen miles southwest of Shaniko.

Friend is a postoffice in central Wasco county, west of Kingsley. It is thirty miles southwest of The Dalles. It has a United Brethren church, a blacksmith shop and there are several saw-mills in the vicinity.

West of Dufur and eleven miles south of The Dalles is the little village of Endersley, with a general store.

Menominee is a postoffice formerly known as Nicolai, on the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company and the Columbia river; thirty miles west of The Dalles, and a few miles west of Hood River.

CHAPTER IX

DESCRIPTIVE.

The boundaries of Wasco county, together with a full description of its once vast territory and subsequent frequent divisions, have been fully treated in the current history of this "Mother of Counties." It remains for us to detail its present condition, topographically, geologically and otherwise.

As has been shown, Wasco county, in the year of our Lord, 1905, is only a remnant of a once mammoth territory. It is situated on the northern boundary of the state of Oregon, a trifle west of midway between the eastern and western portions of the commonwealth. The area of the county is 2,962 square miles; it ranks eleventh in size among its sister counties; its general elevation above sea level is 1,500 feet. These are the elevations of different points within its limits: The Dalles (at the court house) 103 feet; Bake Oven, 2,200 feet; Cascade Locks, 125 feet; five miles south of the town of Hood River, 920 feet; Cloud Cap Inn (slope of Mount Hood), 7,000 feet. January 1, 1898, The Dalles Times-Mountaineer said: "Could one be suspended in mid-air above the broad expanse of country, he would view stretched before him a picture of exquisite beauty and peculiar diversification of scenery. On the west he would see the heavily timbered Cascades, with their snow-capped peaks reaching to the clouds; on the north the rolling hills and deep canyons, gradually losing themselves and terminating at the bank of the mighty Columbia; to the east a broad expanse of rolling hills and level valleys would present themselves to view, while to the south he would view an elevated plateau covered with a luxuriant growth of bunch grass and occasionally intersected by deep canyons and sharp defiles, marking the course of the Des Chutes and other streams. The picture would be grand and would inspire the one viewing it with awe."

It is no more than justice to say here that the railroad passing through eastern Oregon, and especially Wasco county, skirts along some of the worst lands—principally sand dunes and massive blocks of basaltic rock. The farming land lies a few miles to the south, where one can pass for days through cultivated fields, in the early fall ripe for the harvest and in the spring green with growing grain. The surface of the country that includes Wasco county slopes east from the Cascade range. From the summits of these mountains sweep long ridges covered with heavy growths of timber, gradually giving place to high rolling prairies peculiar to the topography of Eastern Oregon. The northern portion of the county dips toward the Columbia, where it meets the gradual slope from the other side of that stream, in Washington. This northward slope of Wasco county affords good drainage, for it is indented with numerous creeks which convert this portion of the county into the greatest naturally irrigated (the best kind) section in the United States. Each side of these beautiful streams is lined with productive farms susceptible of the highest state of cultivation and capable of the production of any crop indigenous to this latitude. The southern and eastern portions of the county are drained by the Des Chutes and John Day rivers, and their numerous tributaries. The general topography of this part of Wasco county comprises high plateaus sloping toward the water courses, terminating in beautiful valleys along these streams. Fully seventy-five per cent. of this section is susceptible of revenue-producing cultivation, especially in the line of cereals.

The western portion of the county from the summit of the Cascades range to the base is, as we have noted, covered with a heavy growth of yellow and white fir, hemlock, cedar, juniper, larch, oak and pine. The quality is fine; the quantity sufficient to supply the lumber industry for years to come. As one journeys eastward from the mountains this timber growth diminishes until it can only be found along the banks of streams; mainly cottonwood and willow. In 1902 an estimate by an expert of the amount of standing timber in Wasco county placed it at 7,100,000,000 feet. In 1904 Henry E. Reed, secretary and director of exploitation of the Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition, gave the estimate of feet of standing timber of Wasco county as 5,988,000,000.

Concerning the soil of this county Mr. B. S. Pague, in The Dalles Times-Mountaineer, of January 1, 1898, wrote as follows: "The soil is, as a rule, of very fine texture. It is a light gray soil, which darkens slightly on moistening. It is abundantly supplied with potash, but phosphoric acid is deficient. To one unacquainted with its peculiarities the soil would not be considered especially favorable, but when the present production is considered and its possible productive capacity based on its present production, it is seen that the soil possesses constituents that produce unusual, and almost phenomenal crops of cereals, fruits, hay and vegetables, and when irrigation is practiced the productive capacity is almost doubled. The soil is of such a nature as to allow of the subsoil moisture to rise to the surface, and on this fact rests the production of the wonderful crops, that with an annual precipitation of less than twenty inches would be impossible. The soil contains some lime, and humus is also found in some sections in considerable quantities."

An analysis of any agricultural section embraces three distinct lines of inquiry: the geologist tells us from what source the soil was derived; the chemist deposes as to its composition; the chief of the weather bureau exhibits the records of temperature, precipitation and average climate. It is now satisfactorily ascertained that this northwest territory at one period was submerged by tremendous overflows of lava. On every hand we see the effects of such ravages; mountain ranges composed principally of basalt; plateaus and prairies, superlatively fertile on the surface; underlaid with the same foundation. It is conceded by most eminent geologists that subsequent to the lava inundation a vast inland sea occupied the region between the Cascade range and the Rocky mountains. This sea disappeared; there remained a rich, alluvial, sedimentary soil largely consisting of decomposed basalt, plethoric in plant foods and colloquially known as "volcanic ash." Geologists affirm that this is the greatest mass of basalt in the world. The superior qualities of the soil warrant the assertion that it will sustain recropping to cereals longer than any other soil outside of certain localities in China which have been cropped for centuries. Wasco county soil yields generously even with the careless methods of cultivation pursued, and while not every season a full crop is harvested, such a thing as a total failure is, so far, unknown. Professor G. W. Shaw, of the Oregon State Agricultural College, furnishes some data of the component parts of the soil of Oregon which shows that of the eastern part of the state to be superior to that west of the Cascade range, and equal, in material required to make it productive and durable, to the soil of any other locality in the United States. Following is an extract from his writings:

The soil of Oregon, like all soils of volcanic origin, is of unsurpassed fertility. The greater portion of it is derived from a basalt which differs from most rocks in that it contains the fertilizing ingredients of a combination of rocks. This basalt is a complex mineral, very dark in color, exceedingly hard and quite heavy. Mineralogically it is made up of a plagioclase, augite, and olivenite. It nearly always contains more or less magnetic iron ore and other minerals. Chemically it contains silica, lime, potash, soda, magnesia and alumina. The augite not infrequently carries phosphoric anhydrite occurring in a crystalline form as apatite.

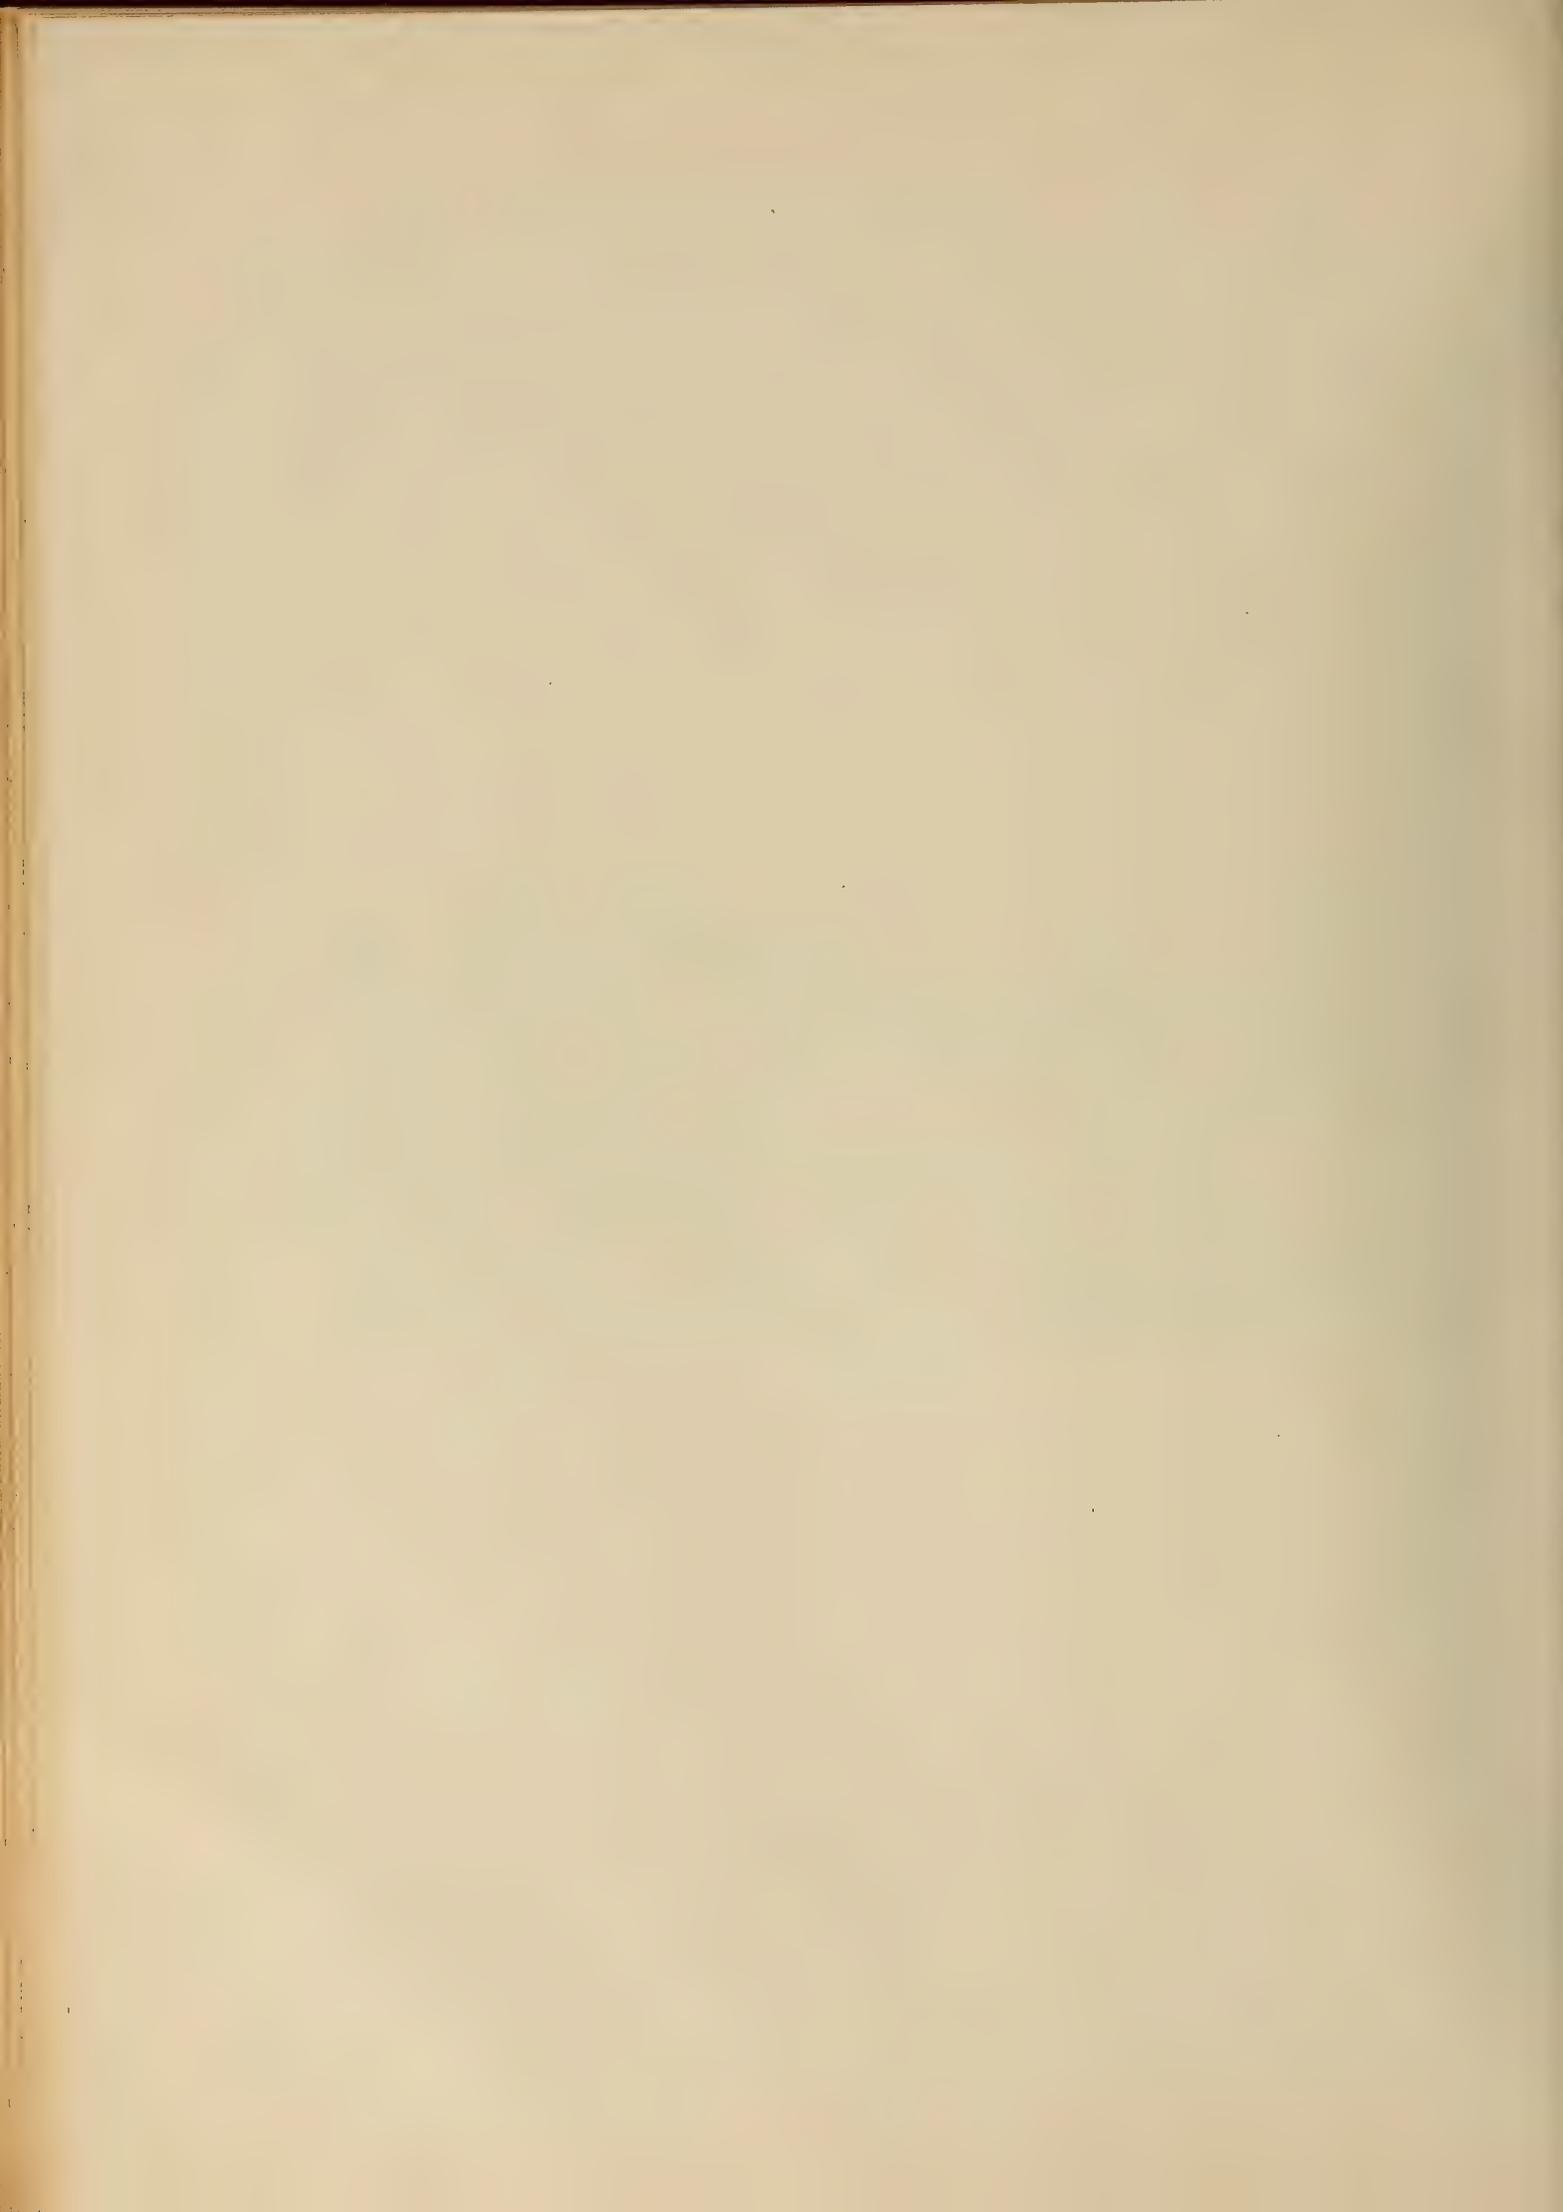

The chemical composition of the basalt explains the transformation which a little more moisture affects in the apparently barren soil of the eastern portion of the state. In that section land seemingly worthless becomes very productive when supplied with the necessary water. Analysis of two typical soils of the state will serve to show the component physical parts. Soil 1 is from The Dalles in Eastern Oregon and represents a large extent of territory. Soil 2 is very common in the Willamette Valley in Western Oregon, taken from foot hills south of Eugene:

Soil	No. 1.	No. 2.
Coarse sand .....	30.4	80.2
Sand .....	24.0	2.5
Fine sand .....	12.2	3.0
Silt, or clay .....	33.4	14.0

The remainder of the mineral matter in the soil, not amounting to more than five pounds in 100 of soil, consists of chemical compound of lime, potash, soda, Magnesia, iron, albuminum, chloride, salicic acid, phosphoric acid, sulphuric acid, nitric acid and carbonic acid and water in varying proportions. It is the compound of these substances that constitutes the plant food in the soil. The acids are united with the bases to form the salts, which occur as chlorides and silicates of potassium and sodium, calcium, magnesia and ammonium and, probably, salts of soda, potash and lime, and certain vegetable acids. There are only three of these—lime, phosphoric acid and potash—which, as a rule, require attention, so far as deficiency of plant food is concerned, for the other mineral substances are furnished in abundance by natural agencies. The soluble portion only of the material being used by the plant for food. It is these substances that invite attention. What constitutes a sufficiency of these materials for successfully growing a crop will differ with the nature of the crop and the physical condition of the soil. The minimum per centage for the growth of general crops is given by Professor Hilgard, than whom no one is more competent to judge, as follows:

"Lime—0.10 per cent in the highest sandy soil; 0.25 per cent in clay loams; 0.30 per cent in heavy clay soil; and it may rise with advantage to 1 or 2 per cent. The indication is that 0.80 per cent is a fair average for soil of the Willamette Valley.

"Phosphoric acid—In sandy loams, 0.10 per cent, when accompanied by a good supply of lime. The maximum found in the best Mississippi table lands was 0.25 per cent; in the best bottom land of the same region 0.30 per cent. This ingredient is, according to the California Experiment Station report for 1888, more abundant in the soils of Oregon than in the soils of California. In the basaltic soils it may run as high as 0.30 per cent or more.

"Potash—The per centage of heavy clay upland soil and clay loams ranges from about 0.8 to 0.5; lighter loams from 0.45 to 0.30; sandy loams below 0.10, consistent with good productiveness and durability. Virgin soil with a less per centage than 0.6 is deficient, and virgin soil having 0.50 per cent or over will not warrant first on that side of mineral plant food, and much less will suffice in the presence of much lime and humus.

"Sulphuric acid—In the best soils this ingredient is slight; 0.02 per cent is adequate, but it frequently rises to 0.10 per cent.

"Iron—Professor Hilgard put 1.5 to 4.0 as the ordinary per centage of ferric oxide in soils but little tinted; ordinary loams from 3.5 to 7.0; highly colored red lands, 7 to 12 and sometimes upwards of 20.

"Humus—This is the storehouse of nitrogen supply, and its determination serves as a measure of the nitrogen. In oak uplands of the cotton states the range is usually between 0.70 per cent and 0.80 per cent; in the poorer sandy soils from 0.40 per cent to 0.50 per cent; in black calcareous soils 1.02 to 2.80 per cent."

The appearance of soils in Eastern Oregon is altogether different from those of the western portion of the state. By far the larger part is of a gray, ashy appearance, and one coming from the darker soils of the eastern states would be unfavorably impressed. Experience, however, teaches that these soils are abundantly supplied with plant food, and analysis shows that they are probably the most fertile soils of the state. The wonderful fertility of these soils is shown in their enormous yields of crops from year to year. The soil is exceedingly deep in most localities and of such a texture as to be easily worked. The difference in composition between the soil of eastern and western Oregon is well shown by the following table, giving the averages of a considerable number of analyses:

	Willamette Valley.	Eastern Oregon.

An examination of this table in the light of the principles laid down above, will be of interest. It will be noted that the soils of Eastern Oregon are very rich in potash, richer than those of the Willamette Valley, but poorer in phosphoric acid. The lime content of the soil east of the mountains is nearly three times that of the western area. In view of the exceptionally good supply of potash, augmented by an abundance of lime, it appears that these soils will not wear out first on the side of potash. The humus per centage seems to be a little lower than in the humid part of the state, as would be expected, but recent investigations indicate that the humus of the arid regions carry nearly three times as much nitrogen as those of humid areas. If this be true of the soils of this state as of other localities of limited rainfall, and it doubtless is, there is certainly more nitrogen present in the Eastern Oregon soils than in those of Western Oregon.

The soil of Eastern Oregon is quite uniform; what applies to the entire country applies with equal weight to each section. Professor Shaw's description of Eastern Oregon applies appropriately to Wasco county.

It may, also, be added that what may be truthfully said of the climate of Eastern Oregon applies with equal significance to Wasco. The mean temperature of Wasco and Sherman counties is 49 to 52 degrees. As a rule the mean temperature decreases with distance from the Columbia river and with elevation. The mean winter temperature, December-February, is from 31 to 36 degrees; the summer, June-August, is from 58 to 73 degrees. The mean of the highest temperature during the year ranges from 56 to 62 degrees, and of the lowest from 40 to 42 degrees. The mean of the lowest temperature is below the freezing point (32 degrees) during December, January and February; during the heat of summer the lowest temperature which occurs, as a rule about sunrise, ranges from 55 to 58 degrees along the rivers and lower, dependent upon the elevation.

The highest temperature during the heat of summer is from 98 to 105 degrees, extending from May to October; during the winter the lowest temperatures are from 1 to 19 degrees below zero, extending from December to March, inclusive. With the exceptions of the higher elevations temperature below zero does not occur every season. The maximum temperature during the winter season always, for a month, averages above the freezing point. The climate of Wasco county is not rigorous as might be hastily concluded from the wide range of maximum and minimum temperatures. Of exceeding short duration is any "cold spell" of winter weather; the heat of summer is not oppressive; seldom uncomfortable. Sunstrokes—termed in the eastern states "prostrations"—are unknown. There is little humidity in the air, especially during the warmer portions of the year. Rapid evaporation is produced by the dryness of the atmosphere. Comparatively cool are the nights during the summer months, or growing season. Yet they are, along the Columbia river, the warmest in the Pacific Northwest. Winters are short and not unusually severe.

The precipitation of Eastern Oregon occurs principally between October and April, and the same is true of Wasco and Sherman counties. At Cascade Locks, over an area of a few miles, the annual precipitation is 80 inches. Local causes produce this large quantity of rainfall; to the eastward it decreases mile by mile; at Hood River 38 inches annually occurs, while at The Dalles, only 45 miles from the locks, the annual amount is 15 inches. Thus the precipitation steadily decreases from the Cascades through Wasco and Sherman counties, and on to Arlington, Gilliam county, where but 9 inches annually occur. An annual rainfall of less than 20 inches occurs over the greater portion of Wasco and Sherman counties from November 1st to April 1st. But there is an increase of rainfall in Sherman county as compared with the amount at The Dalles. The cause of this local increase is the topography of the country east of Sherman county. Showers occur from April to July, the total for any one month seldom exceeding one inch. During July and August an occasional thunder storm prevails; otherwise this is a rare phenomenon, and there is seldom sufficient rainfall to lay the dust; the average for July and August combined is only 0.29 of an inch over the greater portions of both counties. In varying depths snow falls from November 15th to March 15th. During exceptional winters the total will amount to several feet. In the southern and western portions of Wasco county the snow fall is heavier than in any other part of the county. Snow, owing to the prevalence of Chinook winds, seldom remains on the ground for a long period. These warm winds occur at various intervals, usually following a cold period; they quickly reduce the snow and clear the range for cattle feed.

Wasco county has one of the largest, most complete and accurate weather reports ever made in the state of Oregon. The first record was made by the United States Hospital Corps at old Fort Dalles, commencing in 1850 and continuing quite regularly until 1867. In 1874 Mr. Samuel L. Brooks, of The Dalles, began making meteorological records which he yet continues. Without his valuable record but little information could be given concerning the climate of these counties. From the report of the hospital corps we shall give only the averages of mean temperature and precipitation for the years from 1853 to 1865, following this with Mr. Brooks' report from 1876 to 1904:

In recapitulation of the above Mr. Brooks presents the following record for the period between January, 1875, and April, 1904, at The Dalles:

Mean annual temperature, 52 degrees; mean maximum, 62 degrees; absolute, 1.08 degrees. Mean annual precipitation, 15.4 inches, divided into seasons as follows: Spring, 2.6; summer, 0.9; fall, 4.1; winter, 7.8. Average number of days with fog, 3; average number with hail, 2; average number with snow, 12; average number with thunderstorms, 4. In January, 1905, Mr. Brooks figured the mean annual temperature for the past thirty years, and found it to be 53.3 degrees.

Following is a record of the winter weather at Hood River from 1854 to 1872, inclusive, from a diary kept by Nathaniel Coe, deceased. There is a difference of about five degrees in the thermometer between Hood River and The Dalles, the latter place being that much colder. As a general rule there is more snow at Hood River:

*Total fall.

Unlike other portions of Eastern Oregon Wasco is not a county of big farms, not as "big farms" are understood west of the Missouri. True, it has a few ranches covering from 1,000 to 5,000 acres; as a rule land is owned in tracts from 20 to 160 acres. The familiar bit of melody,

"A little farm well tilled,
A little barn well filled, Give me,"

is peculiarly appropriate to the agriculturists of Wasco county. And in sections convenient to transportation lines it has been demonstrated that the small farm well cultivated is far more profitable than the large one poorly tilled. Especially is this true in the vicinity of The Dalles and Hood River. Small farming is remunerative because both climate and soil is especially adapted to growing fruits and vegetables. For all descriptions of vegetables and small fruits Portland supplies a ready market. So important has become the industries of fruit and market gardening that the larger tracts are being subdivided into 10, 20 and 40 acre lots. Places of 160 acres on which a few years ago only one family subsisted at present support from four to eight thrifty families.

Under proper and judicious cultivation everything that can be grown in the temperate zone can be successfully raised here. Wheat, oats, rye, barley, potatoes and vegetables yield abundant crops on the high lands without irrigation; the creek bottoms or valley lands are especially adapted to the production of timothy, clover and alfalfa. Wheat, however, is the staple crop of the country and the average annual yield is about 15 bushels per acre, although fifty bushels have been harvested in some localities. Throughout the northern portion of the county the soil and climate are especially adapted to the cultivation of fruit and vegetables. For the export market the farmers raise large quantities of cabbage, potatoes, egg plant, celery and tomatoes. The best of these markets are Seattle, Tacoma, Portland and Spokane; some of this produce goes as far distant as Butte, Montana. Fruits that have proved the most profitable in Wasco county are apples, pears, prunes, plums, grapes and cherries; a majority of the hill land sloping toward the north has been found especially healthy and yields abundant crops of the choicest fruits. No little attention has been given to the cultivation of strawberries, especially in the Hood River valley. The fame of the "Oregon seedling," the favorite fruit in eastern markets is world-wide. These berries are two weeks earlier from the time of blossoming than any others produced in the United States. Aside from being a vast orchard for other kinds of fruits the Hood River valley is noted for its bounteous production of strawberries. The business first assumed importance in 1893, when 4,000 crates were marketed. Each year since then there has been a gradual increase in production until 1902 when 60,000 crates, or over 100 carloads were gathered from about 450 acres of land. The net yield to the growers for this crop was $125,000. The season's crop of 1904 fully assured the permanency of the strawberry business, as the quantity grown fell far short of supplying the demand. This impossibility to meet the increasing eastern demand for the fruit has been the case each year since the beginning of the industry. An average acre of strawberries yields 150 crates each year for from four to seven consecutive seasons, which at an average net income of $2 a crate, gives the grower an income of $300 an acre. The cost of picking and packing is sixty-five cents a crate, of $97.50 per acre of berries, leaving $202.50 for the land and cost of cultivation. The average price for strawberries for the past three years has been about $2 a crate.

Strawberries need no mulching here as the ground never freezes enough to do them any harm. No spot in Hood River valley has ever been treated which will not produce fine strawberries, and the shipping season lasts more than two months with but one variety. Quite a number of carloads are shipped to Winnipeg, Duluth, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Fargo, North Dakota, Sioux City, Des Moines, Omaha, Kansas City, Denver, Lincoln, Helena, Butte and Great Falls, and orders have been received from many other cities which could not be supplied.

Ideal conditions for the growth of peaches are found along the Columbia, Des Chutes and John Day Rivers, and while these sections are now taking rank as the first peach-growing localities of Oregon, it will be only a few years until these two counties, Wasco and Sherman, will hold a leading place in the markets of the Pacific coast. On the slopes of Mount Hood almost to the snow line, apples grow to perfection and an excellent champagne grape can be profitably produced. In the valley immense crops of hay are cut, especially on irrigated lands. Wasco is noted for the diversity of its crops, while Sherman county is almost an exclusively wheat producing locality. In the Woman's Edition of The Dalles Times-Mountaineer of May 17, 1898, the following description of general fruit cultivation in Wasco county was written by Charlotte F. Roberts:

The history of the first trees planted is a leaf from the annals of these pioneers. With the exception of the orchard planted in the Walla Walla Valley, the trees planted at The Dalles and vicinity were the forerunners of all the orchards that were subsequently planted from the Cascades to the Mississippi valley.

The government owned a military reservation five miles square along the Columbia at The Dalles, Indians were hostile and the early comers did not make permanent settlements of land until after the reservation was cut down. Judge Laughlin after making futile attempts at building a home at Crate's Point and Hood River, leased land from the military reservation the spring of 1853, but in a few days the military reservation was cut down when he filed upon it as his donation. Here he began his permanent home, planted a garden and the next spring set out his fruit trees. By 1857 the trees had grown remarkably, so that one of Justin Chenowith's small boys thought one tree of right size to fell and chopped it down.

The place two miles west of The Dalles, now owned by George Snipes, was planted in trees in 1854 by Dr. Shaug, of the military reservation. A locust tree planted there still lives. Also some of these first apple and cherry trees still bear. While Mr. Snipes was away in the Indian war a man who had been in his employ and held some grudge against him chopped down rows of this valuable orchard. John Marden tells of eating apples from it in 1858. At the forks of Five-Mile and Eight-Mile creeks another permanent donation was begun by Nathan Olney in 1854. He planted apple trees of only the best varieties bought from the Walling nursery in Portland.

On Mill creek Charles W. Denton settled in the fall of 1853. He ordered trees from Knapp & Dwight, of Brooklyn, New York. When they arrived most of them were dead, the effects of their long journey via the Isthmus. From the live ones he planted a few apple trees and grape vines. He shows today an immense grape vine, a souvenir of those then planted. The next year he set out several hundred grafts from a nursery. His place was a favorite camping ground for the Indians. When the war broke out he went as a government scout. On his return in 1857 he found only a few trees from his nursery left to tell the tale. Each of these places boast of owning the oldest trees in Wasco county but they must give precedence to an apple tree in the government gardens, the Academy grounds, which was planted from a seed in 1850, brought by one of the soldiers from the east. The apples would never get ripe because the boys would steal them while green. It was here, too, that Judge Laughlin raised the first water melons in 1851.

Mrs. Lord tells the following of the first apples she saw in Oregon; "In the spring of 1854 Mr. McCormack, a brother of Mrs. Henry Cates, went to Portland and brought back two small apples for the three Laughlin children. In lieu of the third apple he gave the third child one dollar. The child's grief and jealousy over the loss of those wonderful apples was such that the mother cut the two apples equally among the five members of the family and the child's heart was soothed." Nothing since has ever tasted so good. When an apple was given away it was in this manner: "I will give you an apple if you will give me back the seeds." The apples bought in Portland were twenty-five cents a piece. When the first fruit began to be raised here it sold from fifteen to twenty cents a pound. On Three-Mile creek Green Arnold owned a donation claim, now the Whitney place, and in 1857 planted trees from A. W. Denton's nursery. These first orchards were apple, pear and cherry; it was not then certain that peach trees would live.

The first farm on Fifteen-Mile creek was owned by Mr. Alsoph in 1850. In June of that year the frost cut down his melons and corn and he abandoned it. In 1852 Mr. Lou Henderson entered it as a donation. It proved valuable as a hay ranch but several years passed by before trees were planted. In 1856 Mr. Crooks bought out Woodward and Reynolds just above Dufur and in 1856 he planted the first orchard on Fifteen-Mile creek. The same year Mr. Herbert bought Mr. Marsh's right where Dufur now stands and the next year planted his young orchard. Mr. Mays bought his first place—The Mountain Ranch—from an old bachelor who had planted apple seeds as a start for his orchard. From this seedling orchard Mr. Mays saved a few of the best for his future use and planted others better. In 1862 they bought a place at the Tygh from Mr. Herbert, who had already planted another orchard. At the Tygh a Frenchman of the Hudson's Bay Company, Jondreaux by name, planted trees in 1858. These came from the Denton nursery. This was afterward the Jeffries place. Also a Mr. McDuffy planted trees in 1859. On the Des Chutes a Mr. William Nixon, in 1859, planted an orchard afterward the Gordon place.

The oldest orchard at the Cascades was planted by Colonel N. H. Gates. At Hood River Hon. Nathaniel Coe was the pioneer orchardist in 1853. He was an educated horticulturist. A delicious plum, "Coe's golden drop," attested his ability to produce new varieties. Few orchards today are laid out with greater care or beauty. When they came into bearing fruit was so scarce that they had to net their trees to keep the fruit away from the birds. This history would be incomplete if we left out the old pioneers—the Joslyns—who settled at White Salmon, Washington, in 1853. They immediately began the beautiful home, which is crowded so full of happy memories in the minds of old timers. In 1856 they were obliged to leave their home on account of the Indian war and when they returned in 1859 it was to find their home burned and their orchard entirely destroyed. They reset from the Coe nursery and many are the boxes of apples, pears, cherries and plums sent to The Dalles friends and market.

The close of the Indian war marks a change in donation claims. Many new farms were taken and new ones planted in orchards. Thus we find the Boltons, Menefees, Logans, Rices, Walkers, Ruddos on Fifteen Mile; Theodore Mesplie, Lafayette Caldwell, M. M. Cushing, John Moran on Mill Creek; Captain Danragh on Three Mile; where Elder Fisher afterward bought; Brownlees at Three Mile crossing; Bush-tree on the Floyd place; Brown and Marshbank at the R. S. Thompson place; Talbot Low on the Frizzell place; George Snipes on his lower ranch at Rowena; John Irvine at Chenowith creek; Mr. Curtis across the river; Jim and Nate Benson and John Marden at Hood River; J. H. Mosier at Mosier Creek; Colonel Fulton and Z. Donnell at Ten Mile creek, Butlers and Shamrocks at the Tygh.

In 1862 The Dalles had the following homes with bearing fruit trees and small fruits in their yards. The Lawrence Coe place, now the George Ruch and Congregational church property; Mr. Graves in the same block, now the William Condon and McGee property, and the Juker place, between the two; the Humason home, now the residence of William P. Lord; the Vic Trevitt place, now E. Shanno's; the Laughlin home and the Buchanan place; the lot now occupied by Colonel Lang's family had a few trees and a vine-covered house. In 1861 Elder Fisher bought out Captain Derrah and the following spring began the orchard and nursery which held so prominent a place in The Dalles markets for a number of years. He, too, was an educated horticulturist and florist. It was a rich treat to be a guest in that home and enjoy the fruit and flowers. It was his purpose to have the finest pear orchard in the state.

It will be noticed that up to this time the orchards were planted on Creek bottoms or springy lands. Elder Fisher held the belief that fruit would do as well on dry land as on moist, and planted a few trees and vines as an experiment. The most desirable creek farms had been taken. People wanted homes. Miles upon miles of rich, fertile government land lay untouched because "fruits and vegetables will not grow without water," said the old timers. In 1854 Caleb Brooks settled on dry land, one mile south of The Dalles in Dry Hollow—renamed Amberdale. He planted a few trees in the valley, thinking to protect them from the winds and cold, thus making practical what Elder Fisher had before experimented upon. As men rode over the hills for their stock they reasoned thus: The natural growth of vegetation on these hills is as luxuriant as on the creek bottoms; cold and heat are not so intense; frost is seen earlier and oftener on the creek bottoms than on these hills. Why should not cereals, vegetables and trees do as well? Especially when under cultivation. The fall of 1868 Rev. E. P. Roberts settled in Amberdale and the following year Robert Cooper came as a pioneer in the same undertaking, making homes and raising fruit on dry, up-hill lands. The spring of 1872 saw the first trees planted on top of a hill by Mr. Roberts. It afterward proved the orchard most secure against frost. It bore peaches one year when the entire peach crop grown elsewhere in the region was destroyed by frost. As is the case when men try something before considered impracticable, these men were the butt of many a jest and sarcasm. H. J. Waldron, a prominent citizen of The Dalles, said: "Roberts, I will have a large bust cast of you for your grandchildren if you succeed in making a living on that dry land." Not only were trees planted on top of the hill, but corn, potatoes and watermelons, also. This was going farther than any one had dared to think, for "watermelons must be irrigated."

To raise fruits for the home market was all that any farmer attempted. The Columbia river steamers with their high freights, and the pack animals to the mines were the only means of transportation. When the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's line of road was completed, an impetus was given to the fruit industry and the population of The Dalles increased for home consumption, and a market opened to Portland and the east. To the Seufert Brothers belongs the honor of making fruit shipment a possibility to the farmers. Here begins a new chapter in the history of fruit raising. The few orchards that had been previously planted gave such evidences of good results that many were induced to set more largely. Red winter apples and strawberries were especially planted in the Hood River valley. When the Indian owned the country and hunted, fished and gathered "olallies," the Hood River valley was his finest strawberry patch, and when the white man came he, too, gathered them in their wild luxuriance. At first only sufficient quantity was planted for the household and local markets. Before 1889 berries had been shipped to The Dalles and Portland markets, but in that year shipments were made to Montana points as an experiment. The returns were so flattering that larger patches were planted, and in 1890 a few hundred crates, of 24 pounds each were shipped. When the shipments reached 2,000 crates, growers began to fear the market would be overstocked and hesitated about enlarging their patches. They could not understand where all the berries went, nor that their berries would stand shipment to such markets as now take them. This accounts for the comparatively slow rate of increase in shipments, but in 1894, when 16,000 crates were shipped, and as much as two carloads were being sent every day, and telegrams from Omaha, Kansas City, St. Paul and Chicago were demanding them in carload lots, the possibilities of the market began to be realized. At the Columbian Exposition at Chicago the Clark's Seedling, grown here, took the premium over all other strawberries, even though they had been in the express car four days and had traveled 2,000 miles. While the cultivation of strawberries could be carried on to the base of Mount Hood, since they are found here in their native state, the farmers have found that at present distance must be taken into consideration in hauling the berries for shipment. But the apple crop in the upper valley is as satisfactory as the strawberry crop in the lower valley. At the district fairs, the Mechanic's fair, the Columbian Exposition, the fruit of Wasco county—Hood River apples in particular—have taken the highest rewards. Their size, splendid coloring, rich flavor, freedom from the fruit moth, and unsurpassed keeping and shipping qualities can not be excelled in any other known locality of the civilized world. In June, 1894, as an experiment, Mr. Shanno sent a few boxes of yellow Newton pippins to London, via Cape Horn. After their eight months' storage before shipping, and five months en route, they arrived in good condition.

The sandy soil along the Columbia requires fertilizers and irrigation, but are somewhat earlier with their crops. One of the most notable of the orchards of this class of soil is that owned by the Seufert Brothers, two miles east of The Dalles. It consists of cherries, prunes, pears and peaches and contains about forty acres. Ten years ago it was a tract of drifting sand dunes, but for six years it has been bearing abundantly, and yielding handsome returns. The cherries are particularly fine, the peaches will equal in size anything California ever produced, and in flavor rival those of New Jersey and Delaware.

Bartlett pears have not proved a success in shipping.

They ripen as the California crop is closing and the eastern markets are full. No finer fruit for canning is raised than the Bartlett pear, and to meet this emergency as well as to dispose of the many tons of other fruits just right to can, but too ripe to ship, the fruit raisers of Wasco county are in sore need of two canneries; one at Hood River to meet any strawberry emergency and other fruits, and another at The Dalles.

The geologist, the chemist, the reports from the weather bureau, the pioneer orchardist, the progressive fruit-raiser of today, and prices quoted in eastern markets for Wasco county fruits, have all proven that from the Cascade Mountains eastward along the Columbia river, from the base of Mount Hood to the Des Chutes and Columbia rivers, is a country unsurpassed in fertility and climate for successful raising and shipping of all kinds of large and small fruits—black-cap raspberries, apples, pears, prunes, plums, cherries and peaches.

In a recent issue of the Hood River Glacier the following appeared:

"Truman Butler, of Butler & Company, bankers, tells a good story that is significant of the world-wide fame Hood River apples have attained. The tale was told to Mr. Butler by Frederick Fisher, of the Fisher-Thorsen Paint Company. Mr. Fisher is just home from Europe where he studied under some of the best portrait artists of the land.

"One day last winter Fisher was walking the streets of Hamburg, and desiring some fruit stepped into a stand and asked the dealer to give him some good apples—the best he had in stock. 'Here are some of the best apples in the world,' replied the fruit dealer, as he handed out a sample of the big, red Spitzenbergs, so familiar to an Oregonian. 'These apples were raised in America,' went on the fruit man. 'They call them Hood River apples, and I can truthfully say that they are the best apples to be found in Europe.'"

Well-deserved mention should be made of the wild flowers in the vicinity of The Dalles and throughout Wasco county. First to make its appearance is the little Erigenia, or Irish potatoe, as the children call it, which peeps out of the ground so early as January, if wooed by a few warm days. It has a delicate, heliotrope odor. The Golden Stars, fitly named, come next, and they fleck the hillsides with paths of sunshine; then Purple-eyed Grass (the sisysincgrium) with its purple companion, the little Fritillaria, proclaims that spring has really burst the bonds of winter. Then follow a constant succession of wild flowers until Jack Frost again resumes his sway over the flowery kingdom. Golden Erythroniums (Rock Lillies), Crow's Foot (low-growing buttercups), Larkspurs, Peonies and Lupins of all shades, varying through the blues from deepest purple to white, also pink and yellow ones, while underneath all is an infinite variety of smaller flowers, too small to attract attention of the casual passer by, yet when examined show a wonderful beauty. Among the shrubs come first the Oregon Grape, Service Berry, Wild Cherry, Yellow Currant Sprig, the Ocean Spray and its near cousin with the Indian name of Shushula, bearing long successions of delicate, lilac-colored blossoms. The two last are spiraeas, and well deserve a place in the flower catalogues, as they are far superior to many of the shrubs sold. On the creeks are the lovely wild roses and White Clematis. These are all found in a short walk around The Dalles or Hood River. Midsummer brings up Painted Cup in fiery glow; Penstemons and many others of the Lebriate family, with crowds of the Compositae family, headed by the sweet-scented prairie sunflower.

Stock raising was the sole industry during the early settlement of Wasco county. It yet remains an important resource. South of the Des Chutes river nearly the entire section is devoted to sheep and cattle raising. Animals were pastured the year round for many seasons, the luxuriant growth of natural grass being amply sufficient to provide them feed both winter and summer. But as the flocks increased in size it became necessary to provide artificial feed for the winter months. Therefore thousands of tons of hay are annually put up in the stock country as a safeguard against severe storms and deep snows. While at present wheat raising is the leading industry, sheep and cattle come next; the source of vast amounts of money coming each year into the country.

Concerning the fish industry of Wasco county the Times Mountaineer in 1898 said: "The Dalles has always been noted for its superb salmon fisheries. Little attention was paid to them until 1883, when considerable capital was invested in developing them. The industry has flourished. Several canneries have been constructed at different points along the river, and numbers of fish wheels are operated, catching large quantities each season. The business has grown to great proportions, and now constitutes one of the most important industries."

The next year the same paper added the following:

The run of salmon in the middle river—from the upper Cascades to The Dalles—has always been enormous. During the visit of George Francis Train, in 1868, he wired to eastern papers that, at the rapids above the city he saw "a million salmon within a stone's throw." This may appear somewhat Munchausen-like, but it will not sound extravagant to any who visited the place a few years ago, before fishing wheels had been introduced. The treaty with the Indians did not expire until recently, and since that time this industry has wonderfully developed. The salmon export has been very lucrative during the past few years, both in cans and in bulk. The Rockfield Canning Company, about three miles east, employs nearly a hundred men during the season, and ships large quantities of canned salmon to eastern points. These fish are of excellent flavor and command ready sale. On both banks of the Columbia, near this point, are a number of fishing wheels whose season's catch is usually sold to the canning company, but a large quantity is shipped in refrigerating cars by local merchants to eastern markets. Salmon caught near The Dalles form a savory dish for epicureans in New York, Chicago and other cities. The industry will yet admit of further development and one or more canneries could receive a supply of fish from these and neighboring waters. The number of salmon does not appear to be at all diminished notwithstanding the quantity taken from the river each year. The salmon find their way into the upper waters of all our great streams and have been caught as far in the interior as the Clearwater in the Bitter Root Mountains. The salmon trout which are found in the mountain streams are, evidently, from spawn left there by the parent fish. These make most delicious eating and would furnish a princely banquet. Sturgeon abound in the Columbia and these are sold in the local markets and elsewhere.

Hood River is unique among the lesser valleys of Oregon. It stretches away from the base of Mount Hood to the Columbia river; on the north, a distance of some twenty-five miles. A range of partly open and partly timbered hills forms a barrier to those winds which sweep the plains of the interior, dry and consuming in summer; correspondingly cold in winter. On the west the rugged flanks of the Cascade mountains rise by successive ridges—rude, gigantic terraces—to the crest of the range. An unlimited supply of the purest water is drawn from these mountain enclosures; they contribute to the production of the equitable temperature for which this valley is noted.

Simply an impetuous, vociferous mountain stream is Hood River. It receives all the drainage of the east and north slopes of Mount Hood; at all seasons it carries a large volume of water. As the average descent of this river is not less than fifty feet to the mile its available water-power is, practically, unlimited. It is a beautiful valley, that of Hood River. From the heart of the Cascades it sweeps through the undulating slopes to lose itself in the voracious maw of the Columbia—that mighty reservoir of countless streams and runlets. Where it mingles its contribution to this river it is only fifty feet above tide water. From three to five miles wide is its valley proper. In the Woman's edition of the Times-Mountaineer of May 17, 1898, Mrs. J. H. Cradlebaugh graphically wrote:

The gentle slopes that bound it rise, at first almost imperceptibly, growing gradually more and more inclined until the line of demarkation between valley and mountain can not be determined. Starting from the Columbia, almost at tide-water, one can drive for twenty odd miles due south and then only realize that the valley has been left behind when the snow-line of Mount Hood is but a half dozen miles away. Nature was in her happiest mood when she designed it, and evidently intended it as the especial property of her lovely daughters, Flora and Pomona.

To the north Mount Adams, distant thirty miles, lifts its snowy dome to the skies, while the Columbia pours its cerulean tide ever past on its way to the Pacific. To the south Hood pierces the summer sky with its snowy minaret, while on the east and west the evergreen forests lift terrace on terrace until the green shades into a purple, and then a misty blue, that meets and blends with the azure of the sky. Hood River, a typical mountain stream, winds its way from the glaciers of Mount Hood to the noisy Columbia, with its message from mountain to river. Majestic oaks, each fit abiding place for a laughing Dryad, gnarled of bole, rugged limbed and glossy leaved, dot the hillsides and send their long branches protectingly over trail and road. The grassy slopes show a brighter green by comparison with the thousand wild flowers scattered by nature's hand in patterns too intricate for mortal ken. The violet peeps demurely through the green curtains of the sward, buttercup and spring beauties lift their yellow and pink blossoms from the long grass, the wild rose, bolder, flirts with butterfly and bee, blushing anon at her deceitfulness, and the wanton honeysuckle twines her tendrils caressingly on anything within reach, and pours from all her gold-lined chalices intoxicating perfumes on the wing of every vagrant breeze. The dog-wood opens its green-white petals, a delight to the eye, and on the hillsides the rhododendron flashes a crimson flame, as bright as that in the bush which Moses saw as he herded the flocks of the Midian priest in Egypt. * * * The roads are perfect; the wheelman's paradise. But why attempt to describe it? Some future Goldsmith may do it in flowing verse. Some painter, yet unknown to fame, may here find inspiration, but the unpoetic pencil can but conceal the beauties it most would show. To be appreciated it must be seen, and just now it is at its loveliest. Spend a day there in May or June, see, feel, realize, and then tell if you can.

A distance of twenty odd miles down the Columbia is the region of country known as Hood River. Steep and rugged are the banks until they terminate in elevated table lands. With handsome farms and residences these are dotted. As a superior health resort Hood River has gained an enviable reputation. The atmosphere is invigorating, the water crystalline and pure. The soil on the table lands is of a gravelly, sandy character; with irrigation it produces the finest crops. On the flats near the river the soil is rich and loamy, susceptible of any stage of cultivation. The principal settlement is four miles from the river, on a semi-circle plateau fringed on all sides by hills.

South and west of the valley the mountains are covered with a heavy growth of timber. A company has been formed to clear the channel of Hood River of obstructions, thus rendering it possible to drive logs and timber from the forests that line its banks, and those of its tributaries, to the mouth, where they may be available for the mills and for transportation. There are, in the valley, three large lumbering mills. This lumber is flumed to a point on the Columbia river, three miles west of town, where shipping facilities are had, and where a planing mill is kept in operation, furnishing labor to a large number of men. There are, also, three other sawmills which operate in the valley for local trade; one at Tucker, five miles south of town; the Harbison Brothers' mill, on Neal creek, five miles southeast of town, and the other, known as the Tomlinson Brothers' mill, located in the Mount Hood settlement.

Hood River visitors in search of pleasure as well as health, will find little difficulty in passing their allotted time most agreeably. Any part of the country is easily accessible by means of existing routes of travel, by boat, railway or well-traveled roads over which driving is a favorite recreation. The sportsman will find abundant material upon which to practice his skill. For the angler fishing affords unrivaled sport. Sailing, driving, horseback riding and other outdoor forms of exercise are feasible during a greater part of the year. Proverbially excellent is the climate of Hood River. Even in the "heated term" the nights are deliciously cool, insuring sleep and rest. Neither long nor severe are the winters.

The receipts for Hood River crops for the year 1904 were about $275,000. It may be proper to remark here that Hood River received at the St. Louis Exposition two gold medals for their fruit exhibit, and that Wasco is the only county in the United States that received a grand prize for a fruit exhibit. The strawberry crop of Hood River valley for 1903 sold for $148,500. There were shipped 90,000 crates and they were sold at an average price of $1.65 per crate.

What is known as Lower Fifteen Mile creek embraces some of the choicest localities in Wasco county. Its natural advantages are a finely watered country, near and easy access to timber and a fine fruit producing country. It is, also, in close proximity to The Dalles. The surface of this part of the county is quite broken, yet by far the larger portion of it can be cultivated to advantage.

Tygh Ridge is a high tract of prairie land lying north of Tygh valley at an elevation above the valley of about a thousand feet. Its northern boundary is about twenty miles south of The Dalles. It stretches from the timber line of the Cascade mountains on the west to the Des Chutes river on the east, a distance of about twelve miles. Its breadth may be roughly estimated at about seven miles. A like estimate will give about 30,000 acres in cultivation. The Tygh ridge, beyond all question comprises the richest section of bunch grass land in all eastern Oregon. The soil is a rich clay loam, varying in color from a reddish brown to nearly black, and in depth from six to fifteen feet. Like the soil of all that great region lying between the Cascades and the Rocky mountains, it is the produce of decayed volcanic rock; but the soil of Tygh ridge differs from much of the surrounding neighborhood. It is darker in color, is of a more clayey texture, and has less the appearance and character of volcanic ashes. The subsoil is of like character, and varies little in color through all its depth, and the whole rests upon a bed of solid basalt rock. Hence the most remarkable property of this soil, next to its amazing fertility, is its power of retaining moisture.

The deep canyon of White River on the south separates Warnic settlement from Juniper Flat, a flat country as its name would indicate, lying between White river on the north, and the Mutton mountains and Des Chutes on the east and south. This flat contains about 60,000 acres, and is in the form of a triangle with the timbered foothills at the base and the junction of the rivers forming the apex. On the southern portion of it are the settlements of Oak Grove and the village of Wapinitia. Juniper Flat has been since the very early days of Oregon famous as a stock country.

Tygh valley, thirty miles south of The Dalles, is a deep valley about eight miles long, and from one to three miles wide, through which flows a large stream of clear, cold water. The admirer of nature cannot look unmoved on the valley of Tygh, with its timbered mountains at the west, its high rolling hills with their wave worn appearance, on the north, with its majestic cliffs on the south, its level valley lands made more beautiful by cultivation; with Mount Hood looking coldly down, apparently from the very head of the valley, like a sentry guarding all this beauty. All things seem to feel the grandeur. Even the quiet stream which flows through the valley as though not content with the part it has taken in flowing tranquilly along joins the White river about two miles below the village, and with the water from that stream makes White river falls (186 feet high). The water spreads out like a fan, and is dashed into foam and mist at the foot of the first and higher precipice, and then gathers into one deep, narrow channel, moves forward a few yards and makes a second leap into a large, round basin worn in the solid rock during past centuries; from this basin it moves sullenly on toward the Des Chutes, as though reluctantly leaving the beautiful valley through which it has wandered for several miles, and to which it has added beauty.

The many streams of Wasco county are no unimportant features of the territory. A glance at the map will reveal this fact. The numeral creeks are so named from the distance between their crossings on the old "Barlow Road" route from The Dalles. On the authority of F. H. Balch it may be said: "The Indians had no general name for the Columbia, but each tribe had a special name, if any, for it. Some had no name for it at all. It was simply 'the big water,' 'the river,' 'the big salmon water.' What Wauna, the Klickitat name, or Wemath, the Wasco name, signify, the author has been unable to learn, even from the Indians who gave him the names. They do not know; they say their fathers knew, but it is forgotten now."

One of William Cullen Bryant's most beautiful passages in "Thanatopsis" is this:

"Where rolls the Oregon and bears no sound
Save his own lashings—yet the dead are there,
And millions in these solitudes, since first
The flight of years began, have laid them down
In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone."

Certain traditions tell us that Jonathan Carver first named this stream the "Oregon," but this is mythical. It is quite probable that Carver never saw it in its majesty, or even at its source, as his explorations extended only a little westward of the headwaters of the Mississippi river. The mouth of the Columbia was discovered by Robert Gray in 1792; he named it the Columbia.

That portion of the Columbia forming the northern boundary of Wasco county is one of the most interesting in its whole course. In the current history of earlier days in Wasco it has been described. In May, 1855, Colonel Lawrence Kip, U. S. A., made a trip up this river to The Dalles, and from this point to the great council held at Walla Walla between Governor Isaac Ingalls Stevens and several tribes of Indians. From his journal of that period we extract the following account of a small portion of his trip:

About noon, after a morning of almost incessant rain, we reached the Cascades, the head of navigation. Here a portage has been made as the river for more than two miles flows over rocks, whirling and boiling in a succession of rapids similar to those in the river St. Lawrence. Here is the great salmon fishery of the Columbia river, the season for which commences in the month of May, when the fish ascend the river in great numbers. The banks are inhabited by the remains of some of the Indian tribes who display their skill in catching the salmon, which they dry for exportation. As we passed up we found them scattered along the shore employed in this work. Little bridges are thrown out over the rocks, on which the Indians post themselves, with nets and hoops to which long handles are attached. With these they scoop up the fish and throw them on the shore. They are then pounded fine between two stones, cured and tightly packed in bales of grass matting lined with dried fish-skins, in which state they will keep for years. The process is precisely the same as it was described by Lewis and Clark. The aboriginal village of Wish-ram, at the head of the narrows, which they mention as being the place of resort for the tribes from the interior, is yet in existence.

One of the Indian names which has been corrupted by the tongue of the white man is that now commonly known as Wish-ram, the Indian village spoken of by Lieutenant Kip. The proper pronunciation of this word is Wish-ham and the word is so spelled in the early prints. Just how the pronunciation and spelling became changed is not known, as no Indian ever pronounced the word that way, it being physically impossible for them to pronounce the letter "R." We resume the diary of Lieutenant Kip:

We still notice, too, the difference which the early explorers observed between these Indians and those of the plains. The latter, living on horse-back, are finely developed and look like warriors; the former, engaged only in their canoes or stooping over the banks, are low in stature and seem to have been dwarfed out of all manhood. In every thing noble they are several degrees below the wild tribes of the plains.

We walked for about five miles until we had passed the Cascades, and then took another little steamer which was to carry us to The Dalles. The scenery above is similar to that which we had already passed. In one place the mountains seem to come down to the river, ending in a huge rock, perfectly steep, which has received the name of Cape Horn. Above the precipices are covered with fir and white cedar; two small cascades, like silver lines, leap from point to point for a distance of 150 feet, while below, in the dark shadows the water seems to sweep around the rocks with a sullen sound. At ten o'clock at night we reached the end of our journey, The Dalles.

Unsurpassed is the scenery between the Cascades and The Dalles. General Benjamin Alvord, in his contribution to Harper's Magazine in February, 1884, "The Doctor Killing Oregon," writes:

The scenes to which I invite your attention are in the dalles of the Columbia, a region remarkable for its wild and weird character. The Columbia river is there throttled or compressed into "dalles," or long, narrow and broken troughs, bordered by rocky, misshapen ridges of volcanic rocks called by the Spaniards pedregal, thrown around in the most grotesque manner. And rightly did Theodore Winthrop (in his Canoe and Saddle), there locate his war of demons, whose weapons were huge rocks hurled at each other and left up and down for several miles scattered and in the most fantastic manner. In that most delicious book, Irving's "Astoria," we find the following description:

"The falls of the Columbia river are situated about 180 miles above the mouth of the river. The first is a perpendicular cascade of twenty-feet, after which there is a swift descent of a mile between islands of hard, black rock to another pitch of eight feet, divided by two rocks. About two and one-half miles below this the river expands into a wide basin, seemingly, dammed up by a perpendicular ridge of black rocks. A current, however, sits diagonally to the left of this rocky barrier, where there is a chasm of forty-five yards in width. Through this the whole body of the river roars along swelling and whirling and boiling for some distance in the wildest confusion. Through this tremendous channel the intrepid explorers of the river, Lewis and Clark, passed safely in their boats; the danger not being from the rocks but from the snags and whirlpools. At the distance of a mile and a half from the foot of this narrow channel is a rapid formed by two rocky islands, and two miles beyond is a second fall over a ledge of rocks twenty feet high extending nearly from shore to shore.

"The river is again compressed into a channel from fifty to one hundred feet wide, worn through a rough bed of hard, black rock, along which it boils and roars with great fury for a distance of three miles. This is called Long Narrows. Here is the great fishing place of the Columbia."

Lest you should think that Irving, who had never seen the Columbia, wrote without knowledge, drawing solely upon imagination, it is well to call the attention to the fact that he credits the description to a work seldom seen, that published under the names of Captains Lewis and Clark, giving an account of their explorations.

In the preface of that delightful romance of Indian Oregon, "The Bridge of the Gods," by F. H. Balch, the author says regarding the probability of there having been at one time a natural bridge across the Columbia at the Cascades:

"It may be asked if there ever was a great natural bridge over the Columbia—'Bridge of the Gods,' such as the legend describes. The answer is emphatically, 'yes.' Everywhere along the mid-Columbia the Indians tell of a great bridge that once spanned the river where the Cascades now are, but where at that time the placid current flowed under an arch of stone; that this bridge was tomanowos, built by the gods; that the great spirit shook the earth, and the bridge crashed down into the river, forming the present obstruction of the cascades. All of the Columbia tribes tell this story, in different versions and in different dialects, but all agreeing upon its essential features as one of the great facts of their past history. 'Ancutta, long time back,' say the Tumwater Indians, 'the salmon he no pass Tumwater falls. It too much big leap. Snake Indian he no catch um fish above falls. By and by great tomanowos bridge at cascades he fall in, dam up water, make river higher all way to Tumwater; then salmon he get over. Then Snake Indian all time catch um plenty.'

"My father talk one time,' said an old Klickitat to a pioneer at White Salmon, Washington, 'long time ago' liddle boy, him in canoe, his mother paddle, paddle up Columbia, then come to tomanowos bridge. Squaw paddle canoe under; all dark under bridge. He look up, all like one big roof, shut out sky, no see um sun. Indian afraid, paddle quick, get past soon, no good. Liddle boy no forget how bridge look.'

"Local proof, also, is not found wanting. In the fall, when the freshets are over and the waters of the Columbia are clear, one going out in a small boat just above the cascades and looking down into the transparent depths can see submerged forest trees beneath him, still standing upright as they stood before the bridge fell in and the river was raised above them. It is a strange, weird sight, this forest beneath the river; the waters wash over the broken tree-tops, fish swim among the leafless branches; it is desolate, spectre-like, beyond all words. Scientific men who have examined the field with a view to determining the credibility of the legend about the bridge are convinced that it is essentially true. Believed in by many tribes, attested by the appearance of the locality, and confirmed by geological investigations, it is surely entitled to be received as a historic fact."

Gustavus Hines' History of Oregon (1850) says of the Indian tradition of the Bridge of the Gods at the cascades:

"The probability is true that the tradition is true only in part. Doubtless the time was when there were no cascades here, and they were probably formed by the mountains sliding into the river in tremendous avalanches, and thus filling up the channel."

Mrs. Lord in her "Reminiscences of Oregon," says:

"The Indians told father a great many legends. The only one which I recall now is the oft-told tale of 'The Bridge of the Gods,' though they told it a little differently. They said there was formerly a natural bridge at the Cascades; that long ago the Indians said Mount Hood and Mount Adams were alive and moved about at will; that at one time they quarreled and became so angry they first spit upon each other; then sent out fire, stones, smoke and ashes; that the ashes covered the ground here very thickly and some stones fell, too. Then Mount Hood got so angry that she started to go over to fight Mount Adams, but she was so heavy that she crushed the bridge and could not cross, so she went back and settled down and stayed at home ever since, and while she has spit at Mount Adams some times since, she has not moved any more."

One of the principal streams emptying into the Des Chutes is White river. Within only a few miles of its source it is a roaring torrent; sand and water shooting along in a direct line on a convex surface. The main body of this stream emerges from a spring on the eastern slope of Mount Hood. The White river is, however, but one of a number of streams having their sources in or near the base of this majestic mountain. There are few mountain peaks shedding such enormous volumes of water. Mount Shasta, California, is a notable exception.

Winthrop Falls are about ten miles from The Dalles on Mill creek. For four or five hundred yards the trail lies along the side of a shell-rock declivity; at each step loose stones slip from under one's feet. Soon this rocky road is left behind; its place is taken by slippery, moss grown rocks in close proximity to a thunderous cataract. Crouching through a shower of spray one passes over a little creek, finding himself on the rocky bed of an island with the falls of Mill creek fifty feet distant. Here the water has a perpendicular fall of 125 feet. Below is a perfect basin with bluffs of basaltic rock on two sides. The only means of an entrance or exit is a steep declivity of shelving rock. With thunderous sound the water plunges into the pool below; a portion of it rises in misty spray. The spirit of romantic adventure entices one behind the glittering sheet of water, but this romantic ardor is singularly dampened by a sensation of moistened limpness taken on by one's wearing apparel. He finds his garments thoroughly saturated with Aqua pura.

Below The Dalles surrounded by a strong current, is a little island used by Indians as a place of sepulture. In this manner of burial there is something peculiar, if not grewsome. The dead are taken to a small house erected for this purpose; laid in piles around the walls of the structure, the heads to the wall, the feet toward the center of the edifice. Hundreds of bodies have been piled here forming a heap to the height of several feet.

There are a number of these small structures erected about ten feet apart each way. How many generations have here mingled their dust? Who can tell? This place is called Menaloose Island, in the Columbia river. This islet belongs to Oregon, and is situated about sixteen miles from the Dalles. Here have the Wascos and Klickitats buried their dead since time immemorial. Here are the bones of Melatowack and Powhensha, once famous Indian chiefs and warriors brave.

The elevation of Mount Hood, the loftiest peak in Oregon, is 11,225 feet. This mountain was named in 1792 by Lieutenant Broughton, an English explorer, in honor of Lord Hood. From a point near the juncture of the Willamette and Columbia rivers, named Belle Vue, many years ago, the peak of a large, conical mountain was observed a trifle south of due east. At sight of this wonderful natural structure Broughton was induced to believe that the mountain was the source of the Columbia. Little he dreamed that the river extended 2,000 miles above. The powerful current combined with a strong east wind made rowing slow and toilsome; his men complained bitterly of fatigue. At a point on the north shore, above a great sand bar, he arrived, and here Lieutenant Broughton estimated the stream as about one-quarter of a mile wide. This was in latitude 45 degrees, 27 minutes; longitude 257 degrees, 50 minutes east of Greenwich. This is a little above the Sandy, near the present point of Washhoughal. With the magnificence of this scenery Broughton was quite impressed; the pyramidal snow peak now bearing southeast. It was the same remarkable mountain that had been seen from Belle Vue Point S. 67 degrees east, and though the party were now nearer to it by seven leagues, yet the lofty summit was scarcely more distinct across the intervening land. According to The Dalles Times-Mountaineer this mountain was, in 1846-7, in a state of eruption—thus agreeing with the Indian legend—and was then called Mount Washington. It was ascended in 1854 by Mr. Belden. Mount Hood has been the study of the artist's pencil, and the theme of story and song, but no pen or pencil is adequate to represent the weird, fantastic picturesqueness of its glaciers and tremendous canyons.

Situated about one mile below the Cascades, on the line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, is the famous moving mountain of Wasco county. This phenomenon has been observed for many years; the entire mountain stretching back for a distance of six or seven miles, and about one mile in width, is gradually slipping down into the Columbia and being carried away to the sea. This sliding is not regular; some years it makes more progress than others. In 1894 the most remarkable slide occurred, when it moved about 40 feet, pushing over a mile of the O. R. & N. track into the Columbia river. At present the company keeps employed at this point a large number of men shoveling away the accumulating earth. The scientific theory is that this mountain rests upon a substructure of conglomerate, or soft sandstone, and as it is washed away by the waters of the Columbia on its lower side, the immense weight of this pile of earth and rocks is gradually forced toward the river.

High above Lake Chelan, in Washington, pictured rocks are to be seen above The Dalles, indicative of the rude art of native tribes. They are also painted on an abrupt bluff four miles up the banks of the Columbia from The Dalles. They are of a peculiar pigment somewhat similar to a Venetian red and are quite dissimilar in shape and indications of artistic ability. Some are half-circles with a border of painted darts; others are crescent-shaped, and a number of circles may be discerned, one within the other. High up on one of the projecting rocks is a rudely shaped face; close beside it something like a Greek cross surrounded by a distinct line. Below these are outlines of clubs and arrow heads. The most reliable information to be elicited from Indians leads one to believe that these pictures commemorate battles with contending tribes in which the Wascos were victorious. But they still remain hieroglyphics which Indian tradition, itself, has failed to translate into a reasonable hypothesis.

The Dalles, County Seat of Wasco County

For the descriptive chapter of this history we have left the Warm Springs Indian Reservation for the last, although the greater portion of it is historical. In 1887 the reservation consisted of an area 30 by 40 miles in extent; a total of 768,000 acres. Four townships, 91,190 acres, were afterward added. The Times-Mountaineer said, July 9, 1887, that the new survey would increase the limits 49,600 acres, making a grand total of 908,760 acres to be divided between 763 Indians—men, women and children. This gave every single individual nearly 1,500 acres, or allowing five to each family, 7,500 a family. The Times-Mountaineer continues:

"If this is not a waste of the public domain there can be no such thing. According to the old treaty limits (1855) there are 708,000 acres of land in the Warm Springs Reservation, and this is amply sufficient for 763 Indians. There never was any reason for the addition of the four townships, and to perpetuate a further wrong by taking away from the settlers some of their best portions of timber and grazing lands is an outrage that should not be patiently borne. What impels Agent Wheeler in this action cannot be conjectured. The secretary of the interior should be informed of the facts in this matter, and a thorough investigation should be had."

October 6, 1888, "Otweis," in the Times-Mountaineer describes a visit he made to the reservation in that year as follows:

My first visit to the Warm Springs Reservation occurred at that impressionable age of childhood when anything unusual, strange or romantic leaves so vivid an impression upon the mind that time fails to erase it. We left the W. V. & C. M. road at Willow Creek, and without anything to guide us except the points of the compass and one solitary and almost obliterated wagon-track—which had been left there several years before by the first settlers of Ochoco when escaping the ravaging Bannock Indians they fled to the protection of the friendly Warm Springs—traveled all day over bunch grass hills and scorching plains, finding ourselves at last upon the high rock-rimmed bank of Des Chutes river. Looking down hundreds of feet we could see the foaming and rushing water forcing its way between sage brush and boulder lined shores.

We children and the ladies of our party found a broken place in the rimrock, the only entrance through this otherwise impenetrable natural wall, and leaving the gentlemen to follow with the horses and wagons as best they could, walked, scrambled and tumbled on down the hill—no, mountain—for it seemed to me, indeed, a vast elevation of land. I do not remember whether they took the wagons down by pieces or not, but looking up now at the most impossible trail it seems to me it were impossible to drag them down whole. Some Indians—the first I had ever seen, and who laughed when I drew back when they offered to shake hands—rowed us over the river in a sort of rude flat boat; and I am sure the wagons were ferried across on this boat in pieces, and the horses were compelled to swim. This river forms the eastern boundary line of the reservation; and two miles more traveling up a narrow, fertile valley, dotted occasionally with Indian lodges and wigwams, brought us to the agency. Here were a half dozen houses or so, the homes of the agent and his employes.

During our visit which was of several weeks' duration, there occurred an Indian war dance lasting eight days, which Captain Smith, the agent, informed us was the celebration of the anniversary of their victory over their bitter and life-long enemies, the Snakes, or Bannocks. Several hundred warriors would march on horseback to the brow of the slight eminence above the parade ground, where they would all stand abreast and sing, whoop and beat hideous sounding drums; then with a yell that would almost curdle one's blood, would dash down the hill and circle round the flag pole in the center of the square. Here they were joined by the women who formed in a circle, and joining hands danced round and round the flag. But the most horrible sight of all was to see the slaves whom they had captured in battle compelled to dance inside the ring holding aloft the scalps of their fathers, mothers, sisters and brothers.

It was this savage and cruel people that Captain Smith and his little band were endeavoring to civilize, perhaps I should say, humanize, for they were little more than beasts in human form. Polygamy was a part of their religion, and vice and superstition the ruling elements of their government. They would steal and lie naturally, and believed it something commendable to murder an enemy, white or Indian, whenever the opportunity presented itself. Do you think the lives of Captain Smith, his noble wife, and those of his faithful employes in those days were without trial or hardship? If so it is because you are unacquainted with the perils and dangers that surround them. I say all honor is due to Captain Smith and his faithful few who gradually won the confidence of this much deceived people, and little by little, one thing at a time, compelled them to throw aside one vice after another. Is it any wonder that he was over fifteen years accomplishing his work of humanizing this people? Missionaries have been thrice that length of time struggling with other savage nations, and have they accomplished more? And yet I hear a great many complaints made concerning the non-civilization of the Warm Springs. Yes, my friends, it was so easy for us to sit by our comfortable fire-sides and talk about what might have been done. But the question remains, would we have done better? Would we have given up comforts of society and civilization and have spent the best part of our lives with, and for a people who, like the Children of Israel, constantly yearned to go back?

Visiting the agency now (1888), I see every tillable acre of land under cultivation. Instead of lodges and wigwams I see neat residences. Instead of the hideous scalp dance I attend church and listen to the gospel among well-dressed and well-behaved Indians, men and women, and yet you tell me they are not civilized.

During 1887 John A. McQuinn was employed three months in surveying the boundaries of the Warm Springs reservation, and subdividing it into farms. Having completed his work he returned to The Dalles. He declared that he had run about 900 miles of lines and seen the entire area of the reservation. Mr. McQuinn said that there were about 850 Indians on the reservation, Wascos, Warm Springs and Piutes, of which there were only about fifty of the latter. These were not given to agriculture or, in fact, to any other civilized habits. Of the three tribes the Wascos were the most highly civilized and intellectual. During the past three or four preceding years the Indians had slightly increased and there were enough of them to occupy all the good land on the reservation.

The springs which give this government tract its name are about 40 in number; the water, which is charged with sulphur and other minerals, is of a temperature high enough to cook an egg within six minutes. These springs well up from seams in the rocks and form a stream as large as Johnson's creek. The original boundaries were run where the Indians claimed they should be; the persons who remonstrated being only two or three stockmen and a few others who had no interest in the matter.

CHAPTER X

POLITICAL.

The political history of Wasco county covers a period of half a century. At the time the county was organized, 1854, two election precincts were deemed amply sufficient to accommodate the voters. June 6, 1904, there was held a general county election—just fifty years to a day after the first battle of the ballots at the polls in the county—and twenty-seven voting precincts were required. And this, too, after the limits of the county had been materially curtailed; for the whole territory that fifty years before needed only two precincts now had several hundred, and the county which at the first election polled not to exceed one hundred, now cast many thousand votes. In no other way has the steady advancement of this county made itself so apparent as in its political history.

During the earlier period of the county's annals the Democratic party was supreme. With only an occasional exception the pioneers were Democrats. True, now and then an "old line Whig" was found among those whose business it was to safeguard the county's interests in an official capacity, but they did not gain their positions because of their party affiliations, but in spite of them. They were, perhaps, more popular, personally, than their Democratic competitors. But such instances were rare. Politics at that time was looked at from a far different viewpoint than it is at the present day; a day when it has become a "leading industry" if not an acknowledged profession. The paltry salaries grudgingly set apart for official emoluments did not stimulate men to struggle very strenuously for political preferment. At that period, fabulous as it may appear, to the reader of the Twentieth Century, acceptance of a county office was regarded in the light of a personal sacrifice; a patriotic devotion to political duty and a self-abnegating interest in the community's welfare instead of the prize-package feature so common nowadays in the bitter struggle for place, pap, patronage, suspicious perquisites and downright criminal "graft." The fact that many evaded these onerous duties was shown by the numerous resignations and difficulties experienced in finding men willing to fill the positions. Emphatically the place sought the man in those early primitive times, and not the man the place. Prior to the first shot in the Civil War party lines in Oregon were not of any appreciable tension. There were not a sufficient number of the Whig, or Republican party, as it was beginning to be known, to make a respectable contest; the vital question at issue in county affairs was, "Which Democrat shall we select?"

With the opening of the Civil War there came a decided change. Party lines were then drawn closely. Despite numerous accessions to Republican ranks, the Democrats still retained a large majority; that element of the party which supported John C. Breckenridge carried Wasco county at the first presidential election in which it was allowed to participate. And since that time the Republican and Democratic parties have contended for honors in the political field of Wasco county. Up to the early 80s the Democrats were the stronger party, and were, as a rule, successful in presidential, state, congressional and county elections. Following that period honors were about evenly divided between the two dominant political elements. But commencing with the year 1888 the Republicans can claim political supremacy, gradually increasing their hold until the county is now conceded to be strongly Republican; at the election of 1904 seating every candidate on their ticket.

Occasionally the Prohibition party has a portion of a ticket in the field, but numerically it is not strong. Neither have the Socialists much of a following. During the days when Populism reached high water mark the Socialists gained some strength, yet not nearly so much as in other portions of the west.

Among the notable men who came from Wasco county and served their country with distinction were James K. Kelly, United States senator; O. N. Denny and George L. Woods, both having served as county judge. O. N. Denny represented our government in China and subsequently became adviser to the king of Korea. George L. Woods was Wasco county's first governor of Oregon; Z. F. Moody, second.

It is now ours to trace the political history of the county from the date of its organization, giving the result of each election in so far as is possible with the data available. Wasco county was organized by act of the Oregon Territorial legislature in 1854, which act became a law, by being enrolled January 11th, of the same year. The original officers of the new county were named in the bill; they were to serve until their successors, to be elected on the first Monday in June, 1854, should qualify. Apparently the legislator who introduced the bill did not consider it necessary to name a complete quota of county officials, as we find that those who were named were: commissioners, W. C. Laughlin, Warren Keith and John Tompkins; sheriff, John Simms; judge of probate, Justin Chenowith; clerk ——— Chase. Evidently the Christian name of Mr. Chase was unknown to the sapient legislator who fathered the bill, but subsequent delving in historic annals reveals the fact that it was Henri M. The gentlemen named as commissioners met and duly organized the county of Wasco. Mr. Laughlin was selected as chairman of the board. Prior to the election in June precinct officers were appointed by the board; the appointments were made April 3d. They were: Nathan Olney and M. M. Cushing, justices of the peace, and David Butler, constable, for Dalles precinct; G. Atwell, justice of the peace, and John Chipman, constable, for Falls precinct. These were the first and only officials in Wasco county prior to the initial election of June 6, 1854.

Then the county, as has been stated, was divided into two precincts—Dalles and Falls. At the meeting of the county board, April 3, 1854, judges of these precincts were appointed as follows: Dalles precinct, W. D. Bigelow, M. M. Cushing and William R. Gibson. Falls precinct, James Human, G. Atwell and John Chipman. The minutes of this meeting contain the following entry: "Appointed the place of holding elections to be at the house of Mr. Forsythe." This was for Dalles precinct, the other voting place not being mentioned.

At this initial election Richard Marshall, Charles E. Evelyn, later made chairman, and L. P. Henderson were elected county commissioners, and June 10th they qualified, their election being certified to by J. A. Simms, county auditor. At this meeting the county commissioners decided by lot the length of their respective terms. Charles E. Evelyn drew the short end and it was his misfortune (or fortune) to witness the expiration of his term at the next general election in June, 1855. R. Marshall's term was to expire in two years from date of his election, and L. P. Henderson's in three years. By this plan the commissioners' term of office was fixed at three years; one to be elected each successive year. The county records do not state definitely what other officers were elected. O. Humason was elected sheriff, but failing to qualify, Benjamin M. Reynolds was appointed July 3d to fill the vacancy. In addition to those mentioned above the following were elected: O. Humason, representative; Nathan Olney, county (probate) judge; D. W. Dauthitt, prosecuting attorney; John A. Simms, clerk; John Irvine, assessor; J. Chenowith, school superintendent and surveyor; C. W. Denton, coroner.

W. C. Laughlin was also elected justice of the peace, but failing to qualify, W. D. Bigelow was appointed to fill the vacancy. There appears to have been more or less trouble in retaining a justice of the peace, as we find that on September 27th O. Humason and C. W. Shaug were appointed justices in place of Nathan Olney and W. D. Bigelow, resigned. S. S. Moore was appointed constable at the same time. From the commissioners' record it, therefore, appears, that in 1854 there were only three justices of the peace and three constables in all of Oregon between the Cascade and Rocky mountains. They were located at The Dalles and Falls (now Cascade Locks).

Prior to the admission of Oregon as a state in 1859, county elections were held annually. From the proceedings of the county commissioners of April 2, 1855, we learn that the two election precincts then existing were described as follows: "Second precinct, commencing at Dog (Hood) River, thence running east." and "First precinct—Commencing at Dog River, thence west." The voting place for precinct number 2 was at Simms & Humasons store at The Dalles, and for precinct number 1 at N. Coe's house on Dog River. The judges of election for number 2 were William C. Laughlin, N. H. Gates and W. D. Bigelow; for number 1, Rodger B. Atwell, John Chipman and William Jenkins.

At the June election of 1855 William Jenkins was selected commissioner and his hold-over colleagues were L. P. Henderson and R. Marshall. Mr. Jenkins resigned July 22, 1856, and R. Marshall was appointed in his place. Although the commissioners had provided for only two election precincts, we find that three precincts had cast votes, the third being known as Umatilla. Among the election returns in the county archives are those for this precinct, but it is doubtful if they were permitted to count in the result. Our belief is based on the termination of the contest between the two candidates for sheriff, which was decided by the district court July 10, 1855. Had the Umatilla vote been counted Jerry G. Dennis would have been elected. In the returns for this election, however, we include the Umatilla vote.

The records show the returns from three precincts for this election—Dalles, Falls and Umatilla. Sixty-four votes were cast at The Dalles; sixteen at Umatilla and twenty-nine at Falls. Following is the result:

Following is the opinion of the district court in the proceedings instituted by Jerry G. Dennis to contest the election of Sheriff C. W. Shaug:

Jerry G. Dennis vs. C. W. Shaug.
Contested Election.

The contestant, Dennis, by Logan, his attorney, and the incumbent, Shaug, by Campbell, his attorney, came and the court having heard the proofs and allegations of the parties, it is considered that the said Shaug was duly elected to the said office of sheriff for the said county of Wasco at the said election of the first Monday of June, 1855, and is entitled to hold the same as against the said contestant, Dennis, and that he recover of the said Jerry G. Dennis his costs.

For the election of June, 1856, four election precincts were created. Their names and boundaries were as follows: First, or Portage precinct—Commencing at the southwestern boundary of Wasco county, thence east to a point of rocks opposite Wind Mountain.

Second, or Dog River precinct—Commencing at the point of rocks opposite Wind Mountain; thence east to Dog River.

Third, or Dalles precinct—Commencing at Dog River and thence east to dividing ridge, between Five and Ten Mile creeks.

Fourth—Commencing at the divide between Five and Ten Mile creek; thence east and south to Burton's gate; thence east to the Des Chutes river, and south to the California line.

The judges of election were: Portage precinct—Messrs. Atwell, Chipman and Allen. Dog River precinct—Messrs. Coe, Benson and Jenkins. Dalles precinct—Messrs. Laughlin, Bigelow and ———. Fourth precinct—Messrs. Combs, Crooks and Shumway. Apparently the election judges did not fully endorse the action of the county commissioners in naming these precincts, for we find the returns certified to from Dalles, Cascade and Fifteen Mile precincts. Therefore returns are available only from these so-called precincts, and there may, or may not have been more votes cast at this election. Here it is:

Another election, evidently a special one, was held November 17, 1856, to select a representative for Wasco county to the legislature. Apparently Dalles and Falls precincts were the only ones in which an election was held. N. H. Gates received 130 votes and Colonel A. G. Tripp 30, in Dalles. The judges of election were Ezra Craven, B. F. McCormack and J. G. Dennis. Clerks of election: A. P. Price and Robert W. Hale. Falls precinct's vote at this election was, Gates, 13.

But little excitement appears to have materialized at the general election of June, 1857. There was only one ticket. For joint councilman Wasco county gave its vote to O. Humason. The following were elected county officers:

Representative—N. H. Gates; county commissioner, John Crooks; sheriff, A. Shumway; coroner, James McAuliff; assessor, L. P. Linsey; school superintendent, H. K. Hines; public administrator, N. H. Gates. With the exception of Linsey all these candidates were Democrats.

But on November 9th, of the same year quite an interesting election was held, and one that involved a number of issues of grave importance. In one respect it was the preliminary to the final admission of Oregon as a state into the union, and this question brought before the people the adoption of a state constitution. We give the result in Dalles and what was erroneously called "Fifteen Mile" precinct. The vote in both precincts was against the proposed constitution and slavery. And this vote, it should be remembered, was taken in a locality where the Democrats were, for the time being, the dominant party. The vote "for" and "against" negroes is, too, singularly significant. Although the vote in Fifteen Mile precinct was much smaller, the same political sentiment prevailed in about the same proportion. The result:

	Dalles.	Fifteen Mile.
For Constitution .....	55	3
Against Constitution .....	89	5
For Slavery .....	58	1
Against Slavery .....	85	8
For Negroes .....	18	1
Against Negroes .....	122	7

For the election of June 7, 1858, three new precincts were established—No. 4 at the crossing of the Des Chutes; No. 5 at the Tygh, and No. 6 at the Walla Walla. The judges of election were: Precinct No. 1, Messrs. Allen, Chipman and Atwell; No. 2, Laughlin, Cowen, Jukes; No. 3, Crooks, Henderson, Logan; No. 4, Trevitt, Kingsbury, Martin; No. 5, Bishop, Palmer, Flett. The following were elected:

For senator, J. S. Ruckles; representative, Victor Trewlitt, Dem.; county judge, O. Humason, Dem.; prosecuting attorney, D. W. Douthitt; county commissioner, R. G. Atwell; sheriff, A. Shumway; clerk, W. C. Moody, Dem.; treasurer, James McAuliff, Dem.; assessor, H. P.

Isaacs, Dem.; school superintendent, C. R. Meigs, Whig; surveyor, A. Fairfield; coroner, W. De Moss.

Of these officials elected, Shumway, Meigs, Fairfield and De Moss served only a portion of their respective terms.

June 27, 1859, an election was held in Wasco county in which only two county offices were represented by candidates. Candidates voted for at this election were representative to congress, school superintendent and assessor. The result:

	Walla Walla	Fifteen Mile	Dog River	Des Chutes	Dalles	Umatilla	Falls	Total

The general election of November 6, 1860, afforded the citizens of Oregon their first opportunity to vote for president, as residents of the Web-Foot State. Following this date general elections were held every two years. In Wasco county John C. Breckenridge secured a handsome majority over the other Democratic competitor, Stephen A. Douglas, the vote for Abraham Lincoln exceeding that for Douglas by a small majority. Only two other officials were voted for at this election. The result:

For Presidential Electors, Stephen A. Douglas—W. H. Farrar, 148; B. Hayden, 145; James Bruce, 147.

For Presidential Electors, John C. Breckenridge—D. Smith, 255; D. W. Douthitt, 253; James O'Meara, 255.

Before proceeding further with our record of the successive elections held in Wasco county, it is considered best to invite the attention of the reader to a resume of the personality of the pioneer political officials of the county. As we have stated the first county officers were appointed by the Territorial legislature—W. C. Laughlin, Whig; William Keith and John Tompson, Democrats, commissioners; John A. Simms, Democrat, sheriff, and Justin Chenowith, Democrat, county judge. Of the first list of elective officers only one is still a resident of Wasco county (January 19, 1905), and as far as known the only one living, the coroner, C. W. Denton. O. Humason, Democrat, was first representative in 1854; N. H. Gates in 1856, and Vic Trevitt, Democrat, in 1858. D. W. Douthitt was prosecuting attorney for three terms. There was no treasurer until 1856 when Mr. Cushing was elected. J. McAuliff was elected in 1858, and is still living in Walla Walla, Washington. The assessors for three terms successively were John Irvine, William Logan and H. P. Isaacs. William Logan and wife were lost off Crescent City, in 1865, in the steamer Brother Jonathan. H. P. Isaacs, one of the most prominent of Walla Walla's business men, recently died. The county clerks were John A. Simms, J. R. Bates and W. C. Moody. R. R. Thompson was school superintendent in 1858, and was succeeded by E. P. Fitzgerald for two terms. Colonel J. S. Ruckles, one of the earliest men in the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, was senator in 1858.

It was a Republican year in 1864 in Oregon. The wave swept over Wasco county and produced a marked uniformity in the vote for the various state, district and county candidates for offices. Patriotism was at floodtide. Yet by the time the next election rolled around Democrats were again in the saddle. In the June election of 1864 Republicans had been successful in every instance. But the following presidential election of November 8th, of the same year, showed the Democratic candidate for president, McClellan, ahead by less than 75 votes of his competitor, Abraham Lincoln. Result of the election of June 6, 1864:

For location of the state capital of Oregon—Salem, 370; Portland, 54; Dalles City, 27; Eugene City, 16; Mount Hood, 2; Corvallis, (Corvallis), 1.

The spring election of 1880 was held on June 7th. Of this election The Dalles Times of June 8, 1880, said:

"The present campaign which has just ended has been one of the fairest in the history of our county. Both parties have evinced their usual interest in the success of their particular candidates, yet it has lacked that detestable feature of politics generally, and which has been indulged in by both parties to a certain extent. We have reference to that indecent practice of exposing all, however insignificant they may be, of the immoral acts of opposing candidates during their lives, and in which the people take but little interest."

On the 15th the Times added the following:

At the first opening of the campaign we predicted that when the vote of this county was counted, even the unterrified would be surprised. And our prediction has come true, though we claim neither to be a prophet nor the son of a prophet. We were fully assured that a good, earnest campaign in this county would show that even the democracy of Wasco might be defeated, though for several years past a Democratic nomination has been considered equivalent to an election. This will be considered so no longer. The result of the election shows that Wasco county is very little, if any, Democratic. There has been a vast increase in our population, and that has helped to lessen the Democratic majority. Other causes have been at work which have tended in the same direction. * * *

The Republicans of Wasco county have gained a substantial victory over a vigilant and determined opponent. Messrs. Z. F. Moody, representative; John T. Storrs, sheriff; and O. D. Doane, school superintendent, have been elected on the Republican ticket by handsome majorities. This is the first time for years that a Republican has been elected in this county and we feel like crowing.

At the state and county election held on Tuesday, June 8, 1880, there were 2,272 votes cast for the head of the ticket—congressman—a large increase over any election ever before held in the county. Following is the official count of the votes:

Spring election of June 6, 1904: At this contest at the polls every Republican on the ticket with the exception of W. L. Bradshaw, was elected by pluralities of from 48 to 1,853. It decided beyond a doubt that Wasco county was Republican by an enormous majority. The Democrats had hoped to elect two or three candidates, especially A. S. Bennett to the state legislature. The heaviest vote was for the office of sheriff, there being 3,132 votes cast. Compare this with the vote of 1855 when no more than 103 votes were cast in a territory many times larger than the present Wasco county. By precincts this vote for sheriff in 1904 was divided as follows:

East Dalles, 308; Bigelow, 249; Trivitt, 213; West Dalles, 255; Antelope, 107; Tygh, 117; Bakeoven, 56; Eight Mile, 47; Mountain, 35; Mosier, 98; Dufur, 112; Boyd, 37; Kingsley, 96; Columbia, 65; East Hood River, 314; West Hood River, 248; Shaniko, 89; South Hood River, 150;

CHAPTER XI

EDUCATIONAL.

The first schools in the vast territory at one time known as Wasco county were those of the early missionaries and of the soldiers stationed at The Dalles. This military post erected a log school house in 1854, a trifle southwest of the point where now stands the Academy Park school building. Presiding over this school were a number of teachers successively. Of the first instructors in this primitive educational institution Miss Harriet Marden, under date Washington, D. C., February 9, 1898, writes to The Times-Mountaineer, at The Dalles: "In your souvenir number of January 1st, on page 4, you express a wish to know the name of the United States soldier who first taught school in your town. His name was Peter Fair, sergeant of Company E, Ninth Regular Infantry. He died in San Francisco about eight years ago (1890)."

In the same building Charles R. Meigs taught a private school a portion of the summer of 1855. But in the autumn of that year the patriotic pedagogue abandoned the school to join a company of volunteers organized by Nathan Olney to fight Indians.

Another pioneer school was presided over by Miss Sconce, a sister of Mrs. Put Bradford, and later the wife of Colonel Ebey. The sessions of this school were held in a private house on what is now Fourth, between Court and Union streets. January 1, 1899, the Times-Mountaineer said:

The early Christian missionaries who first settled at The Dalles were educators in the fullest sense of the word. Besides their little churches, schools were erected for teaching the aborigines the rudiments of the English language, and as the town partook of the least degree of permanency that great adjunct of free government—the public school—found its proper position in the community. As the village grew by immigration these schools were improved and enlarged until the present status was attained. The primitive log structure gave place to a more pretentious one of lumber; finally to the stately edifice of brick. There is no safer criterion by which to judge of the advancement of a nation, community or individual than in the structures which are used and the systems employed in imparting instruction. If a country is found which pays little or no attention to its schools, it can be placed in the unenviable category of lacking the elements of progression, and the same is true of the community or the individual. * * * * The pioneers of this vicinity were fully imbued with the American spirit, and their progress in this regard has been commensurate with the development of the surrounding country.

It must be admitted that we are seriously handicapped in compiling the details of the educational history of Wasco county by the fact that the earlier school records have been destroyed. But it is reasonably certain that the first school district was formed at The Dalles November 1, 1856,* although no records of its boundaries exist. In 1860 the original public school building was erected, the log structure built in 1854 having housed simply a kind of subscription school supported entirely by individual effort. In 1898 the Times-Mountaineer stated that this ancient building had been several times remodeled and several times removed, but that it still continued at that date to do service.

Still, unless the proof-reader is at sea, Melissa Hill, writing in the Woman's Edition of the Times-Mountaineer of May 17, 1898, says that this school district was organized in 1859. She says:

In November, 1859, the school district was organized, and this foundation of the public schools of The Dalles was strengthened by building a public school house, or rather, a public school-room, as the school house which was erected on the site now occupied by Dr. Siddall's cottages on Fourth and Laughlin streets, had but one room; another was added a few years later, and in 1863 two more rooms were built, giving to the whole the form of a T. The desks of the first two rooms gave sad proof of the fact that Young America is anxious to make his mark in the world; profiting by experience the directors furnished one of the new rooms with desks two inches thick to give the boys sufficient material to whittle! In 1888 it was removed to Union street, and is now called the Union Street Annex.

* W. C. Laughlin's diary says Nov. 1856.

Mount Hood from Lost Lake

Union Street school was erected in 1873. It first stood in the street, just below the "cut," the main entrance being from the north. The grounds were ample, and boys and girls found room for out-door games. Many flowers and beautiful mosses grew on the bluff near the building less than fifteen years ago, and great was the children's delight when they were allowed to decorate their desks with the mosses. The little blue school house was not used for a time; by 1880, however, the attendance of the schools had increased so that every room had to be used, and then not all of the pupils were accommodated. In the lower grades half-day sessions were maintained, and a room in the Methodist church was rented to provide for a primary class. Such were the conditions when the citizens voted a tax to erect a brick building of four rooms. This was completed in 1882 and is now occupied by the eighth grade and the high school pupils.

A building of two rooms was erected at Eleventh and Union streets in 1889. This building was known as the East Hill Primary, and was moved to its present site in 1894. In the same year the Wasco Independent Academy, with all the property of the Academy Association, was purchased by the school district. Academy Park School has replaced the term Wasco Independent Academy. Today the school district owns ten acres of land and five school buildings, the whole valued at $53,000, and a high school building is now being erected in the Academy Park grounds at a cost of $19,000. Little debt has been allowed to accumulate; the liabilities being $7,000 in February, 1897. At that time the tax-payers voted to bond the district for $20,000 to provide funds for the building now under erection. * * * H. J. Waldron was a pioneer teacher. We are not able to find just when he took charge of the schools, but the fact that a man of so much ability shaped the destinies of our early schools is worth more to us than any mere date. He was the last person who taught school alone. Other principals of the school were J. D. Robb, E. P. Roberts, J. W. Miller, Dr. O. D. Doane, Levi Walker Patton, S. P. Barrett, F. W. Grubbs, W. L. Worthington, J. S. Browne, Charles Davidson, Nap. Davis, Price, and M. W. Smith.

There were no grades, no examination, no "passing," no graduation in the early schools. The modern system was worked out slowly, and sometimes painfully. But shall we say that the pioneer schools were not efficient because they lacked all the modern machinery? By no means. All work must be judged from its results. The boys and girls of the '60s who attended these schools; are the active men and women of today, and many of them are most successful. Indeed the very crudeness of the time enforced many lessons of sturdy independence. Mistakes were made then as mistakes are made now, but we find more to commend than to criticize. The pioneer school lost much by making arithmetic the test of a child's ability. It was a mistake of the time and not limited to The Dalles. "Your grades and methods serve you well," says a successful teacher of our early schools, "but we older teachers do not regret our lack of the present system; but could we have given more time to language our work would have been stronger."

It was impossible to grade the school successfully when there were but few teachers, and as late as 1880 there were but five teachers employed. Instead of the written examination of the present time, the teacher promoted the pupil when he thought best. No pupil asked, "Did you pass?" It was, instead, "Can you do these sums?" We are told that the first examinations were used in the schools in the early '70s, and from that time they were employed as best suited the teachers. The plan now used of monthly examinations in every grade has been followed since Charles Davidson took charge of schools in September, 1884.

In 1871 a large frame building was completed at The Dalles, and in 1882 the brick edifice now used as a high school. In 1881 the Wasco Independent Academy was incorporated, and in 1889 was created a State Normal School by an act of the Oregon legislature. "The "new" Catholic academy was completed in 1884. But this educational institution was founded twenty years previously—in 1864. In Oregon the Catholic church has not only furnished the pioneer missionaries, but the pioneer educators, as well. With teaching the Indians the principles of Christianity they combined commendable energy in building up institutions of learning. In the early history of the state the Catholic academy—under the fostering care of the Sisters of Charity—stood side by side with the Catholic church. In 1864 the Catholic pioneers at The Dalles erected an academy under charge of the Sisters of the Holy Name, from Montreal, Province of Quebec, Canada. The present brick building, built in 1884, is supplied with all modern improvements, and the friends of that institution came forward with generous contributions toward its erection. This academy is incorporated and authorized by the State of Oregon to confer academic honors. At present it is the only private school in Wasco county. Of this institution the Times-Mountaineer said, January 1, 1898:

There is no institution of which The Dalles is more proud than St. Mary's Academy, conducted by the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary. It is today one of the most complete among the educational institutions of the Inland Empire, and its patronage is by no means confined to The Dalles and Wasco county, but extends over the neighboring counties; also into Washington. A visit to this seat of learning some days ago elicited some facts regarding the institution and its work, which may be of interest to those who have not been there. Situated in the suburban portion of the city, on a large tract of land owned by the Sisters, the pupils have quiet and a sense of being at home in the very environs of this rapidly growing city. The Sisters are enabled to have large playgrounds for the various diversions of the students. A tour of inspection through the building shows how orderly, neat, and well arranged are the different rooms and places of the academy.

Entering the institution by high steps in front, you are, really, in what is the second story of the building. On the ground floor is the kitchen, dining room and large recreation room used by the children in bad weather, or when it is not desirable for them to play outside. On the floor above are the parlors, office, two music rooms, three class rooms, community room and library. The studio, infirmary and dormitories are on the upper floor. The building is heated throughout by hot water, and special attention is given to ventilation, so that at all times there is an abundance of fresh air. The course of studies seems as complete and comprehensive as thirty-four years' experience in teaching and an efficient corps can make them, and no pains are spared to give the pupils at St. Mary's all the advantages of a first-class education. The classes in the academy are divided into thirteen grades, three primary, three intermediate, three preparatory, three senior and the graduating. Besides the ordinary studies the languages, general vocal music and needlework are taught throughout the course.

Private lessons in instrumental music, including piano, organ, banjo, violin, mandolin, zither and guitar; also in pastelle, oil, metallic, mineral and water-colors, and in crayon, are given by competent instructors. The instruction given at St. Mary's is of the most thorough and practical character, as it trains the heart as well as the mind, and intends to form noble women who will go forth in the world loving only that which is beautiful, pure and good and fitted for whatever life may impose.

From the records of the clerk of the school district at The Dalles, June 18, 1872, it is learned that the city leased to School District No. 1, two and one-half acres of land on Union street, to be used for school purposes exclusively. This lease was signed by N. H. Gates, mayor, and James A. Campbell, recorder of The Dalles.

The second school in Wasco county (and therefore in eastern Oregon), was established in the '50's at the point where the Barlow road crossed Fifteen Mile creek, just above the present site of Dufur. The founding and early history of this school was graphically exploited in the illustrated edition of The Dalles Times-Mountaineer of January 1, 1898. The following is an extract from the article:

In the '50s men were neighbors though miles of distance separated their cabins and, their animal wants provided for, with true American instinct they began to talk of schools. Wasco county then reached south to the California line; there was a school at The Dalles, but it was unsatisfactory to the settlers of Tygh, Fifteen Mile and Eight Mile creeks, and they discussed the advisability of having a school district struck off and a school house erected at some more convenient point. At a settlers' meeting called for that purpose it was decided unanimously that "Fifteen Mile Crossing" had more natural advantages as a school center than any other place in the county (a judgment that stands today as it did forty years ago—undisputed).

The law of that period provided that it was necessary to have a school in session in the proposed district before it could be set aside, but the settlers were equal to the occasion, and on the Herbert place, a half mile above the present town of Dufur, a double line of poles was driven into the ground, planks placed between them for walls, a covering placed over the rude structure, rough benches provided, and the school building was complete. A gentleman named Hill was secured as teacher, and with some eight or ten pupils in attendance the first school of Wasco county outside of The Dalles was in session.

The law provisions were fulfilled and School District No. 2 (The Dalles was No. 1) was established. Upon the granting of the new district a permanent site for a more pretentious school house was selected within the present corporate limits of Dufur, near the large pine tree opposite the present elegant cottage of Mrs. A. K. Dufur, and here Mr. W. R. Menefee, still an honored resident of Dufur, erected a 16 by 20 school building—the first regular school house of District No. 2, a district that was bounded on the north by the dividing ridge between Five Mile and Eight Mile creeks, and on the south by an unexplored region from which several wealthy counties have been carved. The difficulties of maintaining a school in those days can be well imagined when it is explained that according to law it was necessary to have at least six persons present at the annual meeting to legally conduct business, and it was impossible, owing to the sparse settlement, to get the necessary six together at a meeting—just how they held a legal organization is not the duty of your historian to find out. Sufficient is it that the 16 by 20 school house on the creek was a nucleus around which has formed one of the handsomest and most prosperous towns of Oregon.

Forty years takes us back to the time when all the settlers of eastern Oregon were along the streams—when the famous bunch grass waved on the hills and table lands undisturbed by the farmer's plow; when the whirr of the header or the hum of the threshing machine had never been in Wasco county, and it is with pleasure I chronicle the fact that even at that remote date the settlers of the beautiful valley of Fifteen Mile were willing to make sacrifices that it should be an educational center. In order to maintain a good school, children residing at too great distance to attend from home were boarded free by the settlers more favorably situated, and School District No. 2 prospered for a number of years, but dark days were in store for it.

War time came on and the war-clouds of the east spread their darkening shadows between homes that miles had failed to separate—war news that brought a bright, proud smile to the face of one was reflected in a second on the face of his neighbor. The hearty handshake gave place to the cold nod of recognition. During these troublesome times the school at Fifteen Mile crossing was kept alive only by great effort; but when at last peace was declared and old friendships patched, all went in again with a will and the 16 by 20 school house by the big pine tree was once more their pride, and so it might have remained indefinitely had it not been for one of those unlooked for incidents, those trifles in themselves that tear asunder nations as well as school districts. About the year 1866 the school house on the creek burned down, and the germs of enmity planted in each breast during war times grew rapidly and blossomed into a spirit of contrariness as to where the school house should be rebuilt, each patron of the school being afraid the other might reap some benefit by location.

The usual result followed, and it was erected a mile south of its former location, on Pine Hollow, in the most inconvenient place possible to select. Again the bad part of man's nature had triumphed, and all interested were dissatisfied, but even then matters might have quieted down had it not been for a strange combination of circumstances. It seems that in times like these the devil gets in his work (such is not a matter of history, but simply the opinion of your historian) and this occasion was no exception. Mr. Herbert and Mr. Chrisman were prominent patrons of the school, but differed widely on the slavery question. Mr. Herbert had a half-breed Indian girl, and she was a pupil of the school.

Mr. Cushman had a negro boy whom he was bent on proving the equal of any in intelligence. This boy, also, attended school. About this time the directors employed as teacher John Michell or his brother, Phil, I am not positive which, but my readers in Wasco county will agree with me that it must have been John, for he seated the Indian girl and the negro boy together on the same bench.

Mr. Herbert was terribly angry over the insult to his Indian girl, and Mr. Cushman thought the insult on the other side. The community which had grown considerably in ten years, divided on the question, as they always do on trifling things that don't concern them, and war was declared. Result—School District No. 2 was cut in two with the negro boy in one district and the Indian girl in the other, and no school in either. As to what became of the three parties, the direct cause of the trouble, your historian has failed to trace the negro boy or the Indian girl, but John Michell, as might have been expected, went from bad to worse, and was for years proprietor and editor of The Times-Mountaineer, but thirty years after was captured and sent to the Oregon legislature for four years. After the town of Dufur was founded the old school house was moved in from Pine Hollow and once more there was a school on Fifteen Mile. In 1884 the old school building that was so grand in 1867 became too small to accommodate the pupils. Mr. Bohna having built a large hall with lodge rooms above, the I. O. O. F. lodge removed to new quarters, and their first building was sold to the district for a school house, with two rooms 25 by 40, and the school question seemed settled for an indefinite period.

In 1888 Professor Aaron Frazier, whose reputation as an educator was second to none in the state, was engaged as principal of the Dufur school; the directors having confidence in his ability gave him full control, and the tax-payers backed him with funds when the state money was insufficient. Under his system the school was graded and so successful was his management that pupils were attracted from all parts of Wasco and adjoining counties; the large building that was thought large enough to accommodate the increase of pupils for many years, was in less than five years crowded beyond comfort. A new and handsome school building, modern in style and convenience, has been built, with accommodations for 250 pupils; and Professor Frazier, spoken of above, is in charge.

From the records of the clerk of School District No. 12 (The Dalles), it is gleaned that Albertine H. Tackman and William Tackman, her husband, of Wasco county, June 8, 1894, sold to the directors of District No. 12, for $400, lots 8, 9 and 10, in block 4, Tackman's addition to Dalles City. This became the East Hill Primary. A suitable building was moved on to this property and school opened in September of the same year.

It is in order now to give a short history of the Wasco Independent Academy which, aside from St. Mary's Academy, was the only private institution of any educational importance that was ever in Wasco county. In 1879 some of the citizens of The Dalles, believing that their home town should afford better educational facilities than those possessed, began an animated and enthusiastic discussion of the propriety of building a "high" school or "academy." In May, 1881, the West Shore published the following concerning this institution:

It is only a year since the project of building at The Dalles an institution of learning was seriously entertained. Half a dozen residents of the place meeting casually, the practicability of such an enterprise was discussed in a general way, and it was agreed to hold a meeting of the people and ascertain whether there was a reliable basis in the sentiments of the community on which to attempt the raising of funds for building. The meeting was held at the circuit court room and was well attended; the spirit of the meeting was so favorable to the project that its active promoters resolved to make a determined effort to carry it through to success. A committee, headed by Circuit Judge McArthur, was appointed to report a plan for organization which would avoid the legal difficulties and dangers and the inherent evils of a mere voluntary association, and at the same time secure the institution against all temptations to get control of it for personal gain. This was admirably accomplished by the simple device of an ordinary incorporation under the general corporation laws of the state, with a provision and fundamental condition in the articles of the corporation and in the contract for subscription to the stock, that no dividend should ever be allowed upon the stock, but all income of the corporation, no matter from what source, shall go into a fund to build up and maintain the institution. Upon this basis the corporation was organized in May, 1880, and before January 1, 1881, the splendid edifice was completed.

Another account in detail gives, substantially, the following particulars: Soon after the organization of the stock company for the erection of this building, in March, 1880, articles of incorporation of the Wasco Independent Academy were filed. The object of the incorporation was stated as follows in article 2d:

"The purpose for which said corporation is to be organized is to establish and maintain at The Dalles, Wasco county, Oregon, an academy at which shall be taught all of the branches of learning usually taught in grammar schools and academies; the course of studies to be arranged and designated by the board of directors annually, and not oftener, and the academy to be strictly and perpetually a non-sectarian institution."

The capital stock of this incorporation was placed at $20,000; in 400 shares of $50 each. To this a liberal response was made and all the stock was soon subscribed. The subscribers were:

Five hundred dollars each: Samuel L. Brooks, Robert Mays, J. W. French, D. W. French, E. B. McFarland, Wentworth Lord, B. E. Snipes, Mary Laughlin, A. Rogers, D. J. Cooper, J. H. Sherar, Hugh Frazier.

May 10, 1880, a meeting was held at the county court house for the purpose of electing a board of directors. Messrs. N. H. Gates, S. L. Brooks, E. B. McFarland, W. Lord, Robert Mays, L. L. McArthur and W. Lair Hill received a majority of votes and were declared elected. At an adjourned meeting held the following day Hon. W. Lair Hill was elected president, and Dr. Hugh Logan, secretary. (D. M. French succeeded N. H. Gates as director in 1881; G. A. Liebe succeeded L. L. McArthur in 1886; F. A. McDonald was elected president to succeed W. Lair Hill, in 1887, and B. F. Laughlin succeeded G. A. Liebe in 1889).

August 21, 1880, Judge McArthur was authorized to advertise for bids for the erection of the academy building; September 1, 1880, the contract was awarded to W. E. Sylvester for $9,423.75, he being the lowest bidder. January 5, 1881, the academy was formally opened with T. M. Gatch as principal, assisted by a corps of proficient instructors. Professor Gatch was succeeded by Professor R. H. Willis, as principal, in August, 1887. Attached to the faculty at the opening were Mrs. S. A. Stowell, preceptress, and Miss Marie Smith in charge of the primary department. January 12, 1881, The Dalles Times said:

Last Saturday morning (January 5), according to previous announcement in these columns, the first term of the academy commenced, Prof. T. M. Gatch, principal, Mrs. S. A. Stowell, preceptress, and Miss Marie E. Smith in charge of the primary department. The number of scholars in attendance were about sixty.

The structure is beautiful in design and finish, and is quite an ornament to the city. It is the largest educational building east of Portland, and was built with the design of establishing at The Dalles an institution of learning which should offer to those seeking a classical education an opportunity nearer than Portland or the State University at Eugene City. The present corps of teachers are thoroughly competent; Prof. Gatch stands at the head of the fraternity in this state, having had supervision of some of the best institutions in the state. Mrs. Stowell is very highly spoken of where she has resided as a thorough scholar and a competent teacher. Miss Marie E. Smith is an alumnus of that pioneer institution of learning in the state, and which has produced some of the leading professional men, the Willamette University. She is a young lady of ability, and a better selection could not have been made.

The academy starts under the brightest auspices, and we have no doubt that ere long The Dalles will be the educational center east of the Cascades as it is now the commercial center. The board of directors are men of active business habits, and they will leave nothing undone to make the Wasco Independent Academy the crowning institution of eastern Oregon and eastern Washington. It is owing to their indefatigable exertions that the institution has progressed thus far, and we feel assured that encouraged by the present bright prospects, they will still continue their efforts in the future.

In 1889 by an act of the legislature this academy was made a branch normal institute of Oregon. In May, 1889, David Torbet, A. M., was selected as principal to succeed Professor Willis, who had resigned. Following is a complete list of the graduates up to the year 1889:

1882: Cora L. Allen, Annie M. Lang, Elnora Mays.

1883: Wilber Bolton, Bessie L. Lang, Gert-rude French, Minnie U. Michell, Leigh Gatch, Laura E. Rogers, Nettie G. Williams.

1884: J. W. Condon, Eve M. Lord, E. C. Hill, Eunice Mays, Minnie L. Wigle.

1885: Nannie P. Cooper, Ruth Gatch, Grace M. French, Anna L. Moore, Anna L. Turner, Avis M. Smith.

1886: Lulu D. Bird, Maud E. French, C. J.

Bright, Ethel W. Grubbs, Mary E. Frazier, Amanda Hildebrandt, Perry G. Rothrock.

1887: Mamie Cooper, Fannie C. Robinson, Hettie E. Goldstein, Sula S. Ruch, Mattie A. Johns, John A. Taylor, Jessie Kinsey, Jessie M. Welch, Edwin Mays, Laura H. Welch, Nettie Michell, Lee Wigle.

1888: Nicholas Sinnott.

In June, 1893, the Wasco Independent Academy held its last commencement exercises, and soon afterward the directors, finding that the financial support was insufficient; that they were compelled to meet running expenses from their private purses, made an assignment and deeded the property, or rather a majority of the stock of the corporation, to The Dalles School District No. 12. The amount of the indebtedness, $2,800, was assumed by the directors of the district, June 12, 1894. At that time Robert Mays was president and H. H. Riddell, secretary, of the association. Following is the text of the assignment as taken from the records of the clerk of the city schools:

"We, the undersigned, stockholders in the W. I. A., a corporation, for and in consideration of the sum of $1 to each of us in hand paid, and for other good and valuable considerations, hereby sell, assign, transfer and set over unto the directors of School District No. 12, in Wasco county, Oregon, and unto their successors in office, to be held in trust by said directors and their successors in office for the use and benefit of said School District No. 12, the number of shares of stock in said W. I. A., set opposite our respective names."

Other branches of educational affairs indicated renewed vitality in 1880 within the confines of Wasco county. It may be said that they kept pace with the academy project, and all those interested in schools seemed determined not to permit interest to flag for a moment. At the closing exercises of The Dalles public schools, Friday, April 16, 1880, Professor L. J. Powell, state superintendent of schools for Oregon, was present, and delivered a stirring address. In the course of his remarks he strenuously advocated the organization of a teachers' institute at The Dalles. Following the dismissal of the pupils an impromptu meeting was held at which it was decided to hold an institute in the city commencing May 6th and continuing through the 7th and 8th. To that effect preliminary arrangements were made and the following committees appointed:

Executive Committee—A. S. Bennett, E. H. Grubbs, P. P. Underwood, Mrs. L. Sampson, W. Lair Hill.

Reception Committee—F. Pierce Mays, Mrs. Smith French, and Mrs. E. C. Benedict.

Music Committee—Dr. O. D. Doane, Miss Wall, Professor James, Mrs. P. L. Price and Mrs. James.

According to this arrangement the first teachers' institute ever held in Wasco county convened at The Dalles Thursday, May 6th, 1880, continuing in session three days. It was attended by a large number of educators and friends of education, and quite enthusiastic and interesting sessions were held. Prof. L. J. Powell presided; Dr. O. D. Doane was secretary and Mrs. N. J. A. Simons was assistant secretary.

The following gentlemen have held the office of county superintendent of schools in Wasco county since 1854: J. Chenowith, John H. Stephens, R. R. Thompson, H. K. Hines, C. R. Meigs, Thomas Gordon, William Logan, Thomas Condon, E. P. Fitzgerald, J. D. Robb, D. D. Stephenson, Captain John Darrah, Thomas Smith, E. Fisher, M. H. Abbott, A. S. Bennett, O. D. Doane, W. L. McEwan, A. C. Connelly, Aaron Frazier, Troy Shelley, C. L. Gilbert and Justice T. Neff.

In March, 1891, articles of incorporation of the Wamic Academy were filed with the clerk of Wasco county. The capital stock was divided into 300 shares of $5 a share each; the incorporators were Martin Wing, Henry Driver and H. F. Woodcock. This institution, however, remained on paper and never materialized. The following is from the report of County Superintendent Neff, issued in February, 1905:

Owing to adverse circumstances only three local meetings were held in this county during the past year. In order that these meetings may be made more effective, a fund should be provided which would enable the county superintendent to procure the services of competent instructors.

The number of pupils taking eighth grade examinations in this county is constantly increasing. It is no longer possible for the county superintendent to examine and grade the papers within a reasonable time after the examination. As this work should not be left to teachers, if uniformity of grading is desired, the suggestion that the County Superintendent be empowered to call to his assistance the other members of the board of county examiners is, it would seem, a good one.

There has been a scarcity of teachers in this county. In several instances school boards were unable to procure teachers until long after the time when it was desired that school should begin. There has been little opportunity for choice in the selection of teachers, and, as a result, good teachers have not always been secured. Nearly every school in this county has a good library. During the year ending June 12, 1903, there were 530 volumes purchased. Many more have been bought during the present year. Most schools were insufficiently supplied with supplementary reading matter.

Five new school houses have been erected since my last report. Hood River district will put up one or two additional buildings this summer in order to accommodate the increased school population. Thirty-eight districts this year voted a special tax of from one to twenty-two mills, the average rate being seven mills. The county court levied  $6\frac{1}{2}$  mills for school purposes, an increase of one and one-half mills over last year.

Number of persons of school age: Male, 2,633; female, 2,609; total, 5,242. Number of persons of school age not attending any school—male, 500; female, 458; total, 958. Number attending schools outside the district—males, 63; females, 86; total, 149. Number of districts in county, 73; number of school houses, 76; number of school houses built during the year, 7. Total number of library books on hand, 4,722; number of books purchased during the year, 786. Private schools, 1; number of teachers in private schools, 7; number of pupils enrolled in private schools, male, 78; female, 102; total, 180. Value of school houses and grounds, $135,360. Value of school furniture and fixtures, $18,896.15. Average salary of male teachers, $59.20; average salary of female teachers, $44. In the whole county of Wasco there is only one deaf mute and one blind scholar. Number of teachers employed during the year—males, 20; females, 134. Paid for teachers' wages, $36,677.16.

WASCO COUNTY

WILLIAM CATESBY LAUGHLIN, deceased. (Born December 27, 1814; died September 7, 1864.) The memory of no man is held in higher respect by the little band of pioneers now living, who took part in the early history making period of eastern Oregon, than that of County Judge William C. Laughlin. Coming to that part of Oregon, where now stands the thriving city of The Dalles, in 1850, preceded by only two or three settlers, he at once began carving out a home for himself and family. And there he resided until his death in 1864, taking a most prominent part in developing the country and building up the city of The Dalles. The few surviving neighbors of Judge Laughlin, those who were co-workers with him in the first fourteen years' history of The Dalles, never tire of telling of his sterling worth, of his kindness to his less fortunate neighbors, of his influence for good in the community. It is indeed a fitting tribute that his likeness should be a frontispiece of the history of Wasco county.

Judge Laughlin's ancestry can be traced only to early in the eighteenth century. At that time his grandfather, Thomas Laughlin, came to America from England. Tradition says that he was of scotch descent, if not a native of Scotland. No record of data can be found in Thomas Laughlin's genealogy earlier than his marriage on November 27, 1755, to Sarah Madison, a cousin of President James Madison. Eleven children were born to them, as follows: Richard (1757-1759), Joana (1758-1758), Thomas (1759—date of death unknown), Robert (1762-1788), James (1764—date of death unknown), George (1766-1801), John (1769—date of death unknown), Roger (1771-1845), Edmund (1773—date of death unknown), Simon (1776—date of death unknown), Hill (1782-1788). Thomas Laughlin died December 13, 1801. Sarah Laughlin died October 31, 1901.

The seventh son, Roger, was our subject's father. He was married to Elizabeth Woodford in 1800 and their children were Richard, Mary, Nancy, Sarah, George, Lucy, Simon, Elizabeth, William Catesby, Mark Woodford, Thomas Catesby. Roger Laughlin died January 5, 1845, and Elizabeth Laughlin died in April, 1853. Shortly after their marriage, which occurred in 1800, they moved to Kentucky, where they lived until 1832.

It was during his parents' residence in Kentucky that William Laughlin was born, the date of his birth being December 27, 1814. Here he spent his boyhood days, moving with his parents at the age of eighteen to Illinois, locating near Quincy. He worked on a farm until he gained his majority. On April 8, 1840, he was united in marriage to Mary Jane Yeargain, at the residence of her father, James Yeargain, in Illinois. This union was an exceptionally happy one, albeit the parties were destined to suffer the hardships known only to the pioneers of a new country. William Laughlin and his bride at once took up their residence in a little log cabin on a ridge running down to Mill creek, in Gilmer township, about six miles from Quincy. It was their intention to remain in Illinois only until arrangements could be made for a trip to a new home. The place they selected was Scotland county, Missouri, and after only a short residence in their first home, they loaded all their possessions onto a two-wheeled cart drawn by a yoke of oxen, and set out to seek their fortune in the west. They were brave young hearts, but with little except hope and self-reliance. Arriving at their destination after a long and toilsome journey, they built themselves a modest little home and went to work with a will that they might accumulate enough to allow them to return to Illinois. The labors and struggles of the first few years in their Missouri home were those of pioneers to a new country. They worked hard and after the first few years the fruits of their labors were apparent. They became more prosperous and a fairly good house took the place of the little one. They were held in high esteem in the community in which they lived and Mr. Laughlin for a number of years served in the capacity of justice of the peace. During their residence in Missouri their three children were born: Elizabeth, on April 29, 1841, married to Wentworth Lord January 15, 1861, now living at The Dalles, Oregon; James born February 17, 1843, died May 14, 1864; Benjamin Franklin, born January 4, 1849, married to Sarah C. Adams, March 2, 1875, now living at The Dalles.

The discovery of gold in California and the subsequent rush to the land of promise, in 1849, affected Mr. Laughlin as it did so many others who had tasted pioneer life, and arrangements were made for the long trip overland. The farm was sold and most of the personal property was sold or traded for provisions and the necessary equipment. On April 20, 1850, the family started out on their long journey across the plains, their possessions loaded into one wagon, drawn by a team of oxen. Lack of space forbids an extended account of their trip across the continent. About three weeks were consumed in crossing the state of Missouri. After crossing the river at old Fort Kearney, they were joined by three other parties and the westward trip was resumed in company. A few days later, they overtook a large train, fully organized, which had a commander and which was divided into squads for guard duty. To this, the Laughlin party did not align itself, preferring to travel in a smaller company. Fort Kearney, a little over two hundred miles from the Missouri river, was reached about May 25, and about June 1, the Platte river was crossed. Early in July they reached South Pass and twenty miles further was reached the forks of the emigrant road, one branch leading to California, the other to Oregon. Mr. Laughlin had originally intended going to California but the immigration to that country was so heavy that he decided that Oregon would offer greater advantages. So when the main party took what was known as "Sublet's cutoff," he proceeded on the road to Oregon, and the decision was never afterward regretted. A few others were bound for the same place and there was company all the way. Fort Hall was reached about the middle of August. The Grand Ronde valley was traversed for a distance and then came the Blue Mountains, which were crossed and the Umatilla river reached. At Willow creek, a government wagon, drawn by a mule team, was met, sent out to relieve the suffering immigrants. Next came the John Day river, the Deschutes, and October 4, 1850, they arrived at the military post, where now stands The Dalles.

It had been the intention to proceed by flat boat down the Columbia river from this point to the Willamette valley, there to make their future home, but it was not to be. When it came time to load their possessions on the boat, Mr. Laughlin found that the boats were already overloaded and they were obliged to remain behind. It was then decided to make a home in the vicinity of the post. A cabin was partly constructed on Crate's Point, where it was found to be on the military reservation, and had to be abandoned. The family lived in tents while Mr. Laughlin worked in the mountains making shingles for the post. Late in December, their tent was pitched on Mill creek, where the Bennett place is now. A little money having been saved from his work, Mr. Laughlin purchased a few cows and yearlings. In the spring a house was secured at the post in which to live, and board was supplied a few of the army officers. Immigration again setting in that fall, some of the stock were butchered and quite a start was made by the sale of it to the half-famished new arrivals.

In 1852 the Laughlin family and the family of Dr. Farnsworth, old time friends in Missouri, decided to go to Hood River and engage in the stock business. Each family here built a cabin. This venture was a disastrous one. The severe winter of 1852-53 killed nearly all their stock. Provisions ran short, and, isolated as they were, they had a miserable time, part of the time living on venison and potatoes only. In the spring of 1853, they returned to The Dalles. In May the government reservation was cut down and Mr. Laughlin secured a donation claim, upon which they lived in tents until a house could be erected, which was not until August. The house was replaced by a much more pretentious one in 1857.

Mr. Laughlin at once took an active part in the building up of the little town which sprang up at The Dalles and later in the organization of Wasco county. When the county was organized, he was named as one of the county commissioners. In 1856 he was elected county judge, and in 1860 and 1862 county commissioner. He was a member of the first board of trustees for The Dalles and was elected president of that body in 1855. He also served as a member of the board in 1863.

Judge Laughlin died September 7, 1864, and his wife on January 17, 1898.

We know of nothing more appropriate with which to close this sketch than a eulogy by his daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Lord, in her "Reminiscence of Eastern Oregon," recently published.

"His was a life untarnished, his honor unquestioned, truthful, honest, upright and just. A good son, a kind husband, a loving father, a generous neighbor and warm friend, naturally of an amiable and cheerful disposition, a quick temper, but unsuspecting, and slow to recognize insult; never seeking a quarrel, but once convinced that insult was meant, seldom forgiving. He embodied within himself a code of morals and high sense of right and courtesy which would stamp him in any position he might have been called to occupy as a fine type of gentleman. Rather reserved, unassuming, and yet with a dignified and gracious manner, he was always winning and attractive. His sense of humor was very keen; this, coupled with a talent for mimicry and ready wit, made him a very entertaining and amusing companion when he was in the mood to draw upon those resources."

WILLIAM R. MENEFEE, one of the oldest settlers in the country now comprising Wasco county, and a retired farmer, resides at Dufur. He was born December 5, 1823, in Rappahannock county, Virginia, at the time of his birth known as Culpeper county. He is the son of John M. and Lucy M. (Partlow) Menefee, natives of Virginia. In 1837 John L. Partlow, the brother of Lucy M. Menefee was sheriff of Rappahannock county.

In a subscription school in Virginia William R. Menefee, our subject, received his education, and in 1835 his parents removed to Henry county, Iowa. To reach this place they were obliged to travel overland with horse teams. It was in 1852 that our subject came to Oregon, and located on a donation claim in Yamhill county, but it being not entirely satisfactory he secured another claim in the Walla Walla country, Washington, and in 1855 started for that locality with his wife and two children. At The Dalles he learned of the horrible atrocities connected with the massacre of Dr. Marcus Whitman, and decided to postpone his advent into that territory. On the repeal of the donation law he came to this vicinity accompanied by seven other families. They concluded to build a fort and take up land on Fifteen Mile Creek. There were in the colony the Combs, Crooks, Bolton, Zachery, Flett, Walker and two other families. They ran up part of a stockade, but as there was no immediate trouble with the Indians completion of the stockade was abandoned. It is true that some stock was stolen, but they were not fully convinced that this was not the work of white men instead of Indians.

Until quite recently our subject has been a Republican. At present he is a Prohibitionist. For eight years he was justice of the peace, and has been school director, and was the first clerk of school district No. 2 upon its organization. He has never been an office seeker, but has always taken an active interest in party politics. For many years he followed the business of farming and stock raising, but in 1885 he disposed of his land, of which he at one time had six hundred and eighty acres, and removed into the town of Dufur. During one year he was in the hotel business, conducting the old Fifteen Mile House, and one year he was engaged in improving his town property. In company with two partners he erected a windmill and built waterworks, drawing water from the creek. These were the pioneer water works of Dufur. Later a company of eight was organized, including Mr. Menefee, and they enlarged the system, and of this plant he is now the superintendent. Since 1889 he has been a notary public. Our subject's wife owns residence lots in Dufur, and a house on Main street. Mr. Menefee had one brother, Elijah L., who died in 1875. Four sisters are deceased, Clarinda, Lucy, Sarah and Catherine.

February 8, 1849, Mr. Menefee, at Grand View, Louisa county, Iowa, was united in marriage to Nancy J. Benefiel. She has one brother living, William, in Spokane, Washington. She had three sisters, Susan, widow of Robert Ireland; Louisa and Hester, deceased. Mr. Menefee has seven children living, Henry, of Dufur; Frank; William R., a druggist in Gaston, Oregon; Mary, wife of F. M. Gilliam, of Fossil; Carrie, married to E. B. Dufur, of Goldhill, Oregon; Hannah, widow of Warren Emmerson and Evaline, widow of Hugh Moorehead. Both Mr. and Mrs. Menefee are members of the Christian church.

AUGUST DECKERT claims the distinction of having been born in Wasco county and he is a man who has shown commendable industry and integrity during the years of his career. He is the son of Gabriel and Mary (Berninger) Deckert, whose farm adjoins that of our subject and is the homestead where he first saw the light, the date being November 14, 1869. The parents are both living on the old homestead and are both natives of Germany. The father was born near Frankfort and came to the United States in 1862. After a few months spent in San Francisco, he came on to Wasco county and took the homestead which is the family place now. He added as much more by purchase and has a good place, where he has labored all the intervening years with display of great industry and thrift. Mr. Deckert has so lived that he has the approbation and respect of all and the results of his labor show him to have been wise and far-seeing. Our subject was educated in the district schools and in the academy in The Dalles. Then he married and purchased six hundred acres where he now resides. Half of this is cropped to wheat annually and he receives abundant returns. He also raises some barley and other crops. Mr. Deckert remained with his parents until the date of his marriage which occurred on February 7, 1901. Then he removed to his present place and here he has bestowed his labors since. His wife was formerly Miss Vera Simpson, and was born in Albany, Oregon. Her father, Charles D. Simpson, now dwells in Woodland, California. Mr. Deckert has one brother, Charles, with his parents; and three sisters, Mrs. Emma Odell, Mrs. Lena Hettman, and Miss Nellie. Mrs. Deckert has four half brothers, Charles, William, Norman, and four sisters, Mrs. Ethel Hunt, a widow, Mrs. Zuma Cramer, Mrs. Elva Vosburg, and Carmel. One child has come to gladden the home of Mr. and Mrs. Deckert, Ivan, aged three months. Mr. Deckert is a member of the M. W. A. and of the Red Men.

JOSEPH T. PETERS was born in Baltimore, Maryland, on June 21, 1856. His father, George H. Peters, was born in the same city and his father, the grandfather of our immediate subject, was also a native of that city, and followed contracting and building. The father married Sarah Cordray, a native of Baltimore, as were her ancestors for several generations back. Both ancestral families were prominent Americans, and were well represented in the colonial struggles and the war of independence. Concerning the youth of our subject, we are not specially informed, but as his later life shows, he was the recipient of splendid training and imbibed the stanch business principles that have won so well in the commercial realm since. He was married on November 27, 1890, at The Dalles, Oregon, to Lucy P. Wilson, whose parents, Joseph G. and Elizabeth (Miller) Wilson, are especially mentioned in another portion of this work. The children born to this marriage, are Helen A., Grace G., Elizabeth W., and Janet B. Mr. Peters has the following named brothers and sisters: Winfield, a broker in Baltimore; Helen, the wife of Ernest Nosworthy, a commercial traveller residing in Denver, Colorado; and Mary, the wife of Elijah J. Bond, an attorney in Washington, D. C. He is active for the welfare, advancement and improvement of the town and county in which he resides, has held many positions connected with public matters and is characterized by upright principles, by good business ability, and by integrity.

Mr. Peters is numbered with the leading citizens of the thriving town of The Dalles, and is a man who has left his imprint for good on the business and social world where he moves, and as a man and good citizen is respected by his many friends and associates.

More especially regarding his business career, we note that Mr. Peters came from Baltimore, Maryland, to The Dalles, in 1878. He left a position of five years standing with a large house and in The Dalles accepted a place in a lumber yard, to which new enterprise he adapted himself so well that he was soon given entire charge of the business. Less than two years later he bought out the interests of his employer and began handling lumber on commission, which was the start of his present large lumber commission business, the largest of its kind in this section. He employs at present twenty men. He is also director of The Dalles & Rockland Steam Ferry Company, being also part owner, owns and operates several wood schooners plying on the Columbia, a planing mill and box factory at The Dalles, with his lumber yard, and deals in all kinds of building material and hardware, utilized in this community. Mr. Peters personally directs all these enterprises besides caring for his other property interests he has accumulated. He is sold owner of the business although the firm name is Jos. T. Peters & Co. Having begun without capital or friends, his success but shows what an industrious and upright young man can do in Wasco county.

C. ERNEST HEMMAN, who is a man of business ability and worth, is also a leader in social lines and stands with the best people of Hood River. His present position, secretary and treasurer of the Prather Investment Company, places him in touch with the leading interests of the county and he has shown himself a man of mature judgment and wisdom in discharge of its duties. He was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on January 17, 1875, the son of Frederick and Louise (Wall) Hemman, natives of New England. They were of German ancestry, and the father died when our subject was four years of age. The mother died on September 21, 1901, at Milwaukee, Wisconsin. After completing the course in the Milwaukee public schools, Mr. Hemman took a special course in surveying and civil engineering. Then he was engaged with the Miller Manufacturing Company of Milwaukee, as chief accountant for seven years. After this extended service, he spent one year in Denver, Colorado, for his health. Then he returned to Milwaukee and eight months later journeyed thence to Oregon, where he fully recovered his health. He had endured a severe attack of pneumonia and the results of it were hard to eradicate. However, in this salubrious climate he is benefitted, therefore it was a strong reason to induce him to locate permanently here. Also the magnificent opportunities presented here led young Hemman to cast his lot with the Webfoot state. He was soon installed with Captain Charles Wanzer, assistant engineer for the O. R. & N. railroad, and for three years he wrought in that capacity. Then he accepted the position which he now fills and has given his attention to this since that time. He is a good business man, a keen financier and a trustworthy investor.

At Hood River, Oregon, on July 25, 1901, Mr. Hemman married Miss Bertha Prather, and to them one child has been born, Nellie L. Mr. Hemman is a member of the K. P. and holds the office of keeper of the records and seal of the order. Politically, he is a Republican and active in the interests of his party. He is clerk of the school board, and was treasurer of the Hood River Commercial Club. In the summer of 1903, Mr. Hemman was secretary and treasurer of the Hood River base ball team. Mr. Hemman is an active factor in the community for progress and improvement and has done much good labor to this worthy end.

HON. JOSEPH G. WILSON was born at Acworth, New Hampshire, on December 13, 1826. He was the youngest of eight children and was descended from Scotch Presbyterian ancestors, who were part of the colony of one hundred families of Scotch Calvinists that settled in the town of Londonderry, New Hampshire, as early as 1719. His parents, Samuel and Sallie Wilson, with their family removed to Cincinnati in 1828 and later settled on a farm near Reading in Hamilton county. Joseph G. attended district school until fourteen years of age, when he became a student in Cary's academy where he remained until sixteen, in which year he entered the sophomore class in Marietta college. This was in the autumn of 1843. In 1846 he graduated from that institution, the event being marked by a beautiful and brilliant oration, one of the best gems ever pronounced from the college platform. Three years later he returned to his alma mater and received his second degree, and in 1865 it conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws. Following his graduation, Mr. Wilson was a professor in Farmer's college, near Cincinnati, where his labors received high commendation. In 1850 he left his birth place and traveled through the New England states. In 1852 he graduated at the Cincinnati Law School and was admitted to the bar. In the same year he went to Oregon where he commenced the practice of law and soon took rank as an able advocate and advanced to various positions until he was judge of the highest court in the state and served in that capacity eight years. He was a man of keen and penetrating mind, never swerved from dispensing absolute justice, by either political or other influences, and the result was that he held the position in the hearts of the people never shadowed by any other incumbent of the supreme bench. In 1870 he made a race for congress and came near being elected. At the next election he gained it by a handsome majority and was installed as the representative from Oregon in the forty-third congress.

Hon. Joseph G. Wilson was elected by the alumni of Marietta college to deliver the annual oration in July, 1873. On the second of July he was struck suddenly with paralysis and died in the city of Marietta, Ohio, before his oration was delivered. As a most untimely stroke, viewed from the human side, came this sudden death of one of the most brilliant men ever graduated from Marietta College and one of the most staunch and worthy statesmen that the west had produced. It was one of those events in human existence which reason can never compass and to which faith bids us bow in silent acquiescence. From the rude pioneer hamlets amid the hills of Oregon to the halls of the chief legislative body of the United States, came cries of sorrow at this great and good man's demise and sincere weeping and mourning were prevalent with every class who knew him. He was laid to rest with becoming honors, surrounded by representatives from every station in life, on July 3, 1873, in the college town of Marietta, Ohio. Of him one said, "His memory and the memory of his deeds will outlive eulogies and survive monuments."

"He has outsoared the shadow of our night;
 Envy and calumny, and hate and pain,
 And that unrest which men miscall delight,
 Can touch him not and torture not again."

Mr. Wilson left a wife and four children. The children are Genevieve, the wife of F. P. Mays, an attorney residing in Portland, Oregon;

Grace G., the wife of Charles W. Taylor, a railroad man in Grenville, Wyoming; Lucy P., the wife of Joseph T. Peters, a lumber merchant at The Dalles; Frederick W., an attorney living with his mother at The Dalles. He graduated first from Whitman College at Walla Walla and in 1893 from Johns Hopkins University. The widow of Hon. Joseph G. Wilson was, in maiden life, Elizabeth Miller. She was born at South Argyle, New York, on June 8, 1830. Her father, James O. Miller, was born in Western Pennsylvania and was a Presbyterian preacher. He also took a great interest in the west, having become enthused by the reports of Lewis and Clark and as early as 1851, came via the isthmus of Panama to the Willamette valley, where he settled. He was soon installed the pastor of a church, and proclaimed the gospel faithfully until April, 1854, when he was killed by the explosion of the Gazelle. He had married Amanda Davisson, who was born in Lawrenceburg, Indiana, and came to Oregon with her husband. After his death she removed to Washington, D. C., and resided with her daughter, Mrs. Kelley, until her death. The Davissons are an old American family of Welsh descent, distinguished through many generations. Mrs. Welsh's paternal grandfather was a native of Ireland and followed the avocation of farming.

Mrs. Wilson received her education in New York and there remained until 1851, when she came to Oregon as one of the teachers sent out by the national board of public instructions. She followed the work of the educator until 1854, when she married Joseph G. Wilson, whose life has been mentioned in the earlier part of this article. After her husband's death, Mrs. Wilson returned to The Dalles, Oregon, where she has made her home since. During the years since, she has been occupied in educational and literary work and is one of the most prominent ladies of the state of Oregon. Mrs. Wilson has one brother, James Franklin, who was killed by the Apache Indians in Arizona; and two sisters, Ella, the widow of General Cuvier Groner, living in Rome, Italy; and Mary, widow of the late Senator James K. Kelley, of Washington, D. C.

GRIFFITH E. WILLIAMS, deceased. The subject of the following memoir, late of The Dalles, Oregon, was a prosperous and progressive merchant of that city. He was born in Wales about 1835, the son of Evan and Phoebe (Roberts) Williams. Both of the parents died when our subject was nine years of age, and he came to the United States with his brothers and sisters, arriving at the port of New Orleans. The father of our subject was a farmer near Bedd-Gelert, of an ancient and distinguished family in Wales. The father was a life-long student, and possessed considerable literary ability. On the death of the parents of our subject the estate was sold and the proceeds divided among the children, of whom there were nine. The share of Griffith E. Williams supported and educated him until he was thirteen years of age. At that period he left his brother and learned the trade of a cabinet-maker, which he successfully followed in Dodgeville, Wisconsin, until 1852, when he crossed the plains with a brother, Robert B., who died en route.

Our subject continued on to Portland, Oregon, where he found employment in a sawmill, remaining two years, at which period the mill was destroyed by fire. He had drawn but little of his two years' earnings, and he lost it all. He then purchased a cayuse and outfit and went to Yreka, California, where he was employed two years building cabins for the miners in that locality. Returning to Oregon he was employed in different mills in that state, and in 1862 went to The Dalles, accompanied by his wife, and for many years subsequently was in the employment of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, engaged in car building. At the same period he was associated with Mr. Edward Wingate in the hardware business, the latter conducting the enterprise while our subject remained in the employment of the company. The business, however, soon increased to an extent warranting the attention of both gentlemen, and he assumed an active management of the affairs of the hardware firm. On the death of Mr. Wingate he continued the business for himself and widow of his former partner. Gradually the hardware store was merged into a general merchandise business. Mr. Williams died March 6, 1886. He was a member of the city council and throughout life was a staunch Republican.

At Beaver Creek, near Oregon City, May 26, 1860, Mr. Williams was married to Anna M. Marshall, born in London, England, March 26, 1846. She was the daughter of George and Mary Spencer Marshall, the father a native of Staffordshire, and the mother of Hull, England. The father died at Southampton, England, when Mrs. Williams was six years of age. Her maternal grandfather was a gentleman farmer, and his daughter, the mother of Mrs. Williams, passed many years in Paris. There she married and lived four years longer, then returned to England with her husband. He died in Southampton, England, when subject was about six years old. They came to the United States, the widow and children, settled in Chicago, remaining until 1852 when the mother married William Harmon. They then crossed the plains, the party consisting of subject, three brothers, mother and step-father. The journey to The Dalles occupied six months and ten days. Indians stole their horses and their cattle died for want of water. The party wearily walked the last six hundred miles, having only one yoke of cattle left. The mother, being crippled, rode with a two year old step-child in the one remaining wagon. They were scantily provided with provisions, had endured many hardships, yet withal they arrived at The Dalles in comparatively good health. Pushing on to Portland they remained two weeks, and then located at Oregon City. Here the step-father, who was a skilled mechanic, procured employment in a foundry and blacksmith shop. He was a distinguished temperance worker, and was known as "Father Harmon" throughout the northwest. He died in 1890. Mrs. Williams has two brothers living, John Marshall, former chief engineer of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, now retired, engaged in the real estate business in Portland; and Edward T., of Sturgis City, North Dakota. Our subject left nine surviving children, Jeanette, wife of Arthur G. Dunn, of the firm of Ainsworth & Dunn, Seattle; Edward M., mentioned elsewhere; Griffith C., of Spokane; Mary E., married to Russell E. Sewell, an attorney at Portland; Annie G., wife of H. W. French, of Wapinitia; Pearl E., wife of Dr. George Marshall; Carl P., of The Dalles; Robert A., a student at the college of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City; Florence J., living at home; Grace (deceased). Mrs. Williams has one sister, Mary E., widow of Webster A. Clark, of Chicago.

ALBERT WHITEHEAD is proprietor of the popular and well patronized cigar store in Hood River. He was born in Canton, Illinois, on June 1, 1870, the son of Savill and Hannah (Ogden) Whitehead, natives of Oldham, Lancashire, England. The father came to the United States in 1850 and settled in Canton, Illinois, where he followed his trade as mechanic. During the Civil War he was assistant engineer in the United States Navy. He died at Canton, Illinois, in 1898, aged seventy-four. The mother still lives at Canton, Illinois. Our subject studied in the public schools until twelve years of age then entered the employ of Parlin and Orendorff, Plow Company. One year later, he began to learn the cigar maker's trade and attended the commercial college in the evenings. For about fourteen years, he continued cigar making, then spent one year in market gardening. He also traveled on the road for a produce house for some time. In February, 1900, he came to Hood River and entered the employ of the Davidson Fruit Company. Then he opened a cigar store and restaurant. A month later he sold the restaurant and kept the cigar store which he has handled since. Mr. Whitehead is a genial and generous man who has hosts of friends and stands well in the community.

In March, 1897, at Canton, Illinois, Mr. Whitehead married Miss Amanda B. Davidson, a native of Ohio and sister of Horatio F. Davidson, president of the Davidson Fruit Company, named elsewhere. Mr. Whitehead has two brothers: Joseph E., at Colorado Springs; and Elmer E., at Fairview, Illinois, editor of the Fairview Bee; and two sisters: Mary, the wife of B. R. Bogle, a real estate man of Chicago, and Ida M., the wife of Charles Chaffee, a railroad contractor in Canton, Illinois. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Whitehead, Mariwhitmer.

Mr. Whitehead is a member of the K. P. and the United Artisans.

Recently Mr. Whitehead sold his cigar store and has become a member of the Davidson Fruit Company, being vice president of the same.

FRANK MENEFEЕ, District Attorney of the Seventh Judicial District of Oregon, of the firm of Menefee & Wilson, resides at The Dalles, where he was born January 31, 1866. He is the son of William R. and Nancy J. (Benefiel) Menefee, the father a native of Virginia and the mother of Indiana, who are mentioned also in this volume. William R. Menefee is from an old and distinguished Virginia family. Jonas Menefee, one of the ancestors, was a lieutenant in the British army, under Captain John Smith, whose life was saved by the Indian maiden, Pocahontas. He married Captain Smith's sister, Hannah. The Menefees were, a majority of them, planters. At the present day the members of the later generation are prominent in judicial circles and in commercial life, throughout Virginia and elsewhere.

Frank Menefee, our subject, was reared in Wasco county on his father's stock ranch. He was educated at the Wasco Independent Academy, at The Dalles, read law with E. B. Dufur, commencing in 1887, and in 1889 was admitted to practice. He was elected city recorder in 1891, served two years, and then formed a law partnership with E. B. Dufur, which was continued until 1900. At that period he was elected district attorney and entered into a law partnership with Fred W. Wilson. Mr. Menefee has served two terms as mayor of The Dalles, in 1895 and 1896. Politically he is a staunch and influential member of the Republican party, has frequently been a delegate to county conventions, and was two years chairman of the McKinley Club, and two years a member of the county Republican central committee.

January 6, 1903, at St. Paul, Minnesota, our subject was united in marriage to Mabel C. Cowles, born in Chardon, Ohio. Her father, Clifford S. Cowles, is general agent of the Royal Insurance Company, residing at St. Paul, Minnesota. The mother, Eliza B. (Canfield) Cowles, a native of Chardon, Ohio, is with her husband. Mrs. Menefee has one sister, Mary, wife of Harry B. Humason, assistant cashier of the American National Bank, St. Paul, Minnesota. Mr. Menefee is a member of Friendship Lodge, No. 9, K. of P., of which he is Past C. C., and also a member of the grand lodge; Cascade Lodge No. 303, B. P. O. E., at The Dalles; Wasco Tribe No. 16, I. O. R. M., of which he is Past Sachem, and has been Keeper of Wampum since its organization; the W. O. T. W.; the K. O. T. M. and the Rathbone Sisters.

NATHANIEL W. WALLACE, deceased. No man had a better claim to be classed as a pioneer and builder of Wasco county, if honest efforts and continuity are to be reckoned, than Nathaniel W. Wallace. His memory is cherished by the old timers of central Oregon and he was one of the stanch men of the country, whose life is wound up in and interwoven with the history of this part of the state. He was born in Miami county, Ohio, on May 23, 1832, the son of Ephriam and Elizabeth Wallace, natives of Ohio. The father's parents were also born in Ohio and came from Scotch ancestry. When Nathaniel was a child the family came to Illinois, and a few years later they all journeyed to Iowa, where the father died. The mother then married John Smales. Our subject remained at home until twenty, then came across the plains with ox teams to the Willamette valley. After a short stop in Portland, he located in Yamhill county whence he removed to Washington county, later. On February 21, 1856, he married Miss Sarah Naught, a native of Schuyler county, Illinois, being born on March 5, 1836. Her parents, John and Elizabeth (Gholston) Naught, natives of Kentucky and Virginia, respectively, married in Illinois, and crossed the plains to Yamhill county in 1853. The ancestors of both parents were born in Virginia for some generations back, and were stanch Americans. Our subject and his wife dwelt a short time in Washington county then returned to Yamhill county. In 1864, they came to The Dalles and for four years Mr. Wallace conducted a blacksmith shop there. Then they lived two and one half years on Current creek in Crook county, still continuing blacksmithing, and also handling stock. After that they returned to The Dalles for three years and in 1872, came hither. They were in The Dalles in the early sixties when the smallpox raged, and Mr. Wallace was occupied much of the time in carrying patients to the hospital and his wife in nursing them. They took up land near where Antelope now stands, and raised cattle, farmed, did blacksmithing, and conducted a road house. He was active until 1897, handling cattle and horses and doing blacksmithing, then retired from business. Mr. Wallace kept the first postoffice here and had it named Antelope long before the town was started. N. R. Baird moved his store to the town site he had platted and Mr. Wallace brought his blacksmith shop to the same place, and so the town started. Mr. Wallace saw the need of a hotel and so erected the Union house, which they conducted for nearly twenty years.

Finally, on September 11, 1904, Mr. Wallace responded to the summons of death and departed after an illness of four months. He had one sister, Temperance, the widow of T. C. Rice, of Hood River: Mrs. Wallace has two brothers: Francis M., retired in Oregon City; and Benjamin, in Whitman county, Washington; and three sisters Cynthia, the wife of Elmer Knight at St. John, Oregon; Martha; and Jane, the wife of James Turner, a mining man of Kendrick, Idaho. Mr. and Mrs. Wallace had six children: Frederick N., a bookkeeper in Hay Creek, for the Hay Creek Company; Charles H., near Antelope; Olivia, wife of Jay P. Lucas, a merchant of Goldendale, Washington; Minnie L., the wife of George A. Herbert, a mining man and hotel keeper in Cornucopia, Oregon; Jessie, the wife of James H. Oakes, a merchant and sheep raiser, in Wheeler county; and Annie L., the wife of Charles Winnek, a druggist in Prineville. Mr. Wallace was a member of the A. F. & A. M. many years in The Dalles, and at Antelope. He and his wife were both active members of the O. E. S., while in political matters, he was a Democrat. They both belonged to the Methodist church and he was an active worker in fraternal and general matters. Mr. Wallace was five months in service in the Yakima war with the Indians, under Captain Hayden and Colonel Armstrong. Just before his death he secured his pension. For many years Mr. Wallace was an intimate friend of Samuel Brooks, and was a great worker for the Masonic order. He had hosts of friends and his demise was mourned far and near. Mrs. Wallace is a lady of graces and has done a noble work in the many years she has lived here, assisting to build up and improve the country, besides raising an interesting family.

EDWIN T. GLISAN, who has the distinction of being one of the earliest pioneers to many sections in the west, and now residing on his estate of one half section, one and one fourth miles southeast from Antelope, was born in Erie county, New York, on July 12, 1835. His father, Solomon Glisan, was born in Maryland, as were his parents, and their parents were also American born. The mother of our subject, Mary (Taylor) Glisan, was also born in Maryland as were her parents. Our subject's parents came to Iowa in 1844 and the father traded his New York home for a place in Henry county, Iowa, near Hillsboro. For eight years they lived there and Edward was educated in the public schools and the West Point school in Lee county, that state, which was taught by his brother, James. After that he was on the farm with his parents who removed to Missouri in 1852. In the spring of 1853, he fitted out and came west to Oregon. He had two brothers precede him in that journey, they going in 1850. One came back from California and the other returned from Oregon. In 1854, Frank took a drove of cattle, while his elder brother, John, remained in Missouri. Our subject was with a party of neighbors and wended his way with ox teams to Salem, then went to the mines near Jacksonville, where he spent a few months in seeking the riches of the earth. Then he went to Cottonwood just south of the Oregon line in California. After wintering there he sold his interests to the other members of the party and came to Scottsburg, Oregon. A year was spent on the steamer for Allen McKinley & Company, then went to Salem, joining his brother, Frank. In the fall they went to Barker's Bay, mouth of the Columbia, with James D. Holman, the father of the Holman Brothers, of Portland. Returning to Salem the following September, he enlisted in Company F, First Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Captain Charles Bennett, and Colonel J. W. Nesmith, and served eight months. He now draws a pension for this service. Returning to Salem after the war, he handled stock for a year, then spent four years with his brother, Frank, conducting the old Union House in Salem. On June 17, 1860, he married Miss Minnie Starkey, who was born in Zanesville, Ohio, on May 15, 1844. Her father, John Starkey, was born in Pennsylvania, coming from old Dutch stock, and his ancestors were prominent in the colonial wars, in the Revolution and in the War of 1812. All of the Starkeys in the United States come from this same family. John Starkey married Miss Jane Scott, a native of Ohio, where her parents were also born. They were related to General Winfield Scott. Mrs. Glisan's father came to Oregon in 1845, returned to Iowa, whither the family had removed when this daughter was an infant. In 1849 he returned to California and in 1852 sent for his family and met them at The Grande Ronde with fresh teams, returning to Salem. He built the first large frame house in Salem; in partnership with Joseph Holman, built and opened the first store there and later built a brick structure, still standing in Salem, and known as the Starkey block. He was a prominent and influential citizen and took great interest in building up and improving the country. His health failed and on November 3, 1872, he died from consumption. His widow died January 29, 1878. Mrs. Glisan had one brother, Winfield Scott Starkey, who died in Iowa, and also has one sister, Ella, the widow of Robert Bybee, who was one of the first settlers in East Portland, and a prominent man there. He was associated with Hen Halliday. She also had two sisters, deceased, Nettie, who died from injuries received in a railroad accident at Salem, in the Lake Lobish wreck, on November 7, 1893; and Mary, the wife of James Fisher, who died at The Dalles, March 26, 1880, from consumption. Mr. Glisan had three brothers: Frank, a mining man at Sumpter, Oregon; Albert, who died in Sumpter, being caught in a mine cave in; and John, who lives in Missouri, a plow manufacturer. Mr. and Mrs. Glisan have ten children, named as follows: Edward, a painter and undertaker in Antelope; William, a blacksmith at Hay Creek; Albert, a restaurant keeper in Weaverville, California; Benjamin, a sheepman in Lake county, this state; Eugene, a warehouseman in Shaniko; Robert, who runs the home ranch; Mable, wife of James Warren, at Prosser, Washington; Nettie, wife of William Kemp, a contractor and builder in Pendleton; Bessie, at home, aged eighteen; Inez, formerly the wife of Horace Gamble, and now single. Glisan street, Portland, is named after our subject's first cousin, Dr. R. Glisan.

After marriage Mr. Glisan went to the Florence and Orofino mining districts and in 1862 returned to Salem and conducted a farm owned by his father-in-law. After the death of that gentleman, Mrs. Glisan inherited the place and they remained there until 1881, then came to Antelope. Mr. Glisan went into the sheep business with Sol Durbin two years and then removed to the vicinity of Shaniko and raised sheep until he came to this place in 1886. This estate consists of one-half section and produces good grain and hay. Mrs. Glisan is a member of the Episcopal church and her father, when in Salem, was in business with David McCully, the father of the McCullys in Wallowa county, this state; and also with E. N. Cook, Walter Smith, and Charles Cartwright, all old pioneers. Mr. Glisan is a Republican, and although stanch, is not especially active. He took a more prominent part in this line in Salem than here. He and his wife are kindly and genial people and have many friends. They have walked the way of life for many years and may look back with pride on the work they have achieved.

HON. JOHN N. WILLIAMSON, congressman from the second district, Oregon, and a prominent stock-raiser of Crook county, resides at The Dalles. He is a native of Oregon, having been born in Lane county, November 8, 1855, the son of Joseph and Minerva A. (Wilson) Williamson. The father, a native of Ohio, traversed the plains with ox teams so early as 1852, and settled on a half section of donation land in Lane county. His parents were Pennsylvanians, of an old and distinguished American family of Scotch descent. Joseph Williamson died in 1869 at Salem, Oregon. The mother was a native of Indiana, was married in Iowa, and one week later began the perilous journey across the plains with her husband. She died in Portland, in 1901, at the age of seventy-three.

The Willamette valley was the scene of our subject's youthful exploits, and when he was eight years old his family removed to Salem. His education began in the graded schools, and this was supplemented by a classical course in Willamette University at Salem. In 1876 he removed to Prineville, then in Wasco county, where he engaged in stock-raising and farming. From 1893 to 1896 he owned and edited the Prineville Review, which he disposed of and returned to the stock business. Mr. Williamson and his business partner, Dr. Van Gesner, own a stock farm in Crook county, and winter from seven thousand five hundred to ten thousand head of sheep. In 1886 he was elected sheriff of Crook county, serving one term. In the spring of 1888 he was elected to the lower house of the state legislature, served one term, and retired from the political field until 1898, when he was returned to the legislative house of representatives, and in 1900 elected joint senator from the counties of Wasco, Crook, Lake and Klamath. In the spring of 1902 Mr. Williamson was elected to congress from the second Oregon district. He has been prominently identified with the Republican party since he cast his first vote.

For the purpose of educating his children our subject and his family reside temporarily at The Dalles. He has one half brother, Jefferson F., a stock-raiser in Malheur county; one sister, Anna, wife of S. E. Starr, a farmer residing near Wasco; and one half sister, Sarah, widow of Dr. Jay W. Shipley, of Morrow county. January 16, 1882, Mr. Williamson was married to Sarah V. Forrest, born in Polk county, Oregon. The ceremony was solemnized at Albany, Oregon. Mrs. Williamson's father, Moses Forrest, came to Oregon about 1852, crossing the plains with ox teams, and taking a donation claim. He died a few months before she was born. Her mother, Madelia (Neeley) Forrest, accompanied her husband across the plains, and now resides at The Dalles, the wife of F. H. Wakefield. Mrs. Williamson has one brother, Frank, a farmer and stock-raiser near Prineville, and two half brothers, Edwin and Erwin, twins, Crook county stock raisers. She has three sisters; Hettie, wife of J. L. Kelly, a farmer residing near The Dalles; Ida and Effie, residing with their parents at The Dalles.

Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Williamson, Jennie F., Katie Z. and Edra E., aged nineteen, seventeen and fourteen, respectively. They are living at home. Our subject is a Scottish rite mason, of the thirty-second degree, a member of Portland Consistory; Prineville Lodge, No. 76, A. F. & A. M., Al-Kader Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, of Portland; Prineville Lodge K. of P., of which he is past C. C.; the A. O. U. W., and O. E. S., Prineville Chapter, of which he is past patron. Mr. Williamson is one of the best known men in Oregon, and has led an eventful and useful life, being a progressive, broad-minded citizen, and patriotically interested in all that makes for the welfare of his native state.

CHARLES BERNARD is one of the wealthy farmers and stockmen of Wasco county and resides about four miles out from The Dalles at the forks of Eight Mile and Ten Mile creeks. He was born in France, on January 5, 1866, the son of Charles and Josephus (Rons) Bernard, both natives of France. The former died in 1889 and the latter in 1881. The father followed carpentering and farming. Our subject was brought up in his native country and there received his education. In the spring of 1883, he came to Los Angeles, California, via New York and there began herding sheep, continuing until 1886, when he went to Kern county, California, and did the same business. After that, we find him two years in Reno, Nevada, herding sheep and then he began sheep raising for himself. A year later, he sold out there and came to Crook county, Oregon, and embarked in the sheep industry which he continued steadily until the time he came to Wasco county and purchased a farm where he now resides. The deal was closed for this property in 1902. It consists of two thousand six hundred acres, three hundred of which are choice tillable land. The balance is used for pasture and gardening. Mr. Bernard has something over two thousand head of sheep in Crook county now where he also owns eight hundred acres of land. He has one place well improved and handles from sixty to one hundred head of cattle and is one of the most successful stockmen of the country.

At Prineville, Oregon, on October 1, 1891, Mr. Bernard married Miss Rosa Delore, who was born at Wapinitia, Wasco county, Oregon. Her father, Peter Delore, was born in Oregon. His father came from Canada to this country in very early day and was a trapper and hunter for the Hudson Bay Company. He was one of the first settlers in the Willamette valley and there remained until his death. Mrs. Bernard's father married Miss Coyce, who died at Wapinitia when this daughter was four years of age. The father still lives in Grant county and although about ninety years of age, he is still vigorous and hearty. During the early days, he was prominent in the Indian wars and was a noted trapper and hunter. Mr. Bernard has the following named brothers and sisters, Joseph, Peter, August, Baptiste, Alexander, Bazil, and Mrs. Mary Senecal. To our subject and his wife the following children have been born, Andrew, Henry, Naomi, and Ivy.

Mr. Bernard is a member of the I. O. O. F., the W. W. and the Order of Washington. He is an active Republican and at the present time is school director in his district. Mr. and Mrs. Bernard are members of the Roman Catholic church and are good substantial people. He is a man of marked thrift and energy and has shown his ability in the accumulation of the vast property that he now owns.

J. FRANKLIN FULTON is a native born son of Wasco county, and one, too, that brings credit on his birthplace. He is a young man of industrious habits and sound principles and has dwelt in the place of his birth since. He has achieved a good success here and now owns a fine estate of one section of land about fifteen miles east from the Dalles, on Fifteenmile creek. The place is well improved, has five hundred acres of wheat land and is laid under tribute to produce bounteous crops each year. Mr. Fulton has usually about thirty hogs, some twenty or more horses and as many cattle, and he usually raises considerable wheat, although he is a diversified farmer.

On the old Cooper place, on Tenmile, J. Franklin Fulton was born, on November 28, 1867. Mr. Cooper was grandfather to the little Oregonian and the parents of the lad were James and Georgeann (Foss) Fulton. He was reared in this vicinity and his education was begun in the school in district No. 16, and finished in the schools in The Dalles, both public and private. The interims between periods of study were spent on the farm and in riding the range, both in Oregon and in Washington, and he remained with his parents thus until twenty-five years of age. In 1900, Mr. Fulton had been so prospered that he was justified in purchasing the farm where he now dwells. It consists of one-half section of land and he settled on the same the following year. In that year he bought another half section which corners the first one and they now constitute his estate. Mr. Fulton brings an industry and mature judgment to combine in the good work of improving this estate and making it one of the choice and valuable homes of the country and he is meeting with the success that these virtues deserve.

October 30, 1898, was the glad day when Mr. Fulton took to himself a wife, Miss Lillian Hurlburt being the lady of his choice. The wedding occurred in The Dalles. Mrs. Fulton was born in La Crosse, Wisconsin, on April 26, 1876, the daughter of Daniel R. and Catherine (Miller) Hurlburt. The father was born in Michigan and his father was a pioneer of that territory and was killed by a falling tree when this son was twelve years old. When Daniel R. grew up he married and his family now dwell in Portland. He has for the past twelve years been keeper of the light house at the mouth of the Willamette river. His wife was born in Germany and came to the United States with her parents when three years old. In 1852 her parents came to Kansas and later settled in Iowa, and at Burlington, that state she was married. Mrs. Fulton has the following named brothers and sisters, Walter B., Elmer A., Leon L., Arthur P., Mrs. Flora Bunn, Mrs. Ida M. Shaw, Katie and Rosie M. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Fulton, Glenn, aged three, and an infant unnamed. Mr. Fulton is a Democrat but not especially active.

He takes a keen interest in the affairs of education and in all movements for the progress and upbuilding of the country.

CAPTAIN HENRY C. COE, a capitalist of Hood River and Portland, Oregon, is one of the best known men in the state of Oregon. From the earliest days until the present time, he has been closely identified with the upbuilding of the whole northwest and has been an active and aggressive worker along lines which have resulted in the most important improvements and upbuilding in the entire northwest. His labors and those of his brothers can not be separated from the opening and upbuilding of the country because they are a part and parcel of the history of the country itself and in the volume that treats of the Inland Empire and of the Pacific coast, mention is sure to be made of the large enterprises that they inaugurated and conducted.

Henry C. Coe was born in Livingston county, New York, on August 11, 1844. His father, Nathaniel Coe, was a native of New Jersey, born in 1788, and his parents were natives of England. He was captain of a company in the War of 1812 and a well known patriot. In 1851 he came to Oregon as a representative of the postoffice department, being special postal agent, embracing the territory from California to British Columbia. He continued in this capacity for four years, or until the election of Pierce. After that, he came from Portland to Hood River with his family. Later, he filed on a donation claim which was the family home for many years. In 1868 he died. He had married Miss Mary White, who was born in New York city in 1801. Her father was a native of England and her mother of New York city. Our subject was educated in the university at Forest Grove, entering when he was nineteen years of age, and after completing his course he went to work on the river from deck hand to master of the craft, and has filled every position on board the river boat and knows the business thoroughly. He took out master's papers in 1877 and has been on the river more or less since the time he first started. In 1869 he inaugurated a side venture of cattle raising in the Yakima county, Washington, and continued the same for five years. During this long period of active business life, a man of Captain Coe's energy and wisdom could but amass a large fortune which has been the gratifying result of his labors. He owns a cosy and beautiful home in Portland, where the family remain most of the time, besides a large amount of property at Hood River and in other places. Owing to his extensive property interests in various sections, Captain Coe spends considerable time in their oversight and therefore is away from home a great deal.

On March 17, 1869, Captain Coe married Miss Kittie Catton, born in Independence, Iowa. She was the daughter of Benjamin and Ellen (Chandler) Catton, natives of New York, and from old and prominent families of the Empire State. The mother came here, via the isthmus, in 1867, her daughter and brother accompanying her. The father enlisted to fight in the Civil war and was killed in battle shortly after his enlistment. To Captain Coe and his wife, five children have been born: Katherine, wife of Lindsley Hoyt, a marine engineer at Portland, Oregon; Irma, a music teacher, living at home in Portland; Nell, a school girl in Portland; Mollie L. and Charles E., deceased. Captain Coe had one brother, Lawrence W., who died in San Francisco in 1899. He was one of the leading river men in Oregon, and with Captain R. R. Thompson built the first steamer on the upper rivers, and with Thompson, Reed and Ainsworth, organized the Oregon Steamship and Navigation Company, which did more to assist in the settlement of the country tributary to the upper Columbia and Snake than any one other enterprise in the Inland Empire. Lawrence W. Coe was the chief owner. One brother of our subject was Charles Coe, who died in 1870. He was chief clerk in the Oregon Steamship and Navigation Company's office at The Dalles. Still another brother was Eugene F., who died at Portland in 1893. He was for many years captain with the Oregon Steamship and Navigation Company, commencing in 1861. When that company sold out to the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company he remained in their employ for some years, then entered the employ of the government on river work.

Captain Coe is a member of the I. O. O. F., the K. of P., and the A. O. U. W. He has passed through the chairs in these orders and is popular and influential.

Politically, he is a Republican and although never anxious for personal preferment, he has been active in the conventions and is known as a man of prominence and prestige in political matters. He assisted to organize the Hood River school district. Upon his father's death, the old homestead was left to his widow and our subject and his brother, Eugene, bought it from her. He built the city of Hood River on this land and from time to time added various tracts until he has now but fourteen acres of the original farm left. Captain Coe is a man of indomitable will and determination, yet kind and genial, and possessed of that excellent judgment and oversight which have made him the successful person he is today. He is well known to every one in this portion of the country, is a familiar figure and can be seen active in the business today as in the years gone by, when he assisted so materially to build up the country. His labors have never abated and in addition to gaining the magnificent property that he owns today, he has intrenched himself in the hearts and love of the people, so that he is the recipient of their admiration, good will and affection.

THEODORE C. DALLAS was a well known business man of Hood River and operated a tinning and plumbing shop there. He did a nice business and stood well throughout the community. He was a genial, public spirited, generous man and had hosts of friends. For many years, he dwelt at Hood River and was really one of the builders of the country. He was born in Lagrange county, Indiana, on February 5, 1854. His father, Joseph S. Dalles, was born in Preble county, Ohio, and his father, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Pennsylvania. That gentleman's father, the great-grandfather of our subject, came from England and amassed a large fortune in the Carolinas but later in life lost it all. His son, the grandfather of our subject, was an Indiana pioneer and located in the wilds, seventy-five miles out from where Fort Wayne is now, which was their nearest postoffice. He erected a sawmill and did a large business and a good work in opening up the country. Our subject's father was a farmer in Lagrange county, Indiana and there died in 1884. He was a first cousin to the Mr. Dalles, who was vice-president in Polk's administration. Our subject's mother was Emily (Clark) Dallas, a native of New York. She died on the old homestead in Lagrange county, Indiana, in 1861. For twelve years, our subject lived in Indiana, then went to Michigan where he remained until twenty-three. He was educated in the district schools in these two states, then went to Iowa, where he worked for wages. After that, he returned to the old home place in the east and was with his father and stepmother until 1886 when he came to California. Various enterprises employed him for sometime, when he journeyed north to Hood River in 1888. He was occupied in different callings until 1893, when he opened a tinning shop. Not being master of the business himself, it required considerable ingenuity and pluck on the part of Mr. Dallas to start in this business. However, he hired skilled operators and learned from them until he became master of the tinning and plumbing trades. Since that time, he has continued uninterruptedly in the prosecution of these allied occupations and is doing a good business today. Mr. Dallas was never married. He had one sister, Osola, the widow of George W. Burke and one half sister, Charlotte, wife of George W. Cone, a farmer in Middle valley, Illinois.

Mr. Dallas was a member of the K. O. T. M. and the United Artisans. He was a staunch Republican but not especially active.

In May, 1904, Mr. Dallas was called hence by death.

PETER STOLLER lives near the forks of Five and Ten Mile creeks and is one of the prosperous men of Wasco county. His thrift and enterprise have accumulated the property that he now owns as he started without capital. He was born in Switzerland, on November 27, 1862. His father, Peter Stoller, was born in the same country and came to the United States in 1865. He resided in Illinois and Iowa until 1877, when he brought his family to Klickitat county, Washington, and lived there near Trout Lake until 1890 when he moved to Marion county, Oregon, where he resides at the present time. He married Miss Margaret Ritter, a native of Switzerland, who now resides with her husband. She is eighty years of age and her husband is seventy-five. Our subject was educated in Iowa, Illinois, and Klickitat county, Washington, and did farm work during the early days of his life. When about twenty-four, he began raising cattle, having saved his earnings to buy a band of heifers with. He was being prospered nicely at this business until the hard winter swept away his stock leaving him almost penniless. Then he went to work on the farm again, this time in Polk county, until he saved money enough to get another start. Then he came to Wasco county and took a homestead. Later, he traded that for the place where he now resides, having now two hundred and sixty-four acres. He handles some stock, cultivates one hundred acres of land and is a prosperous man. He expects soon to increase the acreage as he wishes the range more exclusively in both farming and stock raising. Mr. Stoller is raising some very nice O. I. C. hogs.

On April 21, 1892, at Portland, Mr. Stoller married Louise Mayer, a native of Germany and the daughter of John Mayer, who died in Germany. Mrs. Stoller's mother also died in Germany, when this daughter was but six years of age. Mrs. Stoller has the following named brothers, John, Ludwig and Carl. Mr. Stoller has three sisters, Mrs. Marguerite Stadelman, Mrs. Susan Pearson and Mrs. Lyddia Stoller. To our subject and his wife, two children have been born, Ludwig and Lena. Mr. Stoller is a member of the M. W. A. and they both belong to the Baptist church. He is an active Republican and has served both as school director and road supervisor. Mr. Stoller is a genial man, well spoken of and possessed of integrity and public spirit. The improvements upon his place are tasty and neat and everything indicates a man of thrift and enterprise.

WILLIAM BROOKHOUSE was born in Wasco county, on February 22, 1864. The place was the farm owned by his parents on Tenmile creek, which is in the family now. His father, Richard Brookhouse, married Miss Ann J. Clark, and they were both natives of Ireland. The father came to the United States in the fifties, worked in the coal mines of Pennsylvania for four years, then came to the mines in the west and in 1860 came to the vicinity of The Dalles, and that winter is said to have been the coldest since the white men lived here. He took a homestead on Tygh ridge which he relinquished to his brother, and then bought out James and Thomas Woolery on Tenmile creek, the place being three hundred and twenty acres. Here our subject was born and reared. When fifteen he was called to mourn the death of his father and then he was brought face to face with the responsibilities of assisting to make a living for the family. The mother came to Oregon shortly after her husband did and her marriage occurred at The Dalles, where she now dwells. William remained on the place except two years in stock raising in the Big Bend country, Washington, where he lost all by a hard winter, returning to the home place with no money and thirty dollars of debts. With his brothers he operated the home place until recently and then purchased his present place, a half section near by. This is well improved and is one of the good farms of the county. Mr. Brookhouse is a thrifty and respected farmer and is making a good success of his labors. He has two brothers, John and Richard.

On March 17, 1900, at The Dalles, Mr. Brookhouse married Miss Johanna Shelly, a native of county Tipperary, Ireland. Her father, John Shelly, married Miss Anastasia Harney and did a large implement business in Thurles, Ireland until his death. His widow resides there now. Mrs. Brookhouse has two brothers and two sisters, James, Hugh, Margaret and Mary A. To our subject and his wife, two children have been born, Mary M. and Kate. Mr. and Mrs. Brookhouse are members of the Roman Catholic church. He is a Democrat, has been delegate to the county conventions, is now serving his second term as justice of the peace, and has been school director. He is a man of force and is interested in the upbuilding of the county. He and his wife are popular and well known, and manifest a public spirit and geniality that win them many friends.

ARTHUR M. HARRIMAN, a prosperous and well to do agriculturist of Wasco county, resides on the Steel road about seven miles east from The Dalles. He was born in England, on May 17, 1857, the son of John and Elizabeth (Hanford) Harriman, both natives of England. The father died there in 1867 and the mother died at The Dalles in 1889. They had followed farming. After spending the first eighteen years of his life in his native country acquiring an education, Mr. Harriman came to the United States in 1875, making the first settlement in Missouri where he bought a farm and there remained until he came to Wasco county in 1898. Here he purchased the farm where he now resides, a very valuable property, well improved and consisting of three hundred and eighty-six acres. In addition to this, Mr. Harriman owns one hundred and sixty acres taken as a homestead in the timber near by. He is a very thrifty and enterprising farmer and has received due reward for his industry in bounteous returns in harvests each year from his estate.

At Green Ridge, Missouri, on March 3, 1880, Mr. Harriman married Miss Helen Morris, a native of Missouri. Her father, Chastine L. Morris, was born in Tennessee and came from old and prominent colonial families. He married Jane Summers, a native of Virginia, whose ancestors were prominent in colonial affairs from their first settlement in the New World. On June 2, 1890, Mrs. Harriman died at Green Ridge, Missouri, leaving two children. In November, 1891, at Nevada, Missouri, Mr. Harriman married Miss Emma Fuller, who was born at that place. Her parents were Sylvester and Frances (Caton) Fuller, natives of West Virginia and Missouri, respectively. The father's parents were born in Ohio and came from old American families. He died in Missouri, on February 21, 1895. The mother's parents were pioneers to Missouri from Tennessee and in the early days, the father was a pioneer to Oregon but he afterward returned to Missouri and died near Nevada in that state in 1874. Mrs. Harriman has two full brothers, Chester and George, one half brother, Hutler, one sister, Mrs. Ella Craig, and one half sister, Mrs. Cornelia Current. Mr. Harriman has three brothers, John, William J., and Edward M. Mr. Harriman has the following named children: Constance, wife of Oscar Johnson, in business in The Dalles; Arthur. These two children were by his first wife. To the second marriage, five children have been born, Homer, Herbert, Lovena, Glendo, and Rosie.

Mr. Harriman is a member of the M. W. A., a stanch Democrat and a zealous laborer for good schools, roads and government. He and his wife belong to the Methodist denomination.

GEORGE W. JOHNSTON, of "Johnstons" successors to the firm of Johnston Brothers, dealers in general merchandise, Dufur, Wasco county, was born in Centreville, New Brunswick, January 11, 1859, the son of James and Amy (Coggsweil) Johnston, who are now living on the old farm near Centreville. The parents of James Johnston were natives of Ireland. The mother was born in Nova Scotia, a descendant of an old and prominent Canadian family, many of whom are now in the United States and distinguished in judicial and commercial circles.

George W. Johnston, our subject, attended the public schools of New Brunswick, where he was reared, until he was nineteen years of age. He then came west and passed one year in Kansas, going thence to The Dalles, Oregon, where he joined his brother, T. H. Johnston, and of whom mention is made elsewhere. For five years he was in the employment of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and following that period he went to Dufur, Wasco county, and engaged in the mercantile business with his brother. They carry a heavy stock, and their trade extends far into the rich and productive surrounding country. Aside from their mercantile enterprise they are largely interested in farming and stock-raising, wintering about five hundred head of cattle, and our subject is personally interested in the Wasco Warehouse and Milling Company, and is one of the board of directors. He has five brothers and five sisters, mention of whom will be found in another portion of this work.

September 23, 1888, at Salem, Oregon, Mr. Johnston was married to Miss Kittie Reed, born at The Dalles, the daughter of Robert B. and Mary J. (Davis) Reed, both natives of Michigan. In the earlier days of the California excitement the father came to the coast by way of the Isthmus of Panama. Subsequently he was agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company at The Dalles, and was clerk of Wasco county during its early days. He died in 1888, and was followed by his devoted wife one year later.

Mrs. Johnston has one brother, Charles H. Reed, an attorney at Dufur. She has one child, Lucile, aged five years. Mr. Johnston is a member of Wasco Lodge No. 15, A. F. & A. M., the R. A. M., Friendship Lodge K. of P., and the W. O. T. W. He is a Republican, politically, and was a member of the Oregon state legislature of 1890. He has been frequently delegate to county and state conventions, and has always exhibited a patriotic interest in the welfare of the community in which he resides, and the state at large. He is progressive, broad-minded and one of the energetic, influential business men of Wasco county, and a highly respected citizen.

ORVILLE WINGFIELD was born in fair Oregon, a son of a native Oregonian. The birth of our subject occurred in Clackamas county, on December 20, 1874. His father, Joseph C. Wingfield, was born in Oregon and his parents, the grandparents of our subject, crossed the plains with ox teams in 1844. He now lives in Thompson's addition in The Dalles. The mother of our subject, Alice G. (Ramsby) Wingfield, was also born in Clackamas county. Her parents were natives of Ohio and crossed the plains with ox teams also. A more extended mention of these worthy pioneers is made elsewhere in this volume, however, we are constrained to and that our subject came from that stanch and worthy blood which supplied the soldiers and made the desert blossom as the rose. He was educated principally at Dufur where the family moved when he was about eight years of age. When three, the family had gone from Clackamas county to Grant county, Oregon whence they removed to Dufur. He remained with his parents until about twenty-one years of age then started in life for himself. For three years, he was occupied in working for wages at various places and then he purchased two hundred and forty acres of land where he now resides. To this he has added until he now has seven hundred and twenty acres, one of the fine farms of the country. Nearly five hundred acres are placed under tribute to produce wheat and he harvests annually about thirty-five bushels to the acre. He also handles from twenty to thirty head of horses. It then is seen that Mr. Wingfield is a man of energy and aggressiveness, that he is possessed of skill and wisdom, all of which have opened to him the fine abundance that he now possesses. He has one brother, Elton, a mining man of Baker City, Oregon, and two sisters, Cora A., living at Baker City, Oregon, who graduated from The Dalles high school in 1893, and Iva L., living with our subject. Politically, Mr. Wingfield is independent. He is a well informed man on the issues and questions of the day, keeps abreast of the times and is an energetic and enterprising citizen.

ANDREW J. DUFUR, JR., the founder of the town of Dufur, Wasco county, is recognized as one of the most enterprising and progressive citizens of the county. His interests at present are confined chiefly to stock-raising, in which he has been eminently successful. He was born in Williamstown, Vermont, August 29, 1847. His father, Andrew J., Sr., was a native of New Hampshire, as were his parents. His father served through the entire War of 1812 and drew a pension for a partial disability. The great grandfather of our subject was a French Huguenot, a refugee from France at the time of the historic French revolution. They were of the aristocratic element whose lives were forfeited through the edict of the leaders of the Sans Culottes, Marat and Robspierre. Andrew J. Dufur, Sr., crossed the plains to California, in 1859. His wife, Lois (Burnham) Dufur, was a native of Williamstown, Vermont, descendant of an old and distinguished New England family. She passed from earth at Dufur in 1895. She and her son, the subject of this article, went to Portland, Oregon, via the Isthmus of Panama, arriving in April, 1860. They had been preceded by the father, Andrew J., Sr. For twelve years the family resided six miles out from Portland, on a farm owned jointly by father and sons, comprising eight hundred acres. This property they disposed of in 1871. The father of our subject died at Dufur, in June, 1897.

The education of our subject was received principally in district schools, supplemented by a term at the Pacific University, Forest Grove. In 1872 our subject and his brother, Enoch B., came to the vicinity of where is now the town of Dufur, and jointly purchased between five and six hundred acres. They were pioneers; only one settler was there before them, Joseph Beasley, deceased. The brothers platted the townsite in 1880. Our subject and his wife at present own about 2,300 acres of land. With his son-in-law, Charles P. Balch, of whom a sketch is elsewhere published in this work, he is engaged profitably in stock-raising. Mr. Dufur has two brothers, Enoch B., a practicing attorney at Portland, Oregon. William H. H., a farmer near Dufur, and one sister, Arabelle, wife of William Staats, a farmer residing three miles from Dufur.

May 2, 1869, at Portland, Mr. Dufur was united in marriage to Mary M. Stansbury, of Indiana, daughter of John E. and Ann M. (Hughes) Stansbury. The father came to Oregon in 1862, settling on Columbia Slough, where he lived until the time of his death, in 1889. The mother lives at East Portland. Mrs. Dufur has three brothers and five sisters; John E. and Stephen E., at Woodlawn, Oregon; William G., on the Yukon river, in Alaska; Elizabeth, married to Milton M. Sunderland, a Portland capitalist; Susan, wife of James Wendell, of Portland; Lucetta, widow of John Foster, late of Hood River, Oregon; Rosabelle, married to Daniel Zeller, a builder and contractor at Dawson, Alaska; and Frances, wife of Morgan A. Zeller, of Portland.

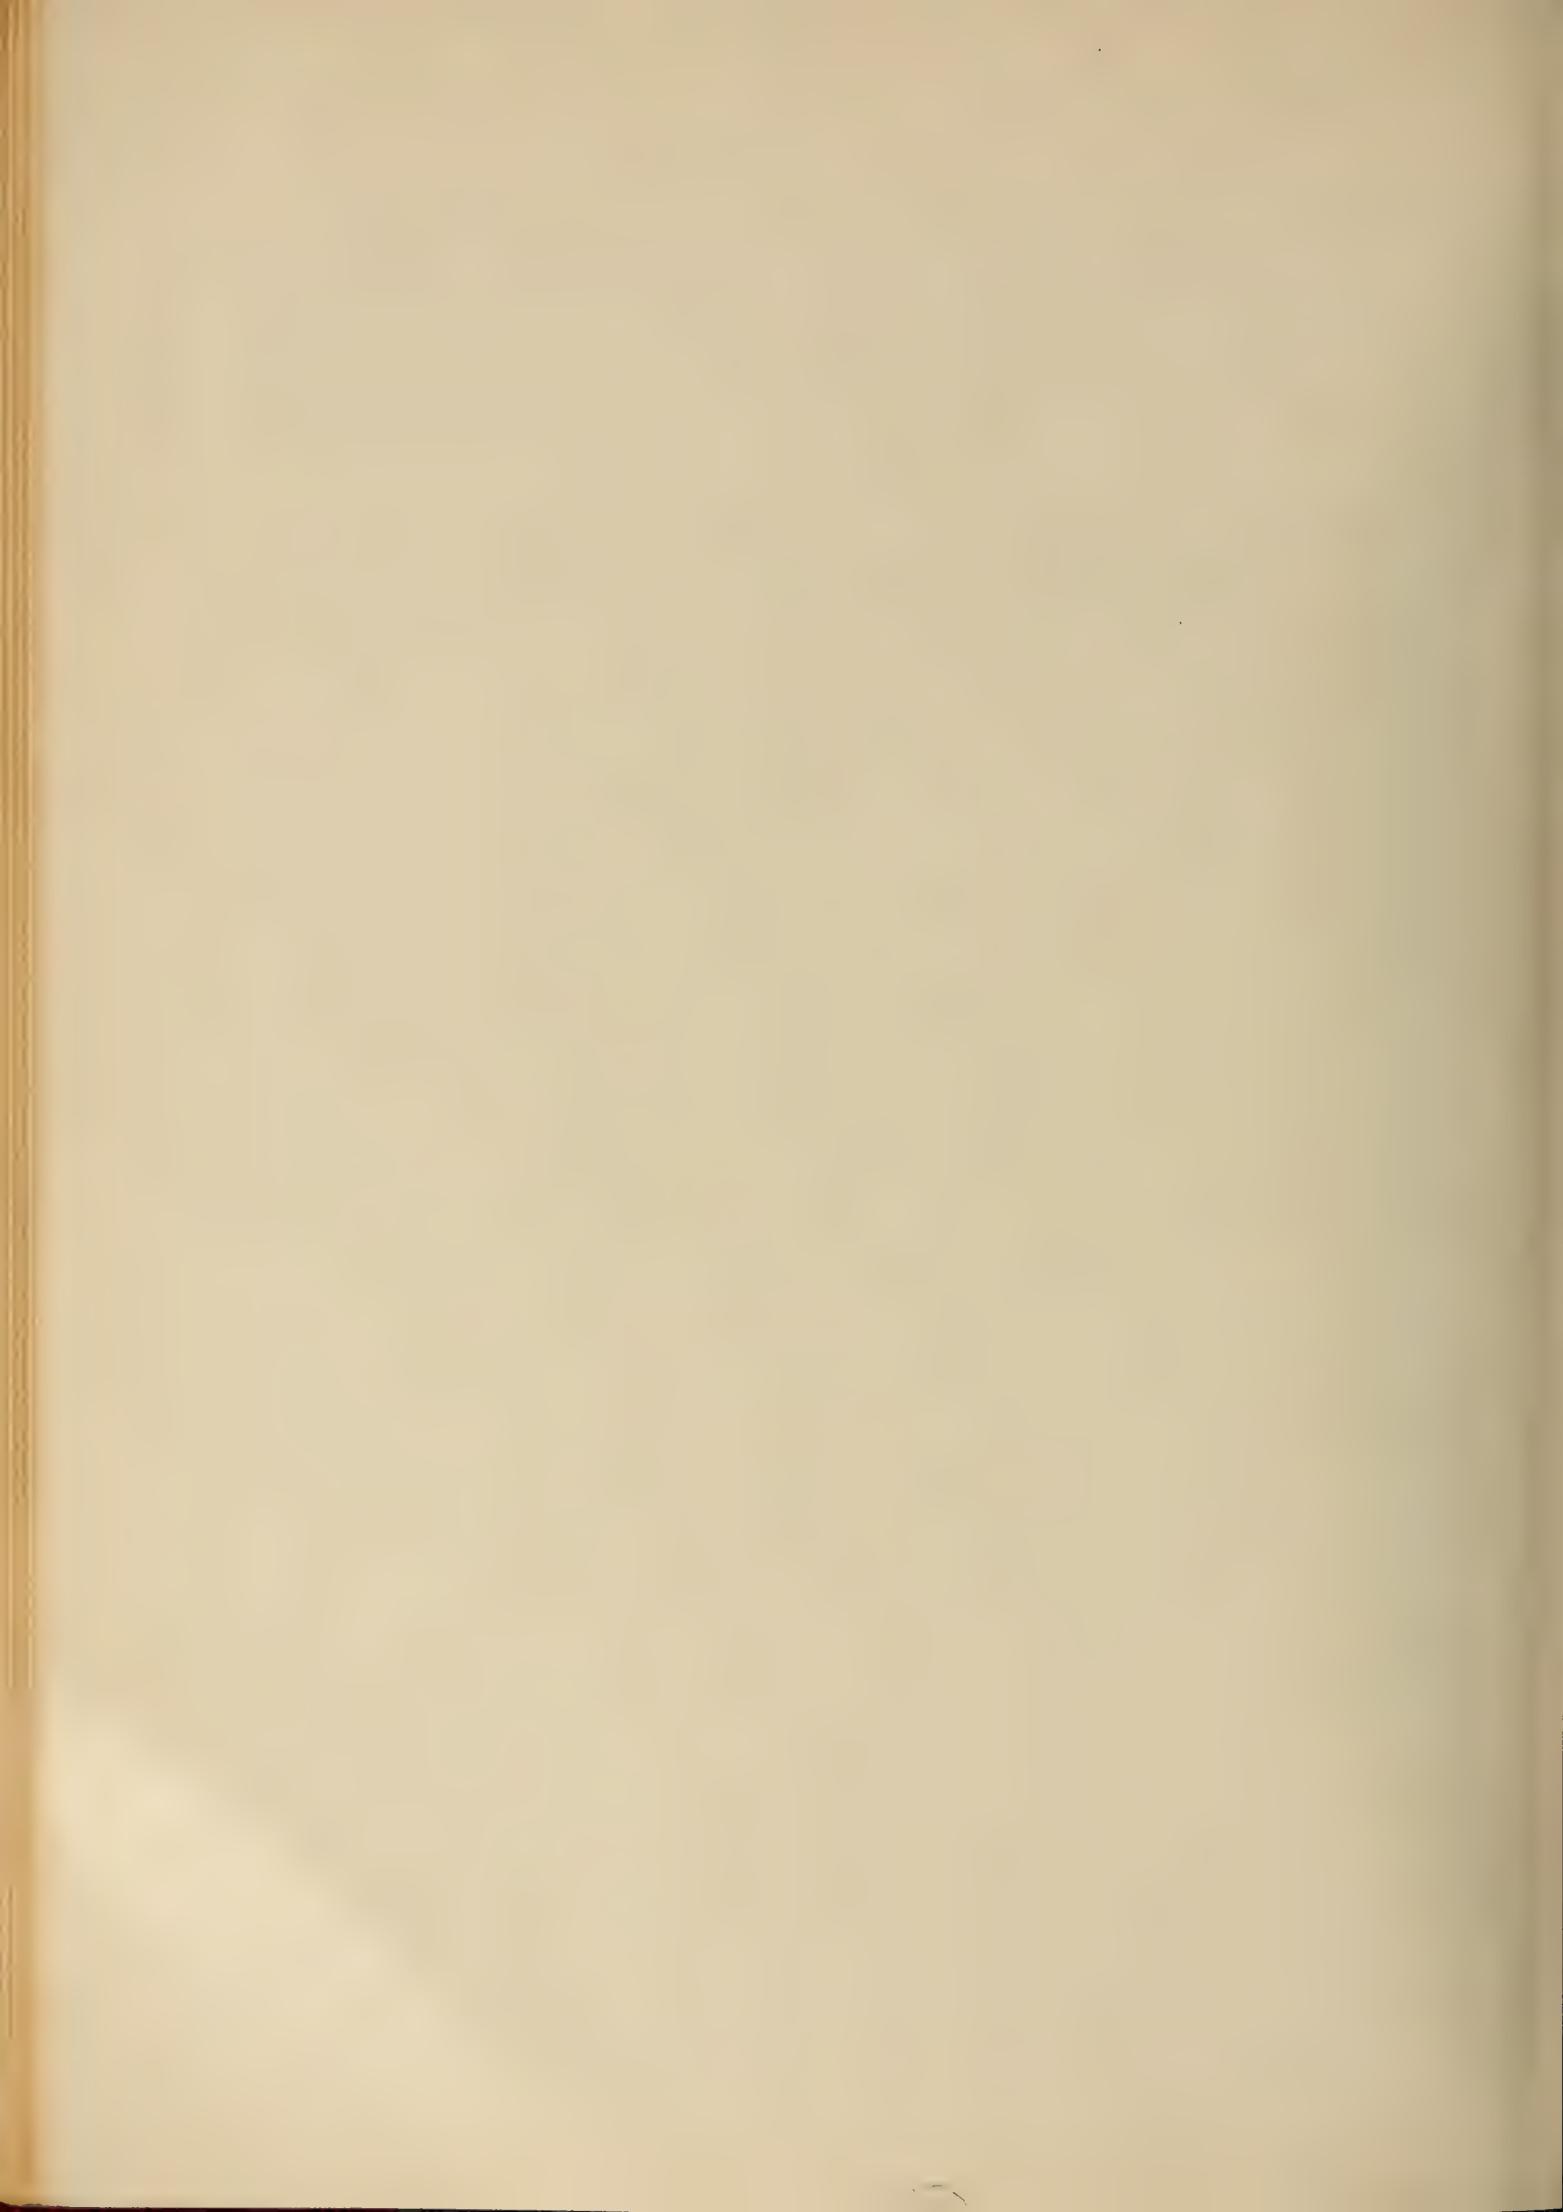

Mr. and Mrs. Dufur have two children living, Lois, wife of Charles P. Balch, and Anna, married to H. A. May, a merchant at Portland. Fraternally Mr. Dufur is a member of Ridgely Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F., of which he is Past Grand; of the grand lodge and Nicholson Encampment, all of Dufur. He is a Democrat and has frequently served his party at county and state conventions, and although not particularly active, nor a partisan, is staunch and patriotic, taking a deep interest in the public welfare of the community in which he resides, the county of Wasco and the state.

JOSEPH C. WINGFIELD, a prosperous fruit grower of Wasco county, resides in Thompson's Addition in The Dalles. He was born in Clackamas county, on January 16, 1848, the son of Joseph T. and Hannah (Knapp) Wingfield, natives of Virginia. The father's ancestors were among the very earliest settlers in the New World, some of the family being on the Mayflower and others having settled in Virginia before that. They were prominent in all the colonial struggles and were a strong family. The mother's people were also a very prominent colonial family and many of them engaged in a professional life. The parents crossed the plains with ox teams in 1846 and settled on a donation claim in the Willamette valley. Our subject had scanty opportunity to gain an education from the frontier schools but made the best of his chances and when fifteen, started out for himself. He worked out in the vicinity two years, then came to eastern Oregon and rode the bell horse on a pack train from Umatilla to Bear gulch, Montana. After this, he was engaged in sawmilling in Grant county, then did mining. Later, he was in the Willamette valley for six years then returned to Grant county and did stock raising until 1883, when he moved to Eightmile creek in Wasco county. He bought one hundred and ninety acres which was the family home for seventeen years or until 1900, when he removed to the place where he now lives. It is a fine piece of land and consists of nine acres, well improved, with fruit trees, buildings and so forth and is a valuable place. Mr. Wingfield recently sold his farm on Eightmile creek and purchased another which he rents to his son, Orville.

Andrew J. Dufur

In Clackamas county, Mr. Wingfield married Miss Alice G., the daughter of Maxwell and Eliza (Smith) Ramsby, natives of Ohio. The father crossed the plains in 1846 with a pack train and outfit and now lives with our subject, aged eighty-three. His father was born in Germany and his mother in Pennsylvania of Welsh parentage. His wife's parents were born in Wales and his marriage occurred in Marion county, Oregon. He was for many years a farmer in the Willamette valley and was second lieutenant in the Cayuse war under Colonel Cornelius Gilliam. After Colonel Gilliam's death, he was under the command of Colonel Waters. In 1862, he was a member of the Oregon legislature, has been justice of the peace for twelve years, was once assessor in Clackamas county and frequently was delegate to the state and county conventions. Once, he was a delegate to the national convention, Grant's first nomination, and assisted to organize the Republican party in Oregon. Mr. Ramsby had very limited opportunity for an education but hired a teacher for his children and studied with them, thus showing the energy and spirit of the man. He has been a very careful and close reader and the result is, that he is one of the best informed men in this section. Our subject has one brother, George W., and two sisters, Mrs. Lucy Worsham, and Mrs. Hannah Graham. Mrs. Wingfield has one brother, Horace S., and one sister, Mrs. Alwilda Dickey. To our subject and his wife, the following named children have been born: Orville, on Eightmile creek; Elton E., in Baker county, Oregon; Cora A., a school teacher in Baker City; and Iva L., with her brother, Orville.

Mr. Wingfield is a member of the W. W. It is of interest to note that the first Cayuse war pension was issued to Mr. Wingfield's father-in-law.

CHARLES H. REED, an attorney of Dufur of recognized ability is also editor of the Dufur Dispatch, a bright and newsy sheet, which champions every cause for the upbuilding of central Oregon, and is a lucid and convincing exponent of the Republican party.

Charles H. Reed was born in Fentonville,

Michigan, on June 9, 1856. His father, Robert B. Reed, a native of New York city, and a pioneer of Michigan, where he was married, followed the mercantile business several years in the Wolverine State and then came to Oregon via the isthmus in 1859. He was in the internal revenue service for some years and later was one of the trusted employes of Wells Fargo & Company. He remained with them fifteen years, until his death. He came direct to The Dalles from San Francisco and there resided until his death in 1890. He was a man of unquestioned integrity and stamina and had the respect and admiration of all good people. He was a member of the Masonic and Odd Fellow fraternities. Our subject's mother, Sarah J. (Davis) Reed, was born in Michigan and died about two years after her husband, and they both lie buried in The Dalles cemetery. Mrs. Reed's father was a native of Ireland. Our subject completed his educational training in The Dalles high school and then studied law with L. L. McArthur, now deceased. After he had practiced law for several years in Idaho, he removed to Portland and there practiced for one year. From that point he came to Dufur and bought the Dufur Dispatch and has been manager and editor of the same since, in connection with his law practice. Mr. Reed was chairman of the Republican central committee of Ada county, Idaho for five years and was there prominently identified in Republican politics.

In September, 1884, at Boise, Idaho, Mr. Reed married Ella Carter, a native of Salem, Oregon. Her father, Lafayette F. Carter, was a native of Pennsylvania and a well known pioneer of Oregon. He built the old portage road from The Dalles to Celilo and was surveyor general of Idaho for many years. He is now deceased. Mrs. Reed's mother was Mary Bell Carter, a native of Pennsylvania and also deceased. Our subject and his wife have one child, Snowden M., a young lady of eighteen years, still at home.

Mr. Reed is a member of the K. P. and the W. O. W., being past C. C. of the former order.

CHARLES P. BALCH, farmer, druggist and prominent business man of Dufur, Wasco county, and one of the leading citizens of the community, was born in Wisconsin, April 21, 1860. His parents were John A. and Caroline (Stevenson) Balch, the father a native of Vermont and the mother of the state of New York. The father was, by trade, a millwright. The Balch family is one of the most distinguished in the United States, and its members have contributed much to the history of the country. Members of the family were participants in the Revolution and the War of 1812. Captain Balch was with General Knox during the former war. He died in June, at Iola, Wisconsin. The father of Caroline (Stevenson) Balch, mother of our subject, was a native of England; her mother of Scotland. She died in 1878 at Iola.

In the latter town our subject was reared until he had reached the age of eleven, and the family then removed to Oshkosh, Wisconsin, where he attended graded and high schools. He followed various employments after leaving the educational institutions, and in 1883 came to Oregon. He located in Wasco county, on the Des Chutes river and filed on a claim which he improved and sold later. He then removed to Dufur and engaged in the drug business, continuing in the same ten years. He disposed of this property, but three years later purchased a half interest in this business which he still retains, but taking no active part in its conduct. Principally he is engaged in stock raising in company with A. J. Dufur. They winter between three and four hundred head of cattle. Mr. Balch has four sisters; Jennie, wife of J. W. Bishop, of Wausau, Wisconsin, a prominent mining man; Clara, wife of E. J. Goodrick, an attorney, residing in Wisconsin; Elizabeth E., wife of A. K. Dufur, of California; and Kittie, married to George Rock, a railroad engineer, living at Spooner, Wisconsin.

At Dufur, June 28, 1889, Mr. Balch was united in marriage to Lois Dufur, born in Portland, Oregon, the daughter of Andrew J., Jr., and Mary M. (Stansbury) Dufur. The father is a native of Vermont, mentioned elsewhere, and the mother of Indiana. Mrs. Balch has one sister. Fraternaly Mr. Balch is a member of Wasco Lodge No. 15, A. F. & A. M., at The Dalles; R. A. M., Ridgeley Lodge No. 71, I. O. O. F., A. O. U. W., W. O. T. W., and the United Artisans, all of Dufur. He is a stanch Republican, and has frequently served his party as delegate to county conventions.

JOHN H. HARRIS, an industrious and substantial farmer of Wasco county, resides about two miles north from Endersly, where he handles a rented estate, farming it to wheat, mostly. He is an enterprising man, well spoken of and esteemed by all. His birth occurred in Missouri, on June 21, 1849, the son of William and Sarah (Beaver) Harris, natives of Ohio and Pennsylvania, respectively. The father came from Dutch stock and the mother was from an old colonial family that was prominent in the Revolution and also in all the colonial struggles. They both died in the vicinity of The Dalles. Our subject accompanied his parents across the plains with ox teams in 1865. It was an easy trip aside from one fight with the Indians on Rock creek in the Black Hills, where they killed one renegade white man, who was with the Indians, but received no injury to the train. The train was a large one, numbering one hundred and nineteen wagons, when it left the Missouri. Our subject's parents settled in Idaho and a year later came to Scapoose bay, where they remained until 1883. Then came a move to this section and here the mother died in 1884 and the father in 1895. Our subject took up a homestead here and in 1889 sold the same. Then he removed to St. Helens and rented land there until 1895, when he came to his present place which he has rented since. It is his old homestead and he is quite at home in handling this estate. It is owned by W. J. Harriman.

At The Dalles, in 1887, Mr. Harris married Miss Hester Williams, who was born on Eight-mile, on February 16, 1868. Her parents are Henry and Amanda (Abbott) Williams, now living on Eightmile and mentioned in this work in another place. Mr. Harris has two brothers and one sister, George, Joseph and Jane, the widow of Robert Hayes. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Harris, Frederick L., Cora L., John W., Willard, Letha and Martha. They also had one child who died, February 14, 1902, Burly, aged at the time of death, seven years, eight months and thirteen days.

JACOB A. GULLIFORD, a pioneer of Oregon in its territorial days, and a prominent farmer and stock raiser of Wasco county, resides at Dufur. He was born in Sangamon county, Illinois, near Springfield, September 7, 1834, the son of William and Eliza (Shoup) Gulliford. The father was a native of Pennsylvania; the latter of Ohio. The mother, descended from a prominent Dutch family, accompanied her husband to Oregon, coming across the plains with ox teams. They settled in Lane county, secured a donation claim and remained there all their lives, the father dying in 1865, the mother in 1857.

Jacob A. Gulliford, the subject of this sketch, was educated in the public schools, and in 1859 went to Klickitat county, Washington, and there engaged in stock-raising, continuing the same with good success until 1864. That year he and his brother went to Oak Grove, with a band of three hundred cattle. The spring of 1867 he drove the second band of cattle into the Prineville country, Oregon, and squatted on land eight miles north of the present site of Prineville. The country at the time was just beginning to be settled. In 1878 he removed with his family to a point near Dufur, and purchased a farm two miles west of the present site of Dufur, on Fifteen Mile Creek. Later he disposed of his Prineville property interests. Six years afterward he bought land six miles below Dufur which he still owns, eight hundred and forty acres in all. Mr. Gulliford owns a handsome house in Dufur in which his family reside. In 1899 he purchased a flouring mill at Boyd, of twenty-five barrel capacity.

In 1855 our subject was for six months in the Rogue River Indian war. He has one brother and four sisters: Jasper N., a merchant at Pendleton, Oregon; Sarah, wife of William R. Cooper, of Whitman county, Washington; Emma, married to William M. Allen, a capitalist of Halsey, Linn county; Anne, widow of J. M. Probst, late of Whitman county; and Mary M., wife of J. D. Butler, of Portland, Oregon.

June 16, 1872, Mr. Gulliford was married to Martha E. Vanderpool, born in Missouri. The ceremony was solemnized at Prineville. She is the daughter of Kinman and Dulcina (Tomlinson) Vanderpool, both natives of Missouri. They crossed the plains in 1852, enduring many hardships and encountering many dangers. The same year the father died in Oregon. The mother still lives at Dufur. Mrs. Gulliford has one brother, three half brothers and two half sisters: Meadows Vanderpool, a Prineville farmer; Silas, Alec and Sherman Hodges, of Prineville; Ollie, wife of Horace Dillard; and Mary, married to Charles H. Stoughton, of Dufur. Our subject has one child, William C., aged nineteen, a student of Hill's Academy, Portland.

Mr. Gulliford is a member of the I. O. O. F., and his wife of the Rebekahs and the Women of Woodcraft. Both are members of the Christian church.

JOSEPH HAYNES, a highly respected citizen of Wasco county, a patriotic soldier in the Union Army, and at present a retired farmer residing at Dufur, was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, December 24, 1826, the son of Joseph and Sallie (Chapin) Haynes, both natives of Massachusetts. They both were descended from old American families dating back several centuries.

Our subject was reared and educated in Worcester, Massachusetts, attending the graded schools in that city, and he then learned the trade of a shoemaker, in which he continued until he was twenty-five years of age. At that period he went to Rock Island county, Illinois, remaining a few months, going thence to Jackson, Michigan. Here he passed four years, but returned to Illinois and enlisted, August 5, 1862, in Company A, Ninety-third Illinois Infantry, Captain Ashbaugh, Colonel Holden Putnam commanding. The latter was a lineal descendant of General Israel Putnam, of Revolutionary fame. Colonel Putnam was killed at the battle of Missionary Ridge, and our subject and comrades carried the body three miles from the battle field to the division surgeon's headquarters. Mr. Haynes participated in the battles of Fort Gibson, Raymond, Jackson, Mississippi, and Champion Hills. During the last engagement one hundred and sixty men in our subject's regiment were killed and wounded within the space of one hour. He was also engaged in a number of other heavy battles in the Vicksburg campaign. He was with General Tecumseh Sherman "From Atlanta to the Sea," and participated in the terrible battle of Altoona pass, which raged for thirteen hours. After the fall of Atlanta, he went on to Savannah, thence into the Carolinas, being at the battle of Bentonville. After Lee's surrender his command marched from Raleigh, to Washington, D. C. Mr. Haynes served three years and was mustered out with the rank of corporal June 25, 1865.

He resumed work at his trade at Milan, Illinois, and in 1869 he removed to Kansas, where he was four years, engaged in shoemaking and farming. In 1879 he came to Oregon, crossing the plains with horse teams, and settled in Wasco county. Here he filed on land twelve miles from the present site of Dufur, owned and cultivated a half section for nineteen years, and then moved into the town of Dufur, built a residence and has since lived there with his family. February 25, 1853, at Jackson, Michigan, Mr. Haynes was married to Lucinda Freeman, born in New York, who went to Michigan with her parents when a small child. Her parents were descendants of old American families in New York. Mrs. Haynes has one brother and two sisters: Marvin, of Shasta county, California; Lorain, widow of Colonel Samuel S. Everson; and Mrs. Jane Hathaway. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Haynes: William R., of Wasco; Austin F., carpenter and builder, of Dufur; Ellsworth A., a Wasco county farmer; and Burt H., also of Wasco county. Our subject is a Republican, having cast his first vote during the original campaign of that party when John C. Fremont was the candidate, and since the party was formed he has never deserted its colors. Although he never aspires to office he always manifests a lively and patriotic interest in the successive campaigns of his party. In all educational affairs he has ever taken a deep interest; has been a member of the school board and headed generously a subscription for the first school house built in his district. Mr. Haynes has eighteen grand-children, of whom he is justly proud.

CHARLES F. WILLIAMS, who was born in Oregon City, on September 20, 1861, was brought when eighteen months of age east of the Cascades and in this part of the state he has remained since. His parents, William H. and Amanda A. (Abbott) Williams, are mentioned elsewhere in this volume. Charles was educated in the district schools of Wasco county and between terms was occupied with his father in freighting. When fifteen he took charge of a freight outfit from The Dalles to Canyon City and all other interior points of Oregon. In those days the freighter took his life in his hands whenever he turned the teams on an outward trip as the Indians were constantly on the watch, not only when on the war path, but at all times were seeking to waylay and murder and secure plunder. So, were we to detail all the thrilling incidents of our subject's life, we would have a volume in itself. During the Snake Indian outbreak, he was forced to lay one entire summer in Canyon City to avoid the savages. His brother was out scouting at this time and was in a battle on Murder creek, which is the headwater of the John Day river. One white man was killed and several reds bit the dust. The white man killed was Mr. Aldridge. When twenty-one, Mr. Williams determined to cease from this arduous work and accordingly engaged with The Dalles Lumber Company, where he remained for four years. Then he did draying until 1899, when he bought a quarter section about nine miles south from The Dalles, where he now resides. Since that time he has been improving his place and has a good property. He raises considerable poultry and does general farming.

On June 29, 1888, at the residence of the bride's parents in Fairview, Mr. Williams married Miss Katherine Teague, a native of Alabama. Her parents, Elias and Elizabeth (Burton) Teague, were also natives of Alabama. The father's parents were born in the same state and came from Scotch extraction, being among the early colonists. He served in the confederate army under Lee, and now dwells at Goldendale, Washington. The mother of our subject was descended from colonial stock and her parents were born in Virginia. Mr. Williams' brothers and sisters are mentioned in another portion of this work. His wife has three brothers, Henry, Thomas, Robert, and two sisters, Mrs. Wilma Nelson, and Mamie. Three children have been born to our subject and his wife, Lloyd, aged ten, Harold, aged four, and Carl, ten months old. Mr. Williams is a member of the W. W., while he and his wife belong to the circle. He is a Democrat and is interested in the questions of the day.

GEORGE I. SLOCOM is conducting a book and stationery store, in the new brick block owned by his uncle, E. L. Smith. He is a young man and gives his attention strictly to business and is working up a fine business. He was born in Illinois, on September 19, 1878, the son of Charles and Eva (Hartman) Slocum, natives of Woodstock, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, respectively. The Slocoms came right from New York and are a very old and prominent family, John Slocum of the Civil war, being a member of that family. The mother's people were Pennsylvania Dutch. The father died in 1884 and the mother in the same year. This occurred in Illinois and our subject was left an orphan when five years of age. His aunt brought him and his brother, Charles L., aged three, to Oregon to live. They were in the care of their uncle, E. L. Smith. Fate had given them a very excellent home and they received as kind care and treatment as though children of that family. George I. studied in the graded schools of Hood River then spent some time in Pacific university at Forest Grove. After that, he was occupied with his uncle on the fruit farm for three years then he entered the employ of the American Steel and Wire Company of Portland. That continued for three years. At the end of that time he was appointed on the exhibit corps for the Buffalo and Charleston World's Fairs in the department of horticulture for the state of Oregon. This occupied him for two years, then in June, 1902, he returned to Hood River. His father was a newspaper editor and our subject imbibed naturally, a liking for books and the business which he is now following appealed strongly to him, consequently he opened a shop in Hood River. He has a neat, attractive place, supplied with everything carried in this kind of a store. His genialty and deferential treatment of all have brought him a nice patronage and his business is growing rapidly.

Mr. Slocum is a member of the order of Pendo. Politically, he is a strong Republican and was secretary of the Roosevelt league. He has two brothers and one sister: L. Leroy now employed in the American Wire and Steel Company in San Francisco; James B., a school boy in Chicago; and Elinor, wife of Fred Greiner, a bookkeeper in the Illinois Terra Cotta Lumber Company, of Chicago.

WILLIAM H. WILLIAMS is known far and near in Wasco county as one of the earliest settlers on Eightmile creek, where he lives to this day. His estate is about ten miles south from The Dalles and is one of the choice places in the community. He was born in Terre Haute, Indiana, on November 18, 1838, the son of Washington and Hester (Stevens) Williams, both natives of Indiana. Their ancestors were among the hardy pioneers of the then wilderness of the eastern part of the United States. In 1842, our subject came with his parents to Cincinnati, Ohio, and in 1845 to Iowa. On April 8, 1850, they all started from Ottumwa, Iowa for Oregon, and arrived on November 8, the same year, after a journey accompanied with much suffering. Samuel Brooks, well known here, was in the same party. The father took a donation claim and in 1858 returned to Chicago, where his death occurred in 1861. The mother died at The Dalles, in 1886. William H. was educated in the various places where the family dwelt and grew up amid frontier surroundings. He was in the Indian wars of 1855-6, being in Company C, under Captain Stafford, Lieutenant Colonel Kelley, and Colonel Naismeth. After the war he went to Yreka, California and wrought in the mines until the spring of 1858. Then he joined the rush to Fraser river and at Okanogan river in Washington, his party was attacked by Indians and for twelve hours they fought the savages with the loss of two men and then the battle ceased. A Mr. Robinson was in charge of the party. After a few months in the Fraser country he returned to Oregon City and married. In March, 1863, he came thence to his present place. His marriage occurred on August 11, 1859 and Amanda Abbott was the lady who became his wife. She was born in Oskaloosa, Iowa, the daughter of John and Catherine Abbott. Mr. Williams has one brother, Taylor S., and two sisters, Lettie Holland, and Mary Graham. Mrs. Williams has two brothers and two sisters, John, Robert, Mrs. Catherine Kelley and Mrs. Tillie Hatch. To Mr. and Mrs. Williams the following named children have been born: Richard H., at Goldendale, Washington; Charles F., farming near by; Frank, at Macy, Washington; Jerry M., at home; Harry, also at home; Lew, in the stock business in Washington; Clyde, a railroad man at Macy, Washington; Kate, the wife of Clarence Garrison, at St. Helens, Oregon; Hester, wife of John Harris, mentioned in this volume; Nellie, the wife of John W. Harris, a stock man and liveryman in Macy, Washington; Hazel, the wife of Charles Creighton, on Threemile creek; Fay, wife of Andrew Dufur, Jr., a farmer on Fifteenmile; and Clara, single at home. Mr. Williams is an independent Democrat and well informed on the topics of the day, being also interested in school matters. He was road supervisor for many years, and has labored for over forty years in building up this country and is a highly esteemed man.

CHRISTIAN DETHMAN is one of the leading orchardists of Wasco county and through his individual efforts to a large extent has Hood River gained her extended and enviable reputation for choice apples. Skilled in horticulture and seeing here the conditions that would bring the best results, he has demonstrated with a magnificent orchard the skill and the conditions that produce fruit of the choicest kind.

Christian Dethman was born in Germany, on January 1, 1859, the son of Henry and Weibke (Peters) Dethman, both natives of Germany. The father was a farmer and fought in the war of 1848. He died in his native country. The mother lives in Crawford county, Iowa. After studying in the schools of his country until 1872, our subject came to the United States and lived with a cousin in Iowa. He attended district school for two years and then went to Jones county and worked for another cousin for three years. Then he joined his brother and mother who had come to Crawford county, Iowa and with his brother John, came one year later to Hood River. April 17, 1879 was the date of his arrival here and he soon went to the Willamette valley but later returned to The Dalles, arriving there just after the fire. He wrought for Henry Klingt for six months and then came with his brother to Hood River where they filed on claims. Since that time Mr. Dethman has given his attention to horticulture and also does some general farming. He has won a remarkable success, thus demonstrating his skill and ability, while his large forty acre orchard, judging from the results obtained, is one of the very best in the United States. It has largely assisted to give Hood River her famous reputation for apples and she stands one of the choicest apple producers in the world at this day.

At The Dalles, on November 20, 1886, Mr. Dethman married Miss Emma Jetter, of Hood River and a native of Iowa. Her father, John Jetter, was born in Germany and married a maiden of his country and came to the United States. He followed mason work and stone cutting and now resides in Jones county, Iowa. Mr. Dethman has the following brothers and sisters, Andrew, John, Claus, Hanna Bolster, Katy, and Weibke Sacho. Mrs. Dethman has one sister.

Eight children have been the fruit of the marriage mentioned: Frank C., Herman, Anna, Alfred, Laura, William McKinley, Jessie and Fred T. Mr. Dethman is a member of the A. O. U. W., and the Foresters. He is a good substantial citizen and has done a splendid work here. His place is improved with fine residence and all the accessories and is one of the choicest in this country.

J. HENRY JOHNSTON, of the Dufur Drug Company, a public-spirited citizen and progressive business man, and well known throughout Wasco county, resides at Dufur. He was born at Centreville, Carlton county, New Brunswick, and his parents are mentioned elsewhere in this work, with their ancestry.

Our subject was reared and educated in Centreville. His grandfather was the first settler in that district, and the founder of the town. In 1885 J. Henry Johnston went to Colorado, where he engaged in various employments, and thence came to Oregon, having remained but one year in Colorado. He was three years with Gilman, French & Company, near Fossil, Wheeler county, engaged in the stock business. Two and one-half years later he came to Wasco county, where he worked a short period for his brothers and also engaged in farming on his own account. He purchased and rented land and cultivated the same three years, and then disposed of all his farming interests to his brother, Samuel. He then entered the store of Johnston Brothers, in Dufur, and was, also, on the road one year traveling for a medicine house. In 1899 Mr. Johnston purchased an interest in a drug store from C. P. Balch, which he has since successfully conducted. He has four brothers and five sisters, mentioned in another portion of this work.

November 12, 1898, at Dufur, Mr. Johnston was married to Maud Peabody, a native of Iowa. Her parents were Frank and Celia (Hewitt) Peabody, her father a native of Salem, Massachusetts, and a descendant of the old and distinguished American family of Peabodys, whose eventful biographies are closely identified with the history of this country. Her parents both reside at Dufur. She has one brother and one sister. Mr. and Mrs. Johnston have three children, James H., Genevieve E., and Gwendoline C. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., W. O. W., and politically a Republican. In November, 1904, the Dufur Drug Company was organized by our subject, C. P. Balch and Dr. Dodds.

HIRAM C. DODDS, M. D., physician and surgeon, Dufur, Wasco county, Oregon, was born in Lapeer county, Michigan, at North Branch Postoffice, July 18, 1867. His parents were Archibald and Maria (Baker) Dodds, the father a native of Scotland and the mother of New York. In the early '50's Archibald Dodds came to the United States and located in Michigan, having previously lived a short period in Ohio. He died in 1888. The mother still lives at North Branch, Michigan.

Hiram C. Dodds, our subject, was reared in Michigan, receiving the elements of an excellent education in the public schools, and graduating with honors from the high school at North Branch. Then he taught school two years in Lapeer county and subsequently he was matriculated in the State Normal School at Ypsilanti, Michigan. In 1893 he commenced the study of medicine, entering the Detroit College of Medicine, the oldest and most famous medical institution in Michigan. Dr. Dodds was graduated in May, 1897, and began practice in Honey Creek, Wisconsin, where he continued one year, going thence to Dufur, in 1898, where he has since resided and where his practice has been eminently successful. Dr. Dodds has three brothers, Robert, Albert and Edwin, Michigan farmers, living near North Branch, and one sister, Alice M., a school teacher in Michigan, and a graduate of the state normal school at Ypsilanti.

November 10, 1898, at The Dalles, Dr. Dodds was united in marriage to Elena M. Henry, born in East Troy, Wisconsin, the daughter of William Henry, a native of Germany, now living in Wisconsin. She has four brothers and one sister: Charles, of Townsend, Montana; Frank, a merchant in Colby, Wisconsin; William, of East Troy, Wisconsin; John, of Milwaukee; and Louise, wife of George H. Babcock, a farmer and stockman of Honey Creek, Wisconsin. Dr. and Mrs. Dodds have two children, Mildred E. and an infant unnamed.

Our subject is a member of Ridgely Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F., and Nicholson encampment, Dufur, the W. O. W., and K. O. T. M., Silver Creek Tent, No. 15, Michigan. Mrs. Dodds is a member of the Rebekahs, and the Women of Woodcraft. During the Civil war the father of our subject, Archibald Dodds, served thirteen months in Company K., Twelfth Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

Dr. Dodds is the only physician in Dufur, and he has an extensive practice throughout Wasco and adjoining counties. He is a broad-minded and progressive citizen, and has the confidence of the entire community in which he resides. He is interested in the Dufur Drug Company and is mayor of Dufur. For several years he was a member of the city council.

ALFRED FERGUSON, who resides on the Eightmile road about eight miles out from The Dalles, was born in Broome county, New York, on June 24, 1842, the son of Elijah and Clarinda (Blair) Ferguson. The father was born in Chenango county, New York. His parents were natives of Scotland. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was a participant in the War of 1812. The mother was born in Broome county, New York and came from an old family. In 1851, our subject was brought by his parents to California via the isthmus. Settlement was made in Tuolumne county and the father did mining and farming for many years. He died there in 1887. Alfred was educated in the frontier schools and in 1868, started in for himself. He soon came to Portland and for eight years was a resident of that city. Then he came to the place where he now lives, and to the quarter he purchased, he has added as much more by pre-emption right. He does general farming and raises some stock. His labors have been blessed with prosperity and he is one of the well to do men of the county. In his career, he has not been so sordid as to believe that money is the only thing for man, and consequently has so conducted himself that he has merited and today receives generously the confidence and esteem of his fellows.

At Portland, in 1869, Mr. Ferguson married Miss Martha J. Robertson, who was born in Cass county, Missouri. Her parents were John and Emily D. (Pinnill) Robertson, natives of Missouri and Kentucky, respectively. The father died when Mrs. Ferguson was an infant and she came here with her mother who had married again. The trip was made via the isthmus in 1862. They are now both dead. Mr. Ferguson has one brother living, James, and one deceased, John, who died in Sonora, California, in 1903. He was a prominent man and owned the city water works, and also did mining. Mr. Ferguson has two sisters, Mrs. Jane Pease, a widow, and Mrs. Frances Booker. Mrs. Ferguson has one brother, Joseph and several half brothers and half sisters. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Ferguson: John E., Ashford, and Miles. The last named is at home and the others are millmen in The Dalles. Mr. Ferguson is a member of the A. F. & A. M., and politically is allied with the Democrats. He is zealous in building up the community and is a citizen who is looked up to and is possessed of excellent wisdom and integrity.

JOHN C. JOHNSTON, another member of the firm of "Johnstons," an enterprising and prominent citizen of Dufur, Wasco county, was born in Centreville, New Brunswick, March 21, 1854. His parents and their distinguished ancestry are mentioned elsewhere in this work.

While living at home with his parents our subject attended the public schools in his vicinity, where he secured a liberal business education, and in 1876 he went to San Francisco, California, and thence to Sonoma county, same state, remaining there two years, one year of which he was employed in a hotel and one year on a ranch. He then came to The Dalles, Oregon, with his brother, Thomas H., and subsequently was with the firm of French & Gilman, stock-raisers, in Wheeler county. He remained with them nine years, during which period he raised cattle for himself, and quite successfully. He disposed of his stock to the firm in 1887, and the following two years traveled in the vicinity of Portland and the Puget Sound country, engaged in various employments. He came to Dufur in 1890, and purchased an interest in the business being conducted by his brothers, George and T. H. He at present has charge of the hardware department. Our subject is one of the five Johnstons who are mentioned in sketches elsewhere.

Politically Mr. Johnston is the only Democrat in the family. He has frequently been delegate to state and county conventions, and has served one term as mayor of Dufur, one term as councilman, and one as school director. With his brothers he is interested in the Wasco Warehouse & Milling Company, farm lands and stock.

He was united in marriage, May 31, 1888, at Dufur, to Josie I. Laing, of Portland, Oregon, born in Worcester, Massachusetts. Her father, Colonel John K. Laing, was a native of Woodstock, New Brunswick, in the same county in which our subject was born. During the Civil War Colonel Laing commanded the Fourteenth Maine Volunteer Infantry, having enlisted as a private and risen from the ranks. He was in active service four years, and was frequently promoted for bravery on the field. He lives in Portland, Oregon. Her mother, Frances (Hayward)

Laing, was a native of Maine, born near Bangor. She died in Portland, Oregon, in 1887. Mrs. Johnston has two brothers and one sister: Edward, a Southern Pacific railway engineer, of Rosebery, Oregon; Everett, a school boy, at home, in Portland, and Elizabeth, at home with her father in Portland. Mr. and Mrs. Johnston have three children living, Hazel, Lucile and Helen, aged thirteen and five years, and eleven months, respectively. Our subject is a member of the I. O. O. F., of which he is past grand, the Rebeckah Lodge and Nicholson encampment, at Dufur.

ANDY M. ALLEN, proprietor of a feed yard at The Dalles, Wasco county, is a native Oregonian, having been born in Polk county, January 23, 1848. He is the son of James M. and Hannah J. (Riggs) Allen, the father a native of Missouri, the mother of Illinois. The father was a descendant of the old colonial family of Allens, of Revolutionary fame, a prominent member of the family having been Ethan Allen, commander of the "Green Mountain Boys." The parents of our subject came to Oregon in what was known as the "Meeks Cut-Off Train." Losing their way they suffered many hardships, but were, fortunately, well provisioned. Following various locations in the territory of Oregon the family finally removed to what was then Wasco county, settling near Prineville, where James M. Allen built a flouring mill, the first in what is now Crook county, with the exception of the Indian Agency mill. Disposing of this property later he removed to Fifteen Mile, erected another mill, which is now owned by J. A. Guilliford, mentioned elsewhere, and resided in Boyd until his death. The mother of our subject died on the old home farm in Polk county, in 1860.

In the district schools of his neighborhood our subject was prepared for Monmouth College, but owing to an illness covering three years he did not enter that educational institution. At the age of twenty-five years he married and began life for himself. He taught school, was engaged in farming and stock raising in Crook county, and purchased an interest from his father in the mill at Prineville. In the latter town he taught the first school. Mr. Allen is an expert accountant, and was, at different times, bookkeeper for several firms successively. Father and son disposed of the mill at Boyd about 1882, and our subject then purchased a farm on lower Fifteen Mile Creek, four miles below Boyd, comprising one hundred and sixty acres, also filing on an adjoining quarter section. Here he remained nine years, sold the property and in 1890 came to The Dalles, where for ten years he was employed in clerking. Subsequently he became interested in horses, began training them, and followed the circuit over the northwest, and is at present the best known horse trainer in the state. In March, 1902, our subject, with a partner, purchased the old Brooks and Beers feed yard, and now have the oldest established institution of this kind in The Dalles. In May, 1904, our subject purchased the interest owned by his partner.

Our subject was married in June, 1871, at Prineville, to Cynthia A. Butler, born in Illinois, the daughter of Elijah and Sarah E. (Lucas) Butler, both deceased. The wife of our subject died February 27, 1876, at Prineville. The second marriage of our subject took place at Boyd, when he was united to Lucy A. Smith, a native of Lane county, Oregon. She is the daughter of Henry and Sophia (Cook) Smith, the father a native of Iowa, the mother of Oregon. The father is deceased, the mother lives in Oregon City. Mr. Allen has four brothers: Albert, of Crook county; John, the same; Isaac M., a glass manufacturer in Indiana; and Elam, in the stock business in Wallowa county; and three sisters—Ellen, wife of Hardy Holman, of Dallas, Oregon, justice of the peace and ex-county sheriff; Nancy, married to James Crawford, of Pendleton, Oregon; and Pauline, wife of James A. Bradley, Anatone, Washington. Our subject has ten children: Sylba, wife of D. D. Bolton, and Glenn O., by his first wife; and Mable, wife of John Miller; Owen, Edith, Mernie, Wayne, Delta, Gladys, and Uarda, by his second marriage.

Fraternally Mr. Allen is a member of the I. O. O. F., having been an Odd Fellow thirty-five years, past grand of Ocheco Lodge, No. 46, Prineville, and many times a delegate to the grand lodge. He is a Republican, and has been delegate to county conventions and clerk of election. Mrs. Allen has three brothers, C. Sumner, Henry G., and William L., and one sister, Cornelia, a widow living at Oregon City.

HIRAM CHITTENDEN, deceased. Although Mr. Chittenden has gone to the rest provided for the faithful, still the work that he did in Wasco county may not be overlooked by any one who would write a correct history of the people and of the place. Therefore it is very proper that a memoir of his life should be granted space here at this time. He was a noble, Christian man, well known and highly esteemed by all. Industrious and substantial, the long time he spent in Wasco county could but bring forth results, not only in temporal things but in moral and other ways which result in much good.

at the old homestead at Dutch Flat in June, 1902, aged seventy years. His father died before he was born and his mother very shortly afterward so he never knew the kind care and love of fond parents. He was reared by his father's brother and gained his education in the frontier schools and then followed steamboating with his headquarters in New York state. About ten years were spent thus and then he did warehouse work for five years. After that, he bought land in Michigan and farmed for some years. Finally he determined to come west and accordingly went to San Francisco, whence in the spring of 1880, he journeyed to Wasco county. After looking the county over, he decided to take the place that is now the old homestead and accordingly filed on it. It was one solid mass of timber and brush and Mr. Chittenden had a great work before him in clearing it for farm purposes. However, little by little he did so and began raising diversified crops and the result is that now the place is a very valuable farm.

On March 17, 1888, at The Dalles, Oregon, Mr. Chittenden married Katherine Overmyer, who was born in Fulton county, Indiana. Her father, Jacob Overmyer, was a native of Lindsey, Ohio, and came from a Pennsylvania-Dutch family. For many years they had resided in the colonies and the states and are a very numerous family. They are well represented in all the learned professions and many prominent ministers, lawyers, physicians and merchants are found in the family, especially in central United States. Mrs. Chittenden's paternal grandfather was a wealthy merchant in Ohio. Her father married Susan Jones, both natives of Pennsylvania and of Dutch stock. Mrs. Chittenden resided in Fulton county, Indiana, until she came west and married Mr. Chittenden whom she had known for many years. They lived very happily until he was called to the world beyond. They were both members of the Methodist church and active in Sunday-school work as is also the widow at this time. Mrs. Chittenden has taken up the added burdens of life with fortitude and courage and is overseeing the estate and attending to the property that was left. She is a noble Christian woman highly esteemed in the community and has many friends. Mr. Chittenden belonged to no denomination, but was a staunch supporter of the faith of the Bible and showed by his walk his Christian character and his sterling integrity and honesty.

JAMES FULTON is one of the wealthy pioneers of the Pacific slope. He was born in Missouri, on February 17, 1847, and now lives about eleven miles east from The Dalles on Tenmile creek. His parents were James and Priscilla (Wells) Fulton, natives of Missouri and Indiana, respectively. They both died in Sherman county. They crossed the plains when our subject was an infant and settled first in the Willamette valley where the father took a donation claim which he farmed for ten years. This was in Yamhill county, then later he sold out and came to Wasco county, settling about a mile and one half below the place where our subject now resides. A number of years were spent there and in 1870, they went to The Dalles, the father having sold his farm. For a time he was retired, then he invested considerable money in the eastern part of Wasco county, which is now Sherman county, building a warehouse and engaging in general merchandise at Des Chutes station. Here he was burned out and then he resumed farming on his Sherman county estates, where he continued until the time of his death, owning at that time, several sections of fine wheat land. Our subject was educated in the district schools and in the public schools in The Dalles and remained with his parents until his marriage on February 23, 1867, which occurred at The Dalles. Georgiana Foss, who was born in Illinois, on March 11, 1848, then became his wife. Her father, George S. Foss, married Joanna Johnson. He was a native of Maine, coming from an old colonial family, which was prominent there for many generations. His death occurred in Goldendale, Washington, in 1882. He had come to the coast with horse teams across the plains in 1862, and made settlement first on Tenmile creek. Later, we find him in the Willamette valley, after which he resided in Klickitat county, Washington, and did farming and stock raising. The mother was also born in Maine and came from an old and prominent family. She died in the Palouse country, in 1884. Mrs. Fulton was educated in the public schools and has two brothers, Jessie and Frank, and one sister, Mrs. Susan Hoeye. Mr. Fulton has three brothers, John, David and Frank, and three sisters, Mrs. Lucinda Isaacs, Mrs. Elizabeth Sehol, and Anna. To our subject and his wife, six children have been born; J. Frank, mentioned elsewhere in this work; Nellie, wife of William W. Floyd, at Prosser, Yakima county, Washington, a farmer and stockman; William, a farmer near The Dalles; Ada, the wife of Fred Stone, a farmer and sawmill man of Okanogan county, Washington; Mace C., at home; and Bessie P., who died March 14, 1891, aged six years and eleven months. Mr. Fulton is a good strong Democrat and is very active in the conventions and campaigns. He has been elected judge at various times and also school director and road supervisor. His brother, John, has been judge of Sherman county for years. His son, Mace, is at the present time road supervisor of this district. Mr. Fulton is a prominent and substantial citizen and one of the real builders of this county as was his father before him.

RILEY V. DRAKE, a respected and venerable resident of Wasco county, is now dwelling at the family home, seven miles out from The Dalles, on the Canyon City road. He was born in Chautauqua county, New York, on February 15, 1833, the son of Riley and Betsey (Matteson) Drake, both natives of the same county as our subject. The father's parents were also natives of that county. The Drake family is an old and prominent English family and one of the illustrious ancestors is the well known Francis Drake, of historic fame. The mother died when our subject was three weeks of age and he was reared by Linus Sutliff. When twenty-three, his father died. In 1853, our subject crossed the plains with an ox team train and they experienced much suffering, being for four days without food and three days without water. Much of the road they had to construct, as they were on the new route. They started on the Meek's cut-off, but got lost, which entailed this suffering.

However, they eventually reached Marion county, and there he remained until 1879. He participated in the early Indian wars of the fifties and now draws a pension from the government for those services. He was in Company F, First Oregon regiment, under Captain Charles Bennett, who was killed. Later he was under Captain William Cason. About 1879, or 1880, he took a homestead on Eightmile and then bought the place where he now resides.

On February 12, 1860, near Jefferson, Mr. Drake married Miss Sarah J. Johnson, who was born near Bowling Green, Kentucky. Her father, George Johnson, was born in the same place and came from a prominent southern family. He married Miss Emily E. Dyer, a native of Kentucky and from one of the leading southern families. Miss Dyer's grandfather was in the Revolution and was terribly tortured by the British soldiers by having his feet burned to force him to confess where his money was. Her brother was killed in the Mexican war. Many members of the family participated in all the wars and struggles in the colonial and later times. Mrs. Drake crossed the plains with an ox team train in the same year as her husband. Her father was a Baptist and took much interest in church work.

He died in Marion county in September, 1869, his wife having preceded him across the river, the date of her death being February 12, 1859. To Mr. and Mrs. Drake the following named children have been born; Linus, a carpenter in Spokane; Fred, with his parents; Monroe, who married Jessie L. Quinn, on January 1, 1905, born in Wasco county, the daughter of A. W. Quinn; Ettie, the wife of James Ferguson, a drayman in The Dalles; Mary, wife of John Ferguson, of The Dalles; Alzora, wife of Charles Thompson, at Dufur; Arlie married to Teel Ottis, of The Dalles, August 31, 1904; Joseph, who died on March 31, 1890, aged twenty-four years and ten months; George, who died April 14, 1894, aged twenty-one; Mary E., who was burned to death in Marion county, in October, 1868; and one infant, unnamed, who died in Wasco county. Mr. and Mrs. Drake are members of the Christian church. He is a Republican and has always taken a keen interest in educational and public matters. He is a well educated man, has kept himself abreast of the times and is a man of excellent principles. Mr. and Mrs. Drake have shown themselves worthy pioneers, noble and upright people and have done a worthy work in opening farms, in raising a fine family of children and in always so conducting themselves that they merited and received the esteem and good will of all.

WILLIAM M. McCORKLE, one of the pioneers of Oregon, as well as California, is now dwelling in a comfortable home two miles west from Tygh valley, where he has been a resident for some time. He owns various property and has been prospered financially so that he is justified now in retiring from the arduous labors which have occupied him all his days. He is a man of sound principles and has so lived in his long career that he has won and still retains the friendship and approval of all good people, with whom he has been associated. He is a valued member of society here and is looked up to by all.

William M. McCorkle was born in Indiana, on February 25, 1829. His father, Richard B. McCorkle, was the son of one of three brothers who came from the north of Ireland to the colonies before the Revolution. He settled in North Carolina and with his brothers participated in the Revolution. His son, Richard B. McCorkle, was the father of our subject, and was born in North Carolina and died in Illinois, in 1863. He married Miss Isabella Campbell, a native of Kentucky and descended from an old colonial family. She died in Illinois in 1867. The family had removed to Illinois when our subject was only three years old. There he grew up and was educated, remaining on his father's farm until 1850, in which year he went thence to California. For a year he washed the golden sands of that Utopia and gained a comfortable fortune with which he wended his way back to the states. In 1852, he crossed the plains a second time, on this occasion to Oregon. Mule and horse teams were used both times for transportation. He first settled on a donation claim in Linn county and sixteen years later sold it and moved to the Indian agency, taking a government position as miller. Four years later he resigned from that post and bought land on Fifteenmile creek in this county, which was two miles above the present site of Dufur. The farm is now owned by William Vanderpool. An incorporated company began the erection of a mill in Tygh Valley, and sent for our subject to install the machinery and operate the plant. He did so and later the company became insolvent and the sheriff sold the plant. As Mr. McCorkle had not been paid wages for some time, he had a claim and bought in the property and has operated it since. He is now retired from the active work of the mill, but rents it. He owns a fine home adjoining, which is beautifully situated in an ideal spot for a home.

On May 15, 1851, in Illinois, Mr. McCorkle married Miss Mary A. Smith, a native of Ohio. She was the daughter of Captain John Smith, a native of Kentucky and captain in the Black-hawk war. He accompanied our subject to Oregon and was twice sheriff of Linn county, this state. Then he was appointed Indian agent at Warm Springs agency by A. Lincoln, and for nineteen years he held the position. He was the most popular and best liked man ever in that position. His death occurred while in that service. He married Miss Jane Ruggles, a native of Kentucky. She was married in Ohio and came with the family to this state. Her death occurred at the home of our subject, in 1877. Mr. McCorkle's wife died at the farm near Dufur, on April 27, 1877, leaving a family of small children. Then Mr. McCorkle contracted a second marriage, Mrs. Abbie Zumwalt becoming his wife. Her parents died in Illinois and she came here with a sister and kept house for a brother until she married Mr. Zumwalt, who died soon after, leaving no issue. To Mr. and Mrs. McCorkle two sons have been born; Philip S., living three miles north from his father's place; Ernest V., near the Des Chutes. By his former marriage, Mr. McCorkle has six children; Frank E., a farmer on Tygh creek; Chester, a stockman in Crook county; John and Rufus, on Juniper flat; Amanda, wife of Dr. M. A. Flinn, in Portland; and Annie, the wife of R. L. Willoughby, a dentist in Eugene. Mr. McCorkle is a staunch Republican and never voted but for one Democrat, a neighbor, for justice of the peace. He has attended every county convention of his party including the first one and has been to the state conventions. He is a prominent man and influential. For thirty-two years he has been school director and has always given his influence for the advancement of educational facilities. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, while his wife belongs to the Methodist. They are both prominent in church work and he has been superintendent of the Sunday school for some time. Mr. and Mrs. McCorkle are among the most highly esteemed people of this part of the county, and are certainly worthy of this pleasant distinction.

HANS LAGE. There is no more substantial class of people under the stars and stripes than those who have come to our shores from the fatherland. They are people of industry and thrifty habits, with good ideas of government, industrious and loyal and they are representative Americans in every respect, and much of the brilliant success of this great nation is due to the wise and devoted efforts of her German citizens. Among these people we are constrained to mention the gentleman, whose name appears above, who has performed a work in Wasco county that entitles him to the position of pioneer builder of the country. He is well known and is considered one of the leading and influential men of Hood river valley. He resides on the east side of the river, about four miles south from Hood River, where he has a fine large estate, productive and valuable. He was born in Holstein, Germany, on March 18, 1847. His father, Joachim, was a native of the same place and died there in 1875. He married Miss Abel Weise, also a native of the same locality where she is now living, aged eighty-seven. For a score of years, Hans Lage lived in Germany and gained his education there and learned well the way of the farmer and husbandmen, then it being 1867, he journeyed to the United States and settled in the vicinity of Davenport, Iowa, where he did farming. He rented until 1875, when he came to Hood River and after due investigation, selected the place where he is now residing and took it as a homestead. One hundred and ten acres are under cultivation and his crops are diversified. His farm is a model of neatness, thrift and wisdom and for thirty years he has not only done a good work in this line but has stimulated scores of others to worthy efforts.

At Davenport, Iowa, in 1871, Mr. Lage married Miss Lena Hock, a native of Germany. Her father, Claus Hock, came from Germany to the United States in 1854, this daughter then being two years of age. He farmed in Iowa for many years and in 1875, came to Hood River and took a homestead near where our subject now lives. His death occurred in 1887. His wife is a native of Germany and died at Davenport, Iowa. He served for nine months in the Civil War and was discharged on account of injuries. After his wife's death, in 1874, he married Miss Bertha Miller, who died in Hood River in 1886. Mr. Lage has two brothers in Davenport, Iowa, Claus and Ferdinand; two brothers in Germany, Heinrich and Peter; and two sisters, Trena, wife of Henry Viedal and Marguerite, wife of Dilloff Haas, both natives of Germany. Mrs. Lage has one half brother, Julius C. and one half sister, Minnie, wife of Carl Jenson. To our subject and his wife, the following named children have been born: Henry F., manager of the Moody farm, and mentioned elsewhere in this work; Bernhardt, in Hood River; Edward E. and Charles, at home; Meta A., wife of W. P. Scobey, Hood River, a farmer; Emma, wife of John Koberg, at Hood River; Laura, wife of Alex. J. Henderson, Bigham, Washington; Alfred, William and Celia, deceased.

Mr. Lage is a member of the K. O. T. M. and in politics, he is a staunch and active Republican. He is frequently at the conventions, where he is an influential and active figure. At the present time, he is road overseer of his district and a school director. Mr. Lage is one of the whole souled, genial and generous men who look on the bright side of life and takes his joy as he goes along. Consequently, he has won very many friends and is admired and beloved by all.

WILLARD L. VANDERPOOL, one of the earlier settlers and pioneers of Crook county, is a native of the present state, having been born in the territorial days, December 24, 1856. His parents, Larkin and Mary (Turnidge) Vanderpool, were natives of Missouri, the father a descendant of an old Dutch Pennsylvania family. They crossed the plains in 1852 and settled in Benton county, Oregon, where Dr. Larkin Vanderpool practiced medicine, in 1869 migrating to Prineville, Crook county, where he continued the practice of his profession. In 1884, the family removed to Dufur, Wasco county, where he died ten years later. The mother was married in Missouri, and accompanied her husband in the perilous journey across the plains in 1852. Her parents were natives of the North of Ireland. She died in Dufur.

Until the period of his marriage our subject, Willard L., continued to reside with his parents, attending the district schools and working on the homestead. His wife was Miss Mary Heisler, also a native of Oregon, born in Lane county. Her parents were William and Martha (McConnell) Heisler, mentioned elsewhere. Mrs. Vanderpool has four brothers and five sisters, sketches of whom appear in other portions of this book. Our subject and his wife are parents of one child, John K., aged seven years. They have lost one little girl, Ada, who died at the age of five.

The fraternal affiliations of Mr. Vanderpool are with the A. F. & A. M., Wasco Lodge, No. 15; The Dalles Chapter, R. A. M.; Ridgely Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F.; Nicholson Encampment; Star Rebekah Lodge, No. 23, all of Dufur; of the Grand Lodge, I. O. O. F., the A. O. U. W., and W. W. His political affiliations are with the Republican party, and he has frequently been a delegate to county conventions. At present he is mayor of Dufur, serving his second term. In partnership with Hon. T. H. Johnston he owns eight hundred acres of land, six hundred acres of which are devoted to the production of wheat. He is recognized as an active, enterprising citizen, with the best interests of the community at heart, and he has won the confidence of all of his acquaintances by his social characteristics and unimpeachable integrity.

LOUIS J. KLINGER, a retired farmer residing at Dufur, Wasco county, is one of the earliest of Oregon pioneers, having come into the country in 1847. He was born in Warren county, Missouri, October 19, 1837, the son of John and Mary Klinger, natives of Germany. The father was born on the River Rhine, and came to the United States in the early 30's, settling in Warren county. He came west and died in Clackamas county in the fall of 1862. The mother died when our subject was six years of age in Warren county, Missouri. When Louis was ten years of age he came across the plains accompanied by his father and five other members of the family, and they were among the first to cross the Cascades with ox teams on the Barlow road, which was completed that year, in 1847. A scanty supply of rice with a small allowance of bread made up their sole provisions, towards the last of the trip. The journey to the spot where now stands the town of Dufur, a distance of three thousand miles, was fraught with hardships and peril. At The Dalles our subject saw a house, and shouted, "A house, a house!" this being the first building they had seen, with the exception of Forts Laramie, Hall and Boise, since leaving Independence, Missouri. Mr. Klinger remembers seeing many campers along the road who had killed their last ox for food. It is estimated that seven thousand immigrants started that year for Oregon, hundreds of whom died en route, and other hundreds reached Oregon in a starving condition. When the Klinger family arrived in Oregon City the father had only twenty-five cents in money, and wheat was worth six dollars a bushel. Dr. McLaughlin, for many years with the Hudson's Bay Company, sold him grain, taking his note. They settled on Mollala Prairie, ten miles above Oregon City, taking a donation claim, where our subject grew to manhood, being educated in a "subscription" school. Mr. Klinger has one half brother, Frank, and of his five full brothers and sisters, Christina, wife of Clifton Callahan, died in 1897; Therese, died in 1893 in Inyo county, California; William in 1867 and Frederick in 1901, both in Clackamas county. He has one sister living, Mrs. Matilda Clock, whose husband is a farmer living in Modoc county, California.

March 17, 1861, Mr. Klinger was married to Melissa J. Woodcock, born on the plains in 1844 while her parents were en route for Oregon. Her parents were Wilson D. and Keziah (Bunton) Woodcock. She has four half brothers, Wilson D., Thomas P., William and Abner, and one full sister, Mary, married to Ephraim Ramsby, of Klamath Falls, Oregon.

In 1863 our subject came to Wasco county, settling on Eightmile creek, four miles northeast of Dufur, where he engaged in farming and stock raising. While teaming in this country he crossed the creek one hundred and nineteen times while en route to Boise, Idaho, in five miles on one trip. In company with John R. Doyle, Jack McHaley and Robert Clark he purchased the first separator ever brought into Wasco county. In 1889 our subject had amassed a modest competence and, selling his farm, he removed to the town of Dufur, where he owns a cosy story and a half house in a city block in the center of the town. He also owns another choice block which he utilizes for the purpose of a pasture. Mr. Klinger is an enthusiastic hunter, and fisherman, passing a large portion of the summer in the mountains. He is a member of Ridgely Lodge No. 71, I. O. O. F., and is recognized as a progressive, broad-minded and influential citizen. He has served two terms as mayor of Dufur, but cares more for his superior camping outfit than he does for political honors. He is a Democrat, although not at all partisan. On several inventions our subject has taken out patents, one of them, a weeding machine, being of inestimable value. He has also invented a baling press and hand hay press, which he never patented although it is conceded to be of great value.

CHARLES W. JOHNSTON, deceased.—

The subject of the following memoir came to The Dalles from his home, in Centreville, New Brunswick, about 1882. For thirteen years he was in the employment of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company in various capacities, having been an engineer nearly seven years. He was injured in an accident, his engine being capsized in a sand drift, and he was crushed and bruised, surviving the fatality only one hour. He was buried at The Dalles, the funeral being under the auspices of Wasco Lodge, A. F. & A. M. Mr. Johnston was a Knight Templar and a popular member of the K. P., being in the V. C. chair at time of death. He was highly esteemed by his friends and business associates, and one who had won the highest confidence of the officials of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company.

JAMES W. DICKSON is an example of one who has seen sorrow and much of the hard side of life in his younger years, but who, in spite of all adversity and trying times, has fought his own way to a successful position in the community today and has won from the shy maid of fortune a goodly competence which is a justly bestowed reward for his industry and faithfulness. He resides about a mile south from Endersly post-office where he owns two hundred acres of choice land, which produces an abundance of general crops each year. He uses half for pasture and half for crops. In addition to handling his farm, Mr. Dickson does considerable freighting and teaming and is well known all through the country. Wherever he is known he has friends as his walk has been such as to win the esteem of good people.

James W. Dickson was born in England, on December 16, 1856. When three months of age, his parents embarked for the United States and while on the voyage, the father was lost overboard, and our subject does not even know his Christian name. The mother died soon after landing in Illinois, while James was still an infant. Then he was taken by a brother of his mother, who lived in the province of Quebec, Canada, and with this man he remained until thirteen. During those years of service, he had things rather severe, and his education was sadly neglected by the man who should have looked after it. However, young Dickson was made of the stuff that would not down and at the age mentioned stepped forth from this position to start in life for himself. He then applied himself at all opportunities and learned readily and stored his mind with a good fund of knowledge for life's battle. He went from Canada to New York upon leaving his uncle and from that day to this, he has always supported himself. He worked in the lumber woods and on the farms and in May, 1878, landed in Oregon City. He was in various places in the Willamette valley for three years and then came to Wasco county. After this he spent a year in sawmilling on Puget sound and late in the eighties he took his present place as a homestead. He added a railroad tory by purchase and since then has bestowed his labors here with the happy result that he has a choice place. On January 2, 1888, Mr. Dickson married Miss Mary Fligg, the wedding occurring at the home of the bride's sister. Her father is George Fligg and he is mentioned elsewhere in this volume with the other members of his family. Mr. Dickson had one brother, William, who was killed in the battle of Fredericksburg, in the Rebellion. Four children have been born to our subject's household, Wilbur, Ernest, Ruth and Delbert. Mrs. Dickson is a member of the Christian church. Mr. Dickson is a Republican, chairman of the school board and a member of the A. F. & A. M.

MRS. ALMA L. HOWE is too well known in the Hood River country to need an introduction but on account of what she has been and what she is, a review of her life will be very interesting to all. She is the proprietor of the Cottage Farm which lies a mile and one-half from the town of Hood River and is one of the ideal spots in the great Columbia valley. She was born in Marion county, Oregon, on June 7, 1860, the daughter of Isaac N. and Harriet (Millsap) Lawrence, natives of Missouri. The father died in 1886 in Knappton, Washington, and the mother died in Marion county, Oregon. The father crossed the plains in 1854 and the mother in 1855. He was one of the well known mill men of Oregon, building the first sawmill in East Portland. He did more than can be written to place the sawmilling industry upon its feet in Washington and Oregon in pioneer days. He was a man of great energy and stamina. When our subject was nine years of age the father moved to Portland and she was educated in the Portland schools. On September 8, 1878, at Portland, she married Samuel T. Howe, a native of Indiana. One child was born to this union, Hester A., a lady of culture and refinement. While still very young, Mrs. Howe learned the profession of a nurse and has followed it more or less since. Owing to adverse circumstances, she was obliged to support herself and daughter continuously. Owing to her courage and spirit, she accepted her lot with graciousness and has done a noble work as will be seen. In 1885, she bought forty acres where she now resides near Hood River. The place was only slightly improved, but as she was able a little each year she added improvements and today it is one of the model homes in the state of Oregon. In 1897, she sold twenty acres and since then has given her entire attention to the management of the twenty acres remaining. Fifteen acres of this are devoted to strawberries, while the other five produce clover, vegetables and orchard. The farm is beautifully laid out and no better kept place can be found in the west. At first she did diversified farming, but as soon as the water for irrigation was provided she had the place planted as mentioned above. In 1894, Mrs. Howe erected a large house for the accommodation of summer boarders. The popularity of her place is well shown in that she since erected four cottages for the same purpose and now accommodates about thirty-five boarders during the summer months. Her place is most beautifully situated, overlooking the country for miles, is supplied with plenty of pure water and in every respect is as choice a place as can be found. The climate is healthful and invigorating and no word need be said in reference to the kindly care that Mrs. Howe takes of all her guests. In all the labors of the farm she has attended to the details and the direction entirely alone, having no male relatives to assist her. It speaks very highly of her ability and courage to undertake to carry on this great work and she certainly deserves the most unbounded success which she has earned. Mrs. Howe has one half-brother, Chester, deceased, and three sisters, Mrs. Mary L. Parmenter, Mrs. Alice J. Darling, and Mrs. Ella F. Baird. Mrs. Howe is a devoted member of the Methodist church and a liberal supporter of the faith. It is very interesting to know that Mrs. Howe has in her family a woman known as Indian Nellie, who is aged seventy and now entirely helpless on account of rheumatism. She is caring for this poor aged woman and expects to until her death, which is a true Christian work. Indian Nellie is the last of her family and is indeed a very pathetic creature.

Mrs. Howe is highly esteemed by every person who knows her and receives the unbounded admiration and commendation of the entire Hood River country.

EDWARD M. HARRIMAN is one of the leading farmers and stockmen in Wasco county. His estate lies just west from Endersly, where he has five hundred and forty acres, about half of which is cultivated. The balance is utilized for pasture. He has all the improvements needed on a first class estate and his residence, which has recently been remodeled and added to, is a comfortable and tasty structure. In addition to his farming, he handles blooded stock and has choice specimens, both of horses and cattle. He winters about thirty head of each kind. Mr. Harriman has displayed an energy and sagacity in the conduct of his business and in the acquirement of his property which commend him as one of the leading men of the community and his sound principles and integrity have given him an unsullied reputation.

Edward M. Harriman was born in England, on September 16, 1855, the son of John and Elizabeth (Hanford) Harriman, both natives of England. The father died there in 1876 and was of the seventh generation of his family that had been born in Leicestershire. The mother died at The Dalles in 1889. In the National school in Sielby parish, Leicestershire, our subject received a splendid education and then for two years worked in a hardware store. When eighteen years of age, he landed in the United States, and after a few weeks spent in New York and six months in New Jersey, he came on to Illinois, landing there in May, 1874. The next March, he went to Marysville, California and in that vicinity and various other places in the Golden State, including San Francisco, he worked at different employments and during the four years there he took a trip of four months to Oregon. In 1879, he was again in the Willamette valley and in 1880 he came to The Dalles. He worked for the O. R. & N., and for farmers for a couple of years, and then bought school land where he now lives. He has since that time given his attention to the improvement and cultivation of his estate and has made a good success, as his possessions indicate.

At The Dalles, on February 17, 1886, Mr. Harriman married Miss Ada E., the daughter of Williston D. and Alazanna (Cornelius) Woodcock. She was born in Clackamas county, twelve miles out from Oregon City, on February 7, 1868. Her father was born in New York, crossed the plains with ox teams, having a very hard trip. He died when this daughter was two years old. The mother, who was her husband's second wife, was born in Ohio, crossed the plains with her parents and died in the Willamette valley. Mr. Harriman has two brothers, who are mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mrs. Harriman has the following named brothers and sisters, Williston D., Thomas P., William, Absalom C., Newton and Jasper, twins, Francis M., died in 1884, Mrs. Sophia Ramsby, and two sisters who are deceased. She also has one half-brother, Alonzo, deceased, two half-sisters living, Mrs. Melissa Klinger and Mrs. Mary A. McHaley, and two half-sisters deceased, Eliza and Sarah. To Mr. and Mrs. Harriman five children have been born: Nellie H., aged seventeen; Edna C., aged fifteen; Arthur A., aged thirteen; Fred E., aged eleven; and Dickson L., aged eight. Mr. Harriman is an independent Republican and is frequently at the different conventions. He has been school director and road supervisor and has always manifested a lively interest in the advancement and upbuilding of the country.

GEORGE W. FLIGG, the popular and genial postmaster at Endersly, Oregon, is one of the capable men who have labored for the advancement of Wasco county and is now one of its representative citizens. He was born on October 10, 1833, in Morgan county, Illinois, the son of John and Martha H. Fligg; natives of England, where they were married. A few years previous to the birth of our subject, they came to the United States and settled in Morgan county, Illinois. When George was four years of age, his father died and he early learned the hardships of life, being obliged to work hard as soon as he was able to do even a boy's work. When ten, he went to Iowa, and from that time he was practically for himself in this world. He was with a brother-in-law and other relatives until his marriage, on October 15, 1855, to Mary F., the daughter of Jackson and Parthenia (Merrill) Gregory. The father was born in Alabama and his parents in North Carolina, being descended from colonial settlers. The mother was also born in North Carolina and her ancestors were among the earliest settlers in the colonies. Mrs. Fligg was born in Alabama. Forty years after his marriage were spent by our subject in Fairfield doing carpentering and building. Then he went to Omaha, Nebraska, and in 1895 came to Oregon and took a homestead which he increased by the purchase of eighty acres. About 1899, he sold this property and removed on the small farm where the postoffice of Endersly is now located. When in the east, Mr. Fligg had an interest in a coal mine and was possessed of town property besides. In addition to the post-office, he handles a store and is patronized well from the surrounding country. Mr. Fligg has one sister, Mrs. Sarah Rowland. To Mr. and Mrs. Fligg, the following named children have been born; Charles, in Fairfield, Iowa; Allen, a farmer near by; Sarah E., the wife of George W. Covert, on Pleasant ridge; Louisa, the wife of Frank Still; Belle, the wife of J. C. Bailey, a carpenter in Fairfield, Iowa; Cora, wife of William Endersby; Mary, the wife of James Dickson, mentioned elsewhere; Edwin, died April 24, 1872, William, died August 24, 1876; Minnie, died December 18, 1876; Franklin, died January 18, 1878; and Martha E., died October 19, 1880. Mr. Fligg is a staunch Republican, used to be a Whig, and has voted for every Republican candidate for president since the party was organized. He has been road supervisor and is now serving his third term as justice of the peace. He and his wife belong to the Christian church and are highly esteemed people.

MILO M. CUSHING is one of the earliest pioneers of the territory now occupied by Wasco county, and having weathered the storms of half a century here, is now permitted to see the country developed which was a wilderness when he came. He resides about three miles east from The Dalles and there owns a good farm. He is well known all over this part of the country and has the good will and esteem of everyone who knows him.

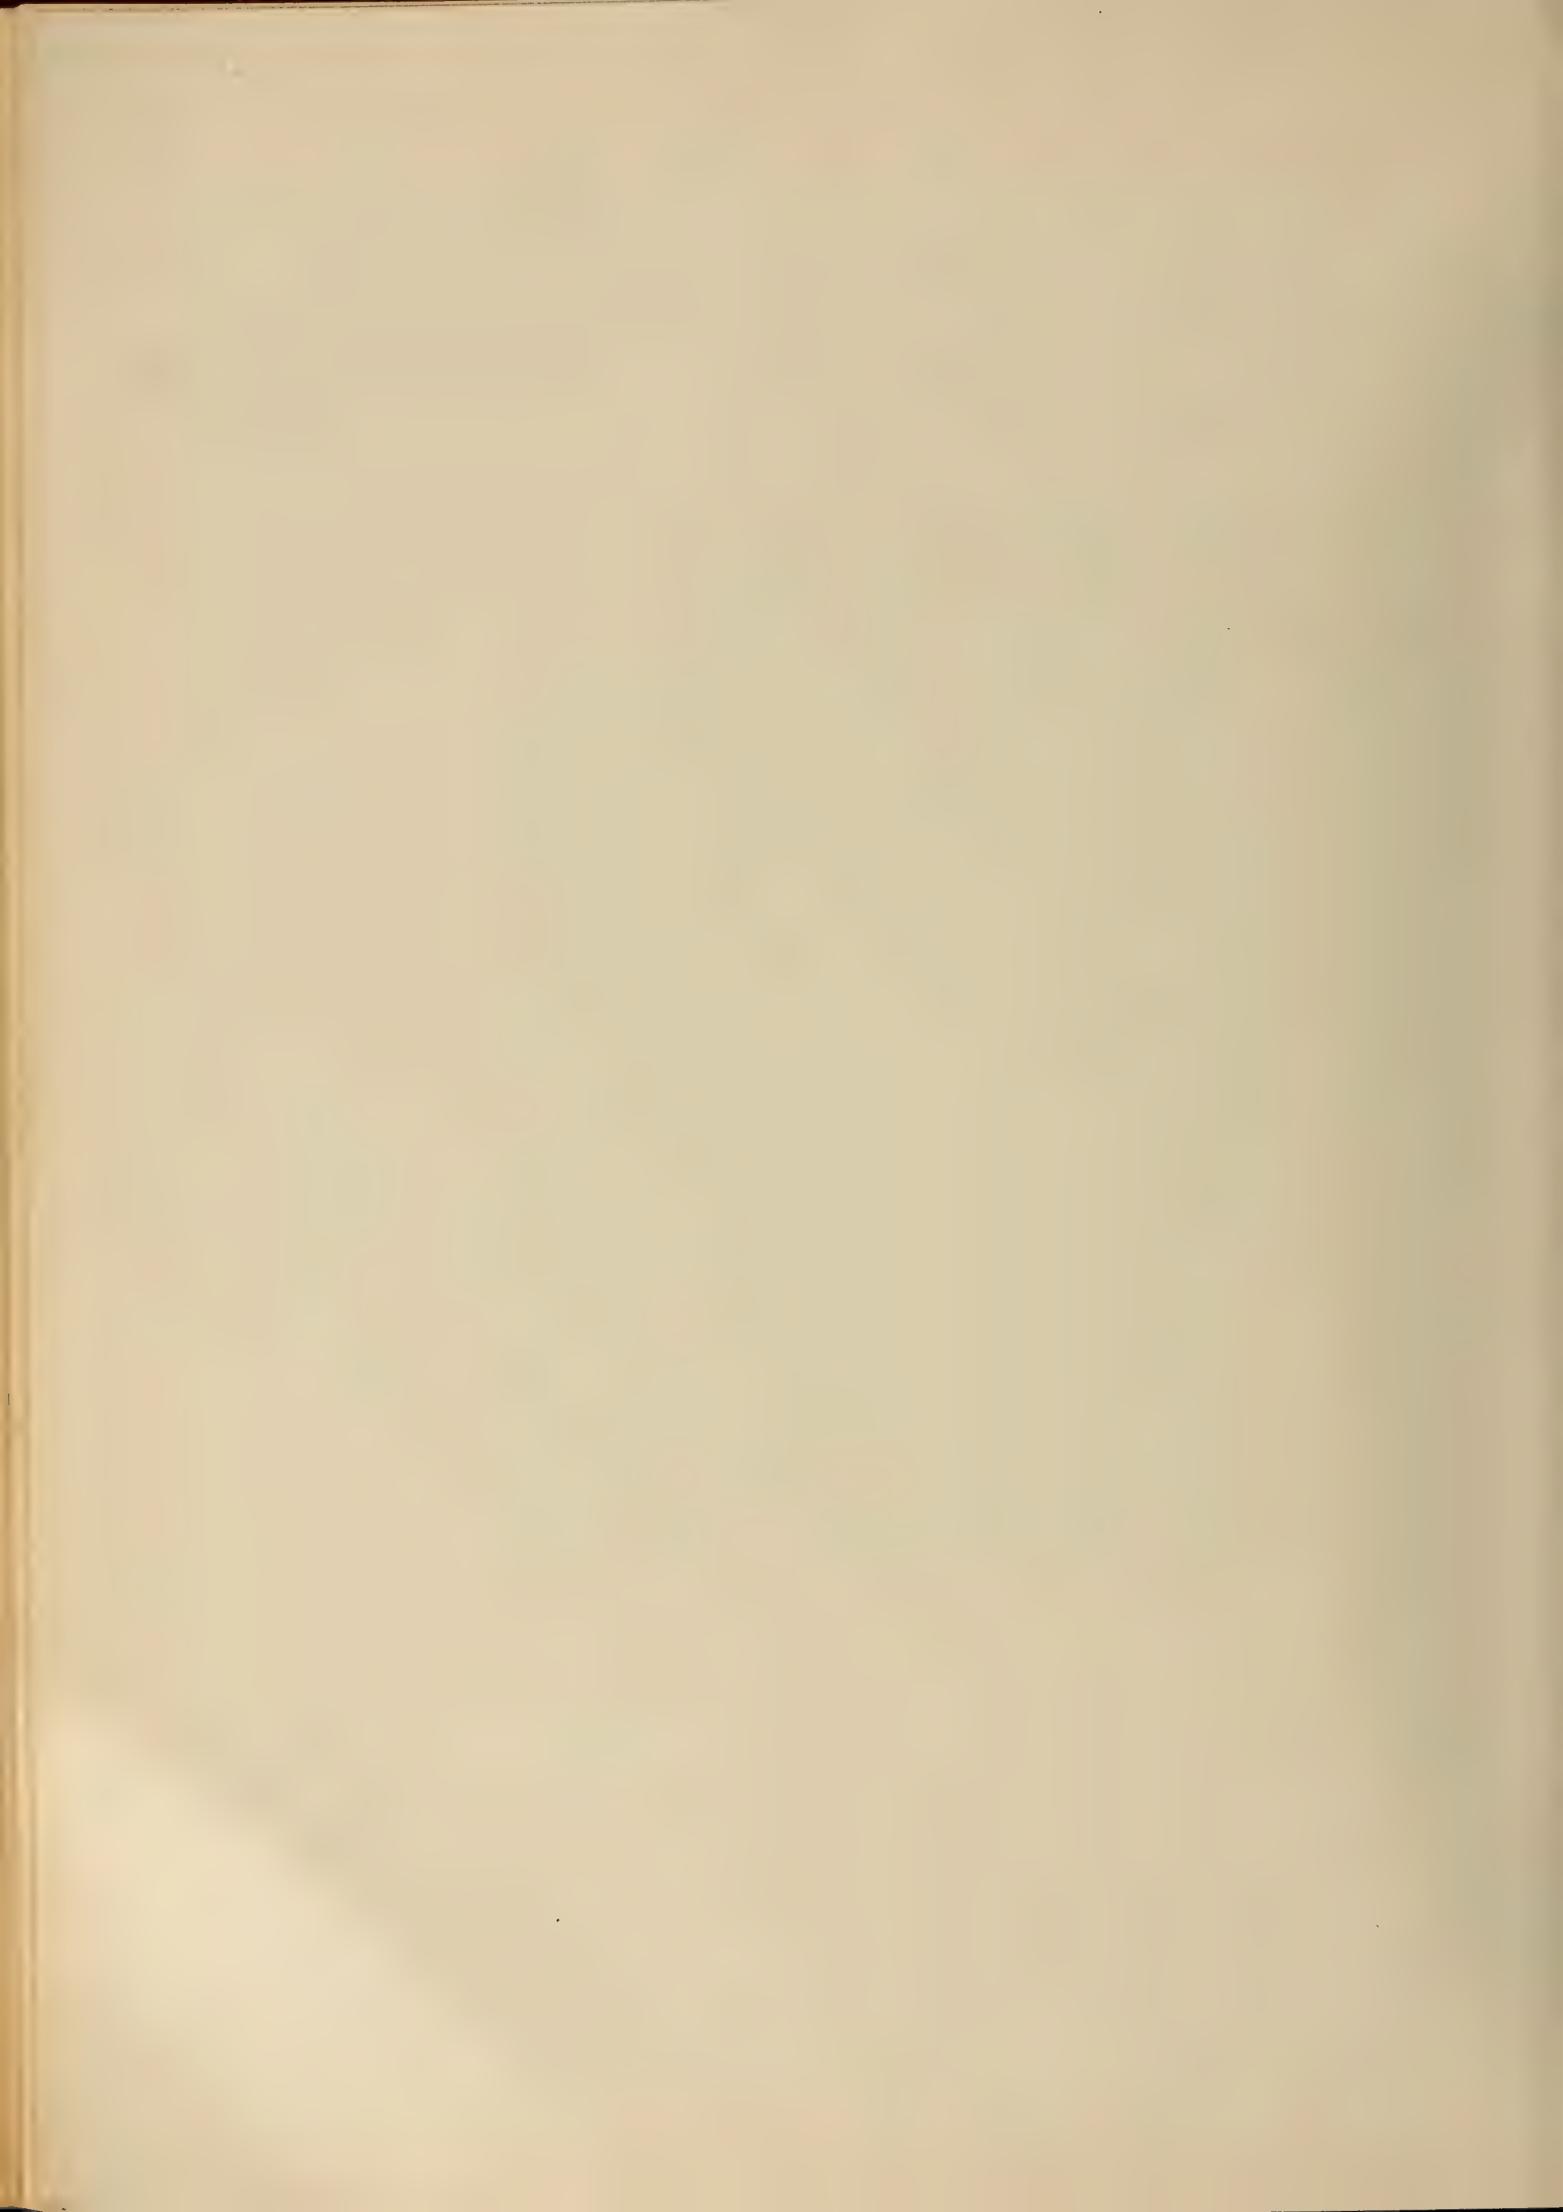

Milo M. Cushing was born in Truxton, New York, on July 3, 1820. His father, Charles Cushing, was born on January 3, 1793, and died at Hillsdale, Michigan. His father, Asaph L., the grandfather of our subject, was born in 1767, while this venerable gentleman's father, Nathan Cushing, which would be the great-grandfather of our subject, was born in 1730. The family were of old colonial stock and prominent both as pioneers of the country and as patriots in the various wars. The mother of our subject, Hannah (Morris) Cushing, was a native of New York and died on October 18, 1824. The Morris family is one well known in the early history of this country. Asaph L. Cushing was a musician in the war of 1812. When Milo M. was five years old his mother died and he was reared by his grandparents, on his father's side, until the father married Mrs. Harriet Maxon. When fourteen, our subject began life for himself and wrought variously, attending school in winters until eighteen. He then went into the grocery business in Shawnee and was deputy postmaster of the town. Two years later he sold out and soon went to Michigan, where his grandfather Morris was. Then we find him operating in a hotel in Armada and also he handled a grocery store. Two years later he opened a grocery in Hillsdale, but was taken ill in two years. Upon his recovery he bartered dry goods to the Indians for furs for a year, then, on June 6, 1845, he married Miss Mary A. Burlingham, in Washington, Michigan, who was born in Warsaw, New York, on March 30, 1822. In December, 1848, he enlisted in the regular army and handled the officers' mess at fort Gratiot, Michigan. On September 9, 1849, his wife died and then he gave up that position and took up the regular duty of a soldier from which he was promoted to sergeant. In 1852, he came to Oregon, being under Captain Alvord, Colonel Bonneville, Grant being regimental quartermaster. He was in regular quartermaster service and in the discharge of other duties until December, 1853, when he received his discharge at The Dalles. He then obtained permission to erect a building on the government reserve, which is now the ground occupied by The Dalles. He soon had a good block house made of hewn logs on the river front. Later he erected a hotel and also a merchandise establishment. His were the first business buildings in the now prosperous town of The Dalles. His hotel was known as the Cushing House, and the rates were seventy-five cents per meal and fifty cents for a bed. After operating the hotel for a year, Mr. Cushing rented it but continued with the mercantile business for five years then took a homestead on Millcreek. Mr. Cushing owned a quarter interest in the steamboat "Wasco," which plied between The Dalles and the Cascades. He held this interest for three years. This was the first boat built east of the Cascades for this run. Later he sold all his town property and did farming on Mill creek.

On April 6, 1854, he married Miss Mary Piggott, a native of Ireland. Later he engaged in business in The Dalles until 1876, when he sold out and retired to the farm where he now resides. He bought state land here and for many years handled the poor farm. Mrs. Cushing came here in 1853. She is the daughter of William and Catherine (Noonon) Piggott, natives of Ireland, where they remained until their death. Mrs. Cushing has no near relatives in the United States. Mr. Cushing has one sister, Mary E. Evans, a widow, and one half brother, James N., and one half sister, Jane E. By his first marriage, Mr. Cushing had one child, Charles B., a merchant in Tacoma, also one deceased, Mary A.,

Milo M. Cushing

who died in McComb county, Michigan. To Mr. Cushing and his present wife, the following named children have been born; Eliza E., Frank L., Caleb, Joseph M., Morris A., all dead; Milo M., Jr., in Mayville, Oregon; and William H., who is mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mr. Cushing succeeded the sutler as postmaster of The Dalles and was elected the first justice of the peace but did not qualify. He was, also, the first treasurer of the county, being elected on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Cushing's name is indelibly written in the history of Wasco county and the labors he has done are far reaching and excellent. He and his wife are among the most highly esteemed people in the county at this day, and these venerable Christian people, dwelling in security in the country they assisted to wrest from the wilderness, is one of the beautiful sights of the west.

WILLIAM H. CUSHING is a native son of Wasco county and has showed himself one in which the qualities of worth and substantiality together with wisdom and geniality are happily blended. He was educated in the public schools of The Dalles and during the hours when not at his books was helping his father in the latter's store. This life continued until the lad had reached fourteen when the father sold his town property and repaired to the country, purchasing land where our subject now resides, three miles east from town. Since then, Mr. Cushing has devoted himself to farming and now is handling his father's farm and one of his own, which adjoins his father's land. He has a choice place of eighty acres and another of two hundred and forty acres and is one of the thrifty farmers of Wasco county.

William H. Cushing was born in The Dalles, on June 4, 1862, the son of Milo and Mary (Piggott) Cushing, natives of Lockport, New York, and Ireland, respectively. They both now dwell on the farm near our subject. The father descends from a prominent family which has always been influential in American politics even before the time of the Declaration of Independence.

On November 30, 1884, Mr. Cushing married Miss Josephine, the daughter of Thomas and Mary (Gates) Knebel, and a native of Iowa. Her father came from Germany, his native country, to the United States when six years old. The family settled in Iowa and in 1868, he came to Oregon, settling near Eugene. Later he came to Wasco county and died on his farm, near that of our subject. The mother now lives in The Dalles. Mr. Cushing has two brothers who are mentioned in this work. Mrs. Cushing has two brothers, Joseph and Daniel, and five sisters, Mrs. Theresa Anlauf, Mrs. Thomas Denton, Mrs. Odelia Harvey, Mrs. Ida Jackel, and Mrs. Kate Nowak. The following named children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cushing, Frank, Katie, Olive, Benie, Esther, Sybil, and Morris. Mr. Cushing is a member of the M. W. A. and is a well informed Democrat. He has often been to the conventions and is now on the school board, having served five consecutive terms. He has also been road supervisor for two terms. Both Mr. and Mrs. Cushing are members of the Roman Catholic church. They are well respected people and have shown a progressive spirit in their careers.

MILTON J. ANDERSON, second ranger of the United States Forest Reserve, residing at The Dalles, Wasco county, was born in Sacramento county, California, October 11, 1860. His father, Hartford Anderson, was a native of Scotland, coming to the United States and locating in Pennsylvania with his parents when a child. He was a ship carpenter, and died in Sacramento, California. The mother, a native of the North of Ireland, died in 1874.

Folsom, California, was the scene of our subject's youth and early manhood. He was educated in the public schools of that town, attended the high school and acquired an excellent business education. He remained in California until he was twenty years of age, was four years a drug clerk, and four years in the Pacific Carriage Works in Sacramento, and became a carriage ironer. In 1884 he came to Wasco county and opened a blacksmith shop, manufacturing all descriptions of carriage iron. He organized the Summer Fallow Machine Company in 1889, and began the manufacture of cultivators. The company discontinued business in 1902, and shortly afterward he was appointed to his present position with the forest reserve. For many years Mr. Anderson has been an enthusiastic advocate of forestry and forest protection, and was a member and prime mover in the first Forest Protection Association, organized in Oregon. He was secretary of the association four years, and his efforts in that line were cordially recognized by the government. On being appointed to the position of ranger he removed to The Dalles from Dufur, disposing of his home in the latter town.

Politically he is a Republican and has served as delegate to nearly every state and county convention since 1883. He has served two terms as mayor of Dufur, and one term as chairman of the board of school directors. Mr. Anderson drafted the original charter of the city of Dufur, and in 1893 proceeded with it to Salem and secured its adoption. He is a member of the W. O. T. W., No. 215; charter member of the Council and was commander the first three years of its existence. He has four brothers and one sister: Levi H., a miner of Sacramento, California; Charles A. and Edward H., in the employment of the Central Pacific Railway, in California; William A., an attorney and ex-member of the California legislature, now probate judge in Sacramento; and Maggie, single, a teacher in the grammar school of Sacramento. June 27, 1886, at Wamic, Wasco county, Oregon, Mr. Anderson was married to Ella M. Rodman, born in Utah. Her parents are William R. and Louisa Rodman, living at Wamic. She has one brother and four sisters: Hugh, a farmer near Walla Walla, Washington; Ruth, wife of Daniel Crowley, of Antelope; Laura, married to James Palmer, of Portland, Oregon; Belle, wife of Joseph H. Prout, a forest ranger living at Wamic; and Elsie, wife of David Campbell, a farmer near Wamic. Mr. and Mrs. Anderson have four children, Alvis M., H. Vernon, Malcolm and Irene, aged sixteen, thirteen, eleven and one years, respectively. Our subject has been clerk of the house or senate of the Oregon legislature every session since 1891. He is a member of the American Forestry Association, Washington, D. C.

ELI T. HINMAN, contractor and builder, residing at Dufur, Wasco county, was born at Augusta, Oneida county, New York, January 23, 1834, the son of Eli and Ann (Foote) Hinman. The father was born in Oneida county, and his parents were descendants of A. Hinman, who came from England early in the seventeenth century. Many of this family still live in New England and New York, and are distinguished members of the bench and bar and commercial circles. The mother of our subject was born in Madison county, New York, a descendant of the old Foote family of England, members of which have been eminent in literary, military, naval and dramatic circles for several centuries.

Eli T. Hinman, our subject, was reared principally in the Empire state, where he attended the public schools and the Munnsville (Madison county) high school. When twenty-three years of age, he removed to Illinois where he was engaged in farm work, remaining there twenty-five years. He came to Oregon in 1881 and engaged in sheep raising on the Des Chutes river, Wasco county. Six years thereafter, in 1887, he disposed of his interests in this business and located in Dufur, or what is now Dufur, for at that period there was but one house in the vicinity. Here Mr. Hinman engaged in building and contracting. In company with his partner, Monroe Heisler, he built the Methodist and United Brethren churches, the city school and many residences and business blocks. Mr. Hinman has one brother and one sister, Orin W., in McDonough county, Illinois, and Zerlina, wife of S. B. Black, of Henderson county, Illinois.

Our subject was married May 13, 1857, at Horseheads, Chemung county, New York, to Mary E. Reynolds, a native of that county. Her father, Henry, and mother, Melinda (Corning) Reynolds, were, also, natives of the Empire State. Mrs. Hinman has one sister, Esther, widow of Barney Stryker, of Elmira, New York. Mr. and Mrs. Hinman are the parents of three children: Henry, in the United States army; Esther, wife of Thomas Robison, a blacksmith, living in Dufur; and Edwin, of The Dalles. Mr. Hinman is a member of the A. F. & A. M., and the church of the United Brethren in Christ. For many years he has been a devoted and conscientious class leader. His wife is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. Politically he is a Prohibitionist, though not particularly active, and for two years was city marshal of Dufur.

In 1864 a recruiting officer visited the home of our subject in Illinois, and the latter assisted him in organizing the Farnsworth Light Brigade. Mr. Hinman was to have been a First Lieutenant, but before the company was completed news was received of the death of Captain Farnsworth, at Gettysburg, and the scheme fell through. Our subject was busily engaged in an endeavor to raise a new regiment at the close of the war. He could not conscientiously enlist at the commencement of the Rebellion, as he had a young family, but during the last year he expended his time and money, and through no fault of his own, he was not at the front.

AUGUST W. LONGREN, who is one of the well-to-do farmers and stockmen of Wasco county, has gained his property holdings by virtue of his industry and his careful management. He has the satisfaction of knowing that he has paid value received for everything that he owns and although he started with his bare hands he has now a fine property. Where he dwells, one half mile west from Endersly, he has a body of two hundred and forty acres, and eighty more across the road. In addition he owns two lots and a residence in The Dalles, and considerable blooded stock. His place is a valuable one and is well improved.

August W. Longren was born in Sweden, on January 8, 1853, the son of Gustav and Margreta (Peterson) Longren, natives of Sweden, where they also died, on June 1, 1894, and in 1886, respectively. The ancestors were farmers in the old country for many generations. After gaining his education, Mr. Longren left his native country for the United States in 1873. He came direct to Rockford, Illinois, and two years later went to Jamestown, New York. Returning to Rockford, he came thence in 1876, to the Willamette valley, and the next fall to The Dalles. He was employed by the O. R. & N. and ran a scow on the Columbia until 1882, when he took a portion of his present place as a homestead. Since that time he has continued here laboring in that which occupies him now. He has good success, raises hay and potatoes and other crops and breeds stock.

At The Dalles, on October 2, 1886, Mr. Longren married Miss Madama Fleming, who was born in Indiana, Grant county. She came to Oregon for her health in 1884 and dwelt with her cousins, Ephraim and Thomas Badger, Mr. Longren has one brother, Charles F., and two sisters, Sophie Johnson and Mrs. Christine Nillson, a widow. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Longren: Matilda, aged sixteen; Minna, aged fourteen, and Charles A., aged twelve. Mrs. Longren is a member of the Christian church. Mr. Longren is a Republican, but not especially active, although he is always ready to give his influence for the support of his party. He has always refused to hold any office, although he has frequently been importuned to do so. Mr. Longren has one of the best places on Eightmile creek and he well knows how to skillfully handle it. He is a great reader and spends much time in informing himself on the subjects of the day. He and his wife are popular and esteemed people.

ALBERT G. DOYLE, deceased. In giving a memoir of the esteemed gentleman, whose name is at the head of this page, we feel that it is quite in place with the object of this work, which is to make mention of the leading men and women of Wasco county, since he was a man of excellent Christian character, possessed of abilities and worth that stamped him a leader among men and one who won friends wherever he was.

Albert G. Doyle was born in Illinois, on March 7, 1832, the son of Daniel Doyle. He was a native of Virginia, of Swiss ancestry. The name was probably anglicised after the family came to America, in the early colonial days. He married Miss Godfrey, the mother of our subject. She died when Albert was an infant and then the father married Mary Lowe. They were both from prominent Virginia families. Our subject was reared in Illinois and St. Louis, Missouri, and after the high schools were completed, he entered Lebanon college and received a fine classical training. Then he matriculated in the medical college of Cincinnati, Ohio, but owing to a failure of his health he was obliged to abandon the study of medicine, which was his life's ambition. However, he gave it up cheerfully and went to teaching, which he had followed before. Then he did farming until his marriage in Illinois. In 1865 in company with his father and the entire family, our subject fitted out horse and mule teams and made the trip across the plains to the Willamette valley. After three years there he found the climate did not agree with him and accordingly came to this side of the mountains. He spent a winter on Fifteenmile and then came and purchased the right of Louis Klinger and preempted the place where his widow now resides about three miles west from Endersly. Here he lived until the time of his death, on January 23, 1880. He was then aged forty-eight. He was a man of prominence among his fellows and bore the best of reputation, being a faithful Christian. He and his wife were zealous members of the Methodist church. Mrs. Doyle has remained on the home place since and is a woman of many graces and virtues. She is most highly esteemed by all and is spending the golden years of her life secure in the faith that has cheered and sustained her all the journey up to this time.

On April 5, 1857, at Highland, Illinois, the marriage of Mr. Doyle and Sarah Hines occurred. She was born in Illinois, on November 17, 1837, the daughter of William and Sarah (Robbins) Hines. The mother died when she was five months old and the father when she had arrived to the age of twelve. Her childhood life was spent with foster parents, William and Susanna (Hornsby) Husong. Mr. Doyle had no full brothers or sisters, but had two half brothers, John and Charles, and two half sisters, Mary F. Fouts, and Rosie Hemmingway. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Doyle: Mary F., the wife of Benjamin Southwell, and now deceased; Joseph, who died when aged seventeen; Bessie, the wife of Charles Wagonblast, who died in July, 1894; Edwin, the eldest son, who died on May 31, 1900, aged thirty-eight years and four months; and William, single and living with his mother. The children were men and women of fine character and were well esteemed.

MICHAEL M. GLAVEY, of the firm of Glavey Brothers, stock-raisers and farmers, residing five miles south of Dufur, Wasco county, is a native of St. Louis, Missouri, born March 31, 1863. His parents, Thomas and Honor (Welch) Glavey, natives of County Mayo, Ireland, are mentioned elsewhere.

Newton county, Missouri, was the field of our subject's earlier days, and there he was reared and partially educated in the graded schools, attending school also in Newton county, and also in Portland, Oregon, whither his family removed about 1875. When he was thirteen years of age he came with his parents to Wasco county, settling in his present location and here he has since resided.

On the home farm, in 1895, November 23, Mr. Glavey was united in marriage to Annie A. Bolton, born in Petaluma, Sonoma county California. Her parents were Patrick and Bridget (O'Neil) Bolton, natives of Ireland. They at present reside on a farm near Dufur. Mrs. Glavey has six brothers and two sisters: Henry, John and Edward, Wasco county farmers and stock raisers; William, a druggist, in Portland; Mary, wife of George Thompson, a farmer residing in Sherman county; and Nellie, single, living at home. Mr. and Mrs. Glavey have four children living, Irene and William, aged five and three years, respectively, and Thomas and Marie, twins, one year old.

Politically Mr. Glavey is a Democrat, and for years has been a delegate, annually, to county conventions. In 1870 he served as a delegate to the Democratic state convention. Two terms he was clerk of the school board, and has been as active in politics as his business would permit.

John Glavey is the third member of the firm of Glavey Brothers. He was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on September 9, 1854, and dwells on the ranch with his brothers. He is still enjoying the freedom of the celibatarian and is highly esteemed.

THOMAS W. GLAVEY, of the firm of Glavey Brothers, extensive farmers and stock-raisers, residing five miles from Dufur, Wasco county, was born in St. Louis, Missouri, April 17, 1860. He is the son of Thomas and Honor (Welch) Glavey, natives of County Mayo, Ireland. About 1848 the father came to the United States and located in New Orleans, and for many years worked on Mississippi river steamers. He died January 6, 1888, on the Wasco county ranch. The mother passed away March 18, 1897.

Until he was nine years of age our subject was reared in the city of St. Louis, and the family then removed to Franklin county, Missouri, three years later to Newton county, coming to Oregon in 1875. Mr. Glavey was educated in the graded schools of St. Louis, and other district schools in Missouri. The family remained one year in Portland, Oregon, and then came to the locality where the brothers now reside. The father settled on a quarter section of land five miles south of the present site of Dufur. This land was claimed by both the railroad and the government, and, consequently he never secured a title to the same, but following his death our subject, Thomas W. Glavey, succeeded in getting a clear title from the government. Later he filed on a homestead. He remained with his parents until their death, since when he and his brothers, Michael M. and John, who are mentioned elsewhere, have added to the original farm and now reside there. Together they own about fifteen hundred acres, raise considerable stock, but devote their attention mainly to the cultivation of wheat.

RICHARD SIGMAN is one of the best known men of Dufur, and a veteran of the terrible conflict which raged to preserve to us the rights and privileges of freedom when base treason would have trodden under foot the stars and stripes and rent asunder the land of our forefathers. He has achieved a good success in the financial world and has thus far passed a career which is unblemished and filled with industry and good deeds.

Richard Sigman was born in Ohio, on July 26, 1844, the son of James and Ruth A. (Lucas) Sigman, natives of Ohio. The mother died in the spring of 1865. The father came to California in 1849 and about eighteen months later returned to Ohio where he died in 1903. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was in the War of 1812, and the father of that veteran, which is the great-grandfather of Richard Sigman, fought in the Revolution. His wife was the mother of twenty-two boys. Our subject was reared and educated in Ohio and in 1862 enlisted in Company H, One Hundred and Twenty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, captained by Mr. Gordon under Colonel Ball. He was soon sent to the front and participated in the Oak Grove and the Winchester engagements. Then he was taken prisoner at the battle of the Wilderness and for weary months was detained in the Andersonville, Libby, and Florence prisons. He weighed one hundred and eighty when he entered those death pits, but scarcely tipped the beam at one hundred when he was finally released. A living death, although the people of the land know well what those horrible places were and something of what the poor boys in blue suffered, still never can it be written the horrors that becloud the perpetrators of that cruelty nor can the anguish of the poor victims ever be adequately told. Living in the midst of the awfullest death, and dying by inches, Mr. Sigman eked out the days until the glad news of his deliverance came and a drawn skeleton, he staggered out to welcome it. After that he returned home and for eighteen years was farming in Illinois. 1884 was the year in which Mr. Sigman came to The Dalles and made settlement in Dry Hollow. This was near Dufur and he took railroad land which afterward reverted to the government. Then he took government claims and also purchased land until he had an estate of nearly one section. Since the years of prosperity have come to Mr. Sigman, he has sold a greater portion of this land to his son and in 1901, he came to Dufur to spend the remaining days of his life in quiet retirement from the bustle of active business.

At Pana, Illinois, in 1870, Mr. Sigman married Miss Ward, a native of Ohio. She died on the home farm here in Wasco county, on March 6, 1890. Her parents were John and Martha (Griffith) Ward, natives of Ohio. The father's parents were born in Ireland. Mr. Sigman has eight sisters, all in the east. His wife had three brothers and two sisters in Illinois. To Mr. and Mrs. Sigman seven children have been born: Melvin and Alvin, farmers near Dufur; Alberta, the wife of Neil O'Leary, a farmer in Sherman county; Jessie, the wife of Darius Smith, on Eightmile creek; Maud, the wife of Milton O'Brien, in the employ of Johnson Brothers; Margareta, teacher in Sherman county; Nettie, a girl of seventeen and now with her father. Mr. Sigman is a member of the G. A. R. and is often at the county conventions. He is a prominent and highly esteemed man and is looked up to by all.

GEORGE W. VANDERPOOL, who resides about a mile up the creek from Dufur, was born in Prineville, Oregon, on May 12, 1873. He is the son of William T. and Susan (Heisler) Vanderpool, who is mentioned in another portion of this work. The first ten years of his life were spent in his native place, then he came with the family to Fifteenmile creek and his education was completed at Dufur. He remained with his father on the farm until 1901, when the latter removed to Dufur and he rented the estate. Since that time, he has been handling the same with good success, displaying energy and skill in his labors.

At Dufur, on January 1, 1900, Mr. Vanderpool married Miss Lillie Temple, who was born in Nevada, on February 24, 1874. Her parents were William B. A. and Lavina (Watson) Temple, natives of Indiana and now living retired at Dufur. Mrs. Vanderpool has three brothers, Edward, Harry and Pearl, and two sisters, Mrs. Lottie Mulkins and Erma.

Fraternally, our subject is affiliated with the I. O. O. F. and he and his wife belong to the Rebekahs. He adheres to the Republican party but is not especially active. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Vanderpool, Fern. Mr. Vanderpool has taken up the work of handling his father's estate when the latter retired and owing to his natural ability and the careful training he received at the hands of his father, he has been enabled to make an excellent success. The Vanderpool estates are some of the best in the county and the father has been known for years as one of the leading stockmen in this part of the state. Presaging the future by the past, one is safe in asserting that our subject is destined to be one of the leading citizens of the county and one of its worthy and substantial men.

LYMAN SMITH, a genial and benevolent gentleman, who has spent many years in the Web-foot State, and is now dwelling in the vicinity of Hood River, is conducting a choice fruit farm and is one of the well known and esteemed men of this part of the county. He was born in Bradford county, Pennsylvania, on September 29, 1834, the son of William and Jane (Blanvelt) Smith, natives of Pennsylvania. The father came from an old colonial family and the mother's people came from Holland in the generation preceding her. Our subject was educated in Chemung county, New York, and when eight was called to mourn the death of his father. Then he lived with a neighbor for five years, after which he was with his brother-in-law until sixteen. He labored hard and saved what money he could and studied as the opportunities presented themselves. He remained in that county until twenty-four when he married and rented land. Three years later he bought a farm. After two years on that he removed to Michigan and bought land. He became homesick after a year, however, and returned to New York and bought another farm there. Ten years were spent in tilling that and again the adventurous spirit of our subject led him west, this time clear across the mountains to Oregon. This was in 1875, and he located railroad land which later reverted to the government. He purchased the same from the government and since then he has remained here. He owns eighty-five acres and cultivates about thirty. The same is well set in the fruit producing trees of this section and other things and is a source of a good income. Mr. Smith married in 1858, November 2d, while in Chemung county, the lady of his choice being Helen Jackson, a native of Chemung county. Her death occurred in 1892 at Hood River. Her parents were William and Elizabeth Jackson, natives of Pennsylvania. Mr. Smith has three sisters, Mary A. Baldwin, Adeline, widow of John Lyons, and Henrietta Doney. Mrs. Smith had two brothers, Lyman and Jahiel. To Mr. Smith three children have been born: Eleanor L., the wife of S. J. LaFrance, in Portland; William J., traveling salesman for Tatum & Bowen, of Portland; and Charles D., engineer on a tug at Cascade Locks. Mr. Smith is a member of the A. O. U. W. He is a strong Republican and voted for John C. Fremont the first Republican candidate for president. Since that time, Mr. Smith has never cut his ticket and he is well posted in all the issues that have been before the people for the last fifty years. He has held various minor offices, but never allowed his name presented for public positions, as he prefers the retirement of private industrial life.

WILLIAM T. VANDERPOOL is one of the wealthy farmers and stockmen of Wasco county and has met with such abundant success in his labors that retirement from active business life is justified. He resides in Dufur, where he has a cosy, one and one-half story dwelling, provided with all modern conveniences. He owns two ranches, aggregating something over one section of land which he is handling at the present time. He also has considerable other property.

William T. Vanderpool was born in Polk county, Oregon, on December 8, 1852, the son of Larkin and Mary (Turnage) Vanderpool. He was reared in Benton county until thirteen, then the family went to Marion county and in 1869, they moved into the Prineville country, where he remained until 1883. His education was received in the various places where he lived and in the last year mentioned, he came to the vicinity of Dufur. He bought a ranch from Jacob Gulliford, which was the family home for ten years, then he bought the Henderson donation claim which was taken up in 1852, the first one taken in this vicinity. Mr. Vanderpool has given especial attention to stock raising, doing also diversified farming. He has some well bred cattle and some choice Poll Angus bulls. He usually winters about four hundred head of stock and is one of the most successful handlers of stock in this part of the country.

On June 24, 1872, at Prineville, Mr. Vanderpool married Miss Susan Heisler, who was born in Lane county, Oregon. Her parents and brothers and sisters are mentioned in another portion of this work. To this union, six children have been born: George and William C., operating their father's farm; Floyd and Charles, school boys at home; Eva, the wife of Melvin Sigman, a farmer, two miles north from Dufur; Olivia, wife of Archie Moad, a blacksmith at Tygh.

Mr. Vanderpool is a member of the A. O. U. W. and of the I. O. O. F. He is a good strong Republican, has filled the office of road supervisor and school director and is frequently a delegate to the conventions. He is one of the substantial and leading citizens of the county.

MONROE HEISLER, a native of Oregon, born in Marion county, September 27, 1852, now resides at Dufur, Wasco county, engaged in building and contracting. He is the son of William (Grandpa) and Martha (McConnell) Heisler.

Our subject lived with his parents and attended district school in Lane and Linn counties, Oregon, and removed to what is now Crook county. He also worked at teaming and blacksmithing, and for ten years was in the business of raising sheep in company with his father-in-law, E. N. White, in Crook county. He came to Wasco county about 1885, locating at Dufur, where he was engaged in the general merchandise business with his father. For two years they conducted the first store in the place. They disposed of the property and our subject returned to Crook county and went into the mercantile business in Prineville, removing thence to Dufur where he was employed two years in carpenter work. Going to Lagrande he remained one year, where he purchased an interest with Crandall, the jeweler, returning to Dufur. He then went onto a ranch for which he and his father had traded the store, and was for eight years engaged in farming. They had in all six hundred and forty acres, including railroad land which they had purchased. In 1897 the oldest son of our subject, Charles M., purchased "Grandpa" Heisler's interest in the ranch, on which he now lives. Since that time our subject has resided in Dufur engaged in building and contracting. In company with E. T. Hinman he built the Dufur school house. Mr. Heisler has served as school director several years and has been road supervisor for a term of two years. He is politically independent, although not an active partisan, and he has been a member of the city council of Dufur. He is a member of Ridgely Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F., of which he is past grand; Nicholson Encampment; A. O. U. W.; W. O. W., and he and wife are members of Star Lodge, No. 23, Rebekahs, and the Christian church.

At Prineville, June 4, 1876, Mr. Heisler was united in marriage to Cynthia L. White, born in Linn county, Oregon. Her parents Edward N. and Catherine (Burkhart) White, were natives of Iowa. The father, a prominent western pioneer, crossed the plains so early as 1840, and is now living near Prineville. The mother is dead. Mrs. Heisler has three half brothers living; Grant, engaged in mining in Canada; Aaron and Edward, at Prineville; one full sister, Abbie, wife of T. C. Baker, a stockman near Corvallis; and three half sisters; Jennie, married to J. L. McCully, of Prineville; Docia, of Boise City, Idaho; and Ella, wife of James Cram, of Prineville. Mr. and Mrs. Heisler have five children, Charles, Claud, Clarence, Harold, and Minnie, wife of Park Bolton, a farmer residing near Wrentham, Oregon.

WILLIAM HEISLER, better known as "Grandpa Heisler" is one of the pioneers of the Pacific coast and a detailed account of his career is very interesting in a work of this character, therefore, for the benefit of all, we append the same.

William Heisler was born in Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, on April 13, 1828, the son of John and Catherine (Yost) Heisler, also natives of the Keystone State. They were both descended from prominent and old Dutch families. The father's father was a patriot in the Revolution. Our subject was reared and educated in his native county and when 1846 came he went to Pittsburg and wrought at his trade of tobacconist and cigar maker. Then he traveled to Adelphia, Ohio, thence to Louisville, Kentucky, later to Bethlehem, Indiana, and thence to St. Louis, where he enlisted in Colonel Powell's Battalion, being enrolled in Company A, under Captain Sublett. His service was for eighteen months or until peace was declared with Mexico. When they got as far as Fort Leavenworth, word came of the Whitman massacre, and his command was ordered to that section. The following winter was spent near the present site of Omaha and in the spring they made their way to Grand Island in the Platte. As peace was declared, they were discharged, but at that time the government built Fort Kearney and they remained until the regulars relieved them in the fall of 1848, and they were formally discharged at Fort Leavenworth. In the spring of the following year, Mr. Heisler with four friends came with ox teams to California and soon was working in the mines, first at Weavertown, sixty miles northeast from Sacramento and then in other places with moderate success and then returned to Missouri via Panama. From June 22, 1851, to March 12, 1852, he remained in Missouri, then came overland with his wife, having married. His brother-in-law and others accompanied them and they arrived at Foster's ranch in Clackamas county on August 16, 1852. Soon he took a donation claim nine miles south from Salem and later sold it to Gaines, who was the second governor of Oregon. Then he took another claim in Lane county and there made his home until 1868. Next he bought a forty acre tract near Brownsville, and in 1870 sold it and came to Prineville. There were but thirteen settlers in that part of the country upon his arrival and he contracted to have lumber brought over from Linn county at three cents per pound for freighting, with which he built the first store in Prineville. He remained in business there until 1880, when he sold one half interest to Arthur Breyman, and later the balance to John Summerville, and removed to The Dalles. In September, 1882, Mr. Heisler opened a store in Dufur, there being but five houses and a blacksmith shop there then. For four years Mr. Heisler continued there and then he sold to A. J. Brigham, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work. Next we see our subject in the cattle business with his sons, they handling the stock in Crook county, which continued until 1897. Then he sold his cattle and land in Crook county and purchased a flour mill in the edge of Dufur which he operated until the spring of 1903. At the present time Mr. Heisler is dwelling in Dufur and has a comfortable cottage in the centre of town, which is situated in a block well set to trees and ornamental shrubs. He is widely known and is as highly esteemed as he is known and is one of the true historic characters of this part of the state. Mr. Heisler has one sister, Mrs. Catherine Lyser, a widow at Williamsport, Pennsylvania. Mrs. Heisler has one sister, Susan Cheshire, a widow in Sodaville, this state.

The marriage of Mr. Heisler and Martha, the daughter of John and Polly (Hill) McConnell, natives of Kentucky and South Carolina, respectively, occurred in Cedar county, Missouri, at the home of the bride, on December 4, 1851. Mrs. Heisler was born in Missouri, on August 8, 1834. The children born to this worthy couple, are; Munroe, a carpenter in Dufur; Alexander, a farmer near Dufur; Jefferson D., with his father; William H., a miller in Portland; Louisa, wife of George Cary, a groceryman in North Yakima; Susannah, wife of W. T. Vanderpool, a farmer of Dufur; Mary, wife of W. L. Vanderpool a farmer of Dufur; Catherine, wife of Andrew Howie, a farmer four miles out from Dufur; and Annie, the wife of John McAtee, a clerk in Dufur. Mr. and Mrs. Heisler are members of the United Brethern church and have always been devout and worthy people. For twenty-two years they have favored the prohibitionist movements and are staunch supporters of all that tends to build up the community. The descendants of these venerable people are nine children, twenty-one grandchildren, and eleven great-grandchildren, only two of the entire number being deceased.

JOSEPH H. SHERAR. There is not a community in eastern Oregon where Sherar's Bridge is not known. For nearly thirty-five years it has been a prominent point in the map of the state and the almost ceaseless travel that wends its way across the bridge comes and goes to all points of the northwest. The roaring Des Chutes, a greater obstacle to the early travel than the Cascades, themselves, refused to allow passage of its precipitous banks or any traveler to pass in safety over its waters, unless the tribute of great labor was performed to make a place of descent and a bridge to span it. No ferry could live in its wild flood. Like the water of Lodore it comes down in a maddening rush, roaring, booming, foaming, and fighting, like a wild tyrant, furious at any restraint, never quiet until its bewitched waters are held in the firm grasp of old Columbia, in whose mighty arms they find their way to ocean's expanse. Beautiful and wild in a high degree, the waters of a heaven blue that beggars description, everything connected with the stream bespeaks a decisiveness in nature that finds expression with no tamed spirit or mellowed lines. The very rocks rise in sheer precipices that defy intrusion or hang in beetling cliffs where only the eagle's aery may be found. Through countless ages the busy waters have eroded these stalwarts until naked and bare they stretch hundreds of feet from the blue, galloping waters at their feet towards the clouds above. Only at remote intervals, even in this day of advanced civilization's skilled engineering, do the wise attempt to make a crossing of the untamed Des Chutes. Nature saw the wildness of the scheme and in a determination to assist the man who was to come, juttied out two huge abutments of flinty rock and bade the river pour its torrents between. There on their flat tops forty feet across the chasm and hundreds of feet below the surrounding country, she invited man to span the mad waters, and to aid his efforts in expediting commerce, she cast a canon, tortuous and rough, upon either side. Four of the tough gnarled pines which cling here and there to the rocks, were brought up, hewed and two huge capital A's were planted across the chasm, their prongs resting on either rocky wall and their obtuse angles meeting in mid air. These served for side supports and the bridge was swung. A more complete account of the opening of this important thoroughfare is given elsewhere in this work. Many thousands of money were expended before a safe road could be hewed up the canons, but since it was first opened it has been one of the great arteries of travel in eastern Oregon, and the toll bridge is famous in the history of this part of the state. Mr. Sherar has had charge of the property for many years and his name is indelibly connected with the enterprise.

Since he is thus one of the promoters of settlement and traffic in this part of the state, and since he is a pioneer and one of the leading men of this county, we are pleased to speak more particularly of Mr. Sherar's life. He was born in Vermont, on November 16, 1833, and his father John Sherar, was a native of Ireland. He married an Irish maiden and a few years before the birth of our subject came to the United States with his wife and three children. He settled to farming in the Green Mountain State and there our subject passed the first two years of his life. Then the family came on west to St. Lawrence county, New York, and there he gained his education and was reared. He remained with his parents until 1855, when he was led by an adventurous spirit and the glow of a strong constitution to push out into the west in search of that which lures the true pioneer to the wilder portions of Nature's domain. Fortune glimmered in the west and beckoned him, while a taste for the wild and adventurous also impelled him and soon he had decided to come by the isthmus to the sunny land of California. Mining and packing attracted him and these occupations kept him busy until 1862, with also a short time spent in farming on the Klamath river in the north part of the state. Then he sold all his property and came on to Oregon. He soon had an outfit and was packing out from The Dalles to the various mining camps of eastern Oregon and Idaho. There were no roads then, only trails in most places, and the business was attended with great danger. For two years, however, he followed the business with good success and then he sold to Robert Heppner for six thousand dollars. The second trip of that man was attended by the loss of the entire outfit from Indians. Mr. Sherar had experienced no difficulty with the savages. After that, Mr. Sherar devoted himself to stock raising on a farm he secured near the present site of Dufur. Two years later he removed to Tygh Valley and took a preemption and continued stock raising until 1871. On October 3, of that year, Mr. Sherar came to his present location and since then he has done a world of good to this country by opening and keeping in excellent repair this crossing of the Des Chutes. At immense cost he made a proper grade from the plateau above to the bridge and thence to the heights on the opposite side of the river. He has maintained the same continuously since then and is known as one of the best and most careful road makers of this part of the state. He constructed a hotel when he settled here and has operated the same since. In 1893, on the west bank of the river, he erected a fine hotel of thirty-three rooms and furnished it with all the modern conveniences. It is supplied with the purest spring water and nestles under the protection of the rolling heights on that side of the river and is an ideal retreat for one who wishes to enjoy the quiet and wildness of a summer outing with the comforts of a home. The scenery is beyond description and a little nook of land made fruitful with the spring water, produces all the fruits found anywhere in the country. Mr. Sherar has been guided with excellent wisdom in the planning and construction of his hotel, as the rooms are all commodious and pleasantly arranged both for comfort and view. Mrs. Sherar, a lady of refinement and intelligence, spares no pains in making the place so comfortable and inviting that it is a most popular resort for summer tourists and the traveling public. Under her skillful supervision, the Sherar Bridge Hotel has won a wide and enviable fame. In addition to the other beauties mentioned, the Des Chutes makes a leap of many feet here, presenting a scenic effect that is inspiring.

On April 26, 1863, Mr. Sherar married Miss Jane A. Herbert, the wedding occurring on the ranch on Fifteenmile creek. She was born in Joe Daviess county, Illinois, on October 11, 1848. Her father, George F. Herbert, was born in Fredericksburg, Virginia, and his ancestors were an old and prominent Virginia family. His grandfather was a patriot in the Revolution. George Herbert married Miss Elizabeth McCormick, a native of the same place as her husband and descended from Scotch ancestry. In 1850, he crossed the plains with ox teams, landing in The Dalles the day Mrs. Sherar was two years old. The trip occupied six months and was no more eventful than the ordinary one. Mr. Herbert took a donation claim near Eugene and in 1856 bought land on a portion of which Dufur now stands. Later he sold to Mr. Imbler and removed to Tygh Valley. After that he purchased another place near Dufur and there his death occurred on February 6, 1866. His widow died at The Dalles, on July 12, 1899. Mrs. Sherar has one brother, George, a hotel man in Cornucopia, Oregon. Mr. Sherar has no brothers or sisters. In political matters, Mr. Sherar is influential, but will never accept office, although importuned frequently so to do. He is a Republican and can give a good reason for his stand. In addition to the enterprises mentioned, Mr. Sherar handles much land which he owns in this and Sherman counties and also raises many sheep and cattle.

ALVIN SIGMAN. On August 5, 1872, it was announced to Richard Sigman that a son was born to him. He was living with his wife at that time in Christian county, Illinois, and there they remained until 1883. The son born on that day was christened Alvin and he grew up as the youth of the Prairie State, gaining educational training from the district school and spending the times between on his father's farm. He made good progress and in 1883, when the father decided to try the west, he came with them, landing in Dufur, where he continued his educational training, as also in the Starve-out hollow school, where the father located and secured land. The journey west was a time of anticipation to all the members of the family and so well were they pleased with the country and its opportunities that they decided to remain and the good things of the west have been showered upon them in profusion, owing to the wise industry that the father practiced and taught his children. In good time, our subject began the duties of life for himself and finally the father sold him the farm where he now dwells, about two miles up Fifteenmile creek from Dufur. He has the estate nearly all paid for and is prospering in his labors. He was well trained by a skilled father and is exemplifying the wise and good principles instilled in earlier life. He has a good place, has shown himself a careful and good farmer and stockman and is among the popular young men of this part of the county.

On January 7, 1902, Mr. Sigman married Miss Margaret E. Thomas, who was born in Clackamas county, Oregon, the daughter of Alvin A. and Mary J. Thomas. Mr. and Mrs. Sigman started out in life with bright prospects and with every indication that they will achieve the success that is so gratifying to all who win their way in this world. They are kind, genial people, have many friends, and are worthy of the confidence and esteem which is generously bestowed.

It is interesting to note that the place sometimes called Dry Hollow, was originally known as Starve-out Hollow, so named because the first settler there was literally starved out.

CHARLES M. HEISLER, one of the enterprising, public-spirited young men of Wasco county, is a farmer living one mile southwest of Dufur. He is a native Oregonian, having been born in Prineville, June 3, 1879. His parents, sketches of whom will be found elsewhere in this work, were Monroe and Cynthia L. (White) Heisler.

Our subject attended district school two years in Prineville, and also the Dufur and Lagrange graded schools, and this education was supplemented by a year at Albany College, Albany, Oregon. Returning home he remained with his parents engaged in farm work and stock-raising, which business he has since followed successfully. In 1897 he purchased an interest in the property from "Grandpa" Heisler, and later purchased two hundred acres adjoining his land. They cultivate four hundred acres of wheat and barley, which averages forty bushels to the acre. They winter about one hundred head of cattle, and the same number of hogs. Our subject has a substantial story and a half frame house, supplied with the first barb-wire telephone in Wasco county, connecting at Dufur with long distance telephone.

Mr. Heisler was married August 26, 1900, to Eva L. Powell, born near Dufur, July 13, 1883, the daughter of Isaac J. and Adelia E. (Colver) Powell, the father a native of Illinois and the mother of Marshfield, Coos county, Oregon. Her father came to Oregon when a small boy, and is now a farmer at Tygh Valley. Mrs. Heisler has three brothers and four sisters. Our subject and his estimable wife have lost one daughter, Blanch Agatha, who died August 26, 1903, at the home, aged two years, one month and two days.

Fraternally Mr. Heisler is a member of Ridge-ly Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F., and W. O. W. Both are members of Star Lodge No. 23, Rebekahs, and Mrs. Heisler is a devoted member of the United Brethren church.

MELVIN SIGMAN, one of the industrious young men of Wasco county, who devotes his energies to tilling the soil, is also one of the popular and genial dwellers near Dufur. He is owner of the old Sigman estate, which lies about two miles up Fifteenmile creek from the town of Dufur and this he purchased from his father, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work. He was born in Illinois, on May 17, 1871, and there he remained for the first fourteen years of his life. Then he came with his parents to Oregon, and here he completed the education begun in the Prairie State. He remained with his father and learned well the industries of stock raising and farming. In 1901, he purchased the estate mentioned and since that time has been handling it for himself. In addition to this, he rents a farm from William T. Vanderpool and the two are producing fine crops of grain. Mr. Sigman's plan is to summer fallow one farm and raise grain on the other, alternating each season. In this manner, he secures the best results and his yields are up to the best in the country. His places are kept in order and an air of thrift and industry pervades everything.

At the residence of the bride's father, on December 18, 1897, Mr. Sigman married Miss Eva M. Vanderpool, whose parents and brothers and sisters are given space elsewhere in this work. To this marriage one child has been born, George R. Mr. Sigman is a member of the United Artisans and in political matters is allied with the Republicans. He is a bright and popular young man, and he and his wife have the good will and esteem of all who know them. They both come from good families, well known in this county and all have labored wisely and well in the development and advancement of Wasco county.

JAMES H. GILLMORE, an eminently successful business man of Wamic, Wasco county, is engaged in the blacksmith and wagonmaking enterprise, and general woodworking. He was born near Marion, Linn county, Iowa, December 24, 1858, the son of James and Emily (Pardee) Gillmore, the former a native of New York, the latter of Vermont. The parents of James Gillmore were, also, natives of the Empire State, their ancestors coming from Ireland. They were farmers for many generations. The father of our subject was a cooper. He died in Clackamas county, Oregon, in 1895. The mother passed from earth in 1868.

It was in 1876 that our subject, accompanied by his father, came to Oregon, arriving July 3. When he was five years of age his family had removed from Iowa to Missouri, where he received a fairly good practical education in the public schools. James Gillmore, the father, purchased land in Clackamas county, and with him our subject remained until he was twenty-three years of age. He then came to the vicinity of Wamic, remaining one summer, and going thence to Ellensburg. A year later he came to the neighborhood of Wamic, where he has since continuously resided. He conducted a saw mill near Kingsley, where he was burned out. One winter he worked in a cooper shop, and at different periods for ten years herded sheep. Accumulating one thousand three hundred sheep of his own he disposed of them to a firm which failed, and could not pay for them. For the second time our subject found himself "broke," but he energetically went to work, and purchased a ranch on credit, near the town of Wamic, and engaged successfully in farming two years. This he sold and bought a blacksmith shop at Tygh, which he conducted thirteen months, disposing of the same and purchasing a ranch on the hill overlooking Wamic, and this property he still owns. In April, 1900, he purchased a shop in Wamic where he at present carries on a successful blacksmith business. Mr. Gillmore is an expert mechanic, and although he never served a day at his trade, he can shoe a horse, build a wagon or house or barn, and, in fact, can efficiently turn his hand to almost every thing in the mechanical line. With the exception of the fire which consumed his first sawmill venture and the loss of his sheep, our subject has prospered greatly, and is at present recognized as one of the most substantial and progressive citizens of Wasco county. He has four sisters; Effie, wife of John Churchill, of Clackamas county; Ida, married to S. E. Phillips, a farmer of Cresswell, Lane county, Oregon; Emily, wife of S. L. Dart, of Mollala, Clackamas county; and Elsie, wife of William White, of San Francisco, California.

August 3, 1897, at The Dalles, Mr. Gillmore was married to Mrs. Minerva A. Chamberlain, daughter of R. B. and Nancy B. (Corum) Sanford. She has one brother and one sister, Alfred C., and Mary, wife of Eugene Pratt, of Wamic. Mrs. Gillmore has one child by her first marriage, Burrell S., Chamberlain, residing at Wamic.

Mr. Gillmore is a member of Assembly No. 122, United Artisans, being Master Artisan. Politically he is a member of none of the parties, being independent. In 1876, accompanied by his father, our subject came to San Francisco, in March, and thence coasted up from Point Arena to Humboldt Bay. They returned to Point Arena and took passage on the steamer Great Republic for Portland.

JOHN B. MAGILL, who is one of the most prominent and enterprising farmers in Wasco county, resides three-quarters of a mile east of Wamic. He was born March 10, 1837, in St. Clairsville, Belmont county, Ohio, the son of Archibald G. and Sarah A. (Bailey) Magill, both natives of Virginia. The parents of the paternal grandfather of our subject were, also, natives of Virginia, springing from an old and distinguished family. In 1816 they emigrated to Ohio overland. He was a wagonmaker by trade, dying in Nebraska in 1899. The mother of our subject died when he was a lad ten years of age. The paternal grandfather of our subject participated in the war of 1812.

Until he was twenty years of age John B. Magill remained in Ohio where he attended district schools, one of them being under the tuition of Judge Matthew Deady, deceased, once a prominent citizen of Portland, Oregon. The aunt of our subject taught in one of the rooms of this school; Judge Matthew Deady in the other. In 1857 our subject went to Iowa and for eighteen months worked there burning brick used in the construction of the State insane asylum. Thence he removed to Iron Mountain, Missouri, where he was employed burning charcoal and farming, about three years. At the opening of the war of the Rebellion he was in the state militia four months, participating in several skirmishes and guarding bridges, etc. At the expiration of his term of service he went to Iowa that he might again enlist, but the enlistment of his brothers William and Thomas in the First Iowa Cavalry, compelled our subject, patriotic though he was, to remain at home for the purpose of caring for his father and the homestead. Thomas was killed at the assault on Little Rock, Arkansas, and William died from disease contracted during the war. In 1874 Mr. Magill went to San Francisco and thence to Portland, Oregon, where he remained two months treating his children who had contracted the measles en route. At the time of his arrival in Portland he had one thousand dollars, but after purchasing an outfit he had remaining the sum of twelve dollars when the family left over the old Barlow road for Spokane Falls, Washington. On his arrival in the vicinity of where Wamic now is he was warned that it would not be safe to continue his journey as the Indians were quite hostile. He then camped on his present homestead the first night and decided to remain. Since that period it has been his home. He at first filed on eighty acres, and later purchased eighty acres of railroad land, adding thereto from time to time until he at present has, all told, five hundred and sixty acres. Mr. Magill was among the first to engage in sheep breeding, and at this he has been eminently successful. Owing to his wife's ill health he has been compelled to suspend personal active operations on the ranch. For eight years she has been confined to her bed and is a great sufferer. Mr. Magill has four half brothers living, Franklin and James, in Nebraska, and Samuel and Wesley in Indiana, all farmers.

Our subject was married July 4, 1860, at Farmington, Missouri, to Emily J. Gardner, born in Indiana and reared near Burlington, Iowa. Her parents were William and Rachel (Banta) Gardner, the father a native of New York; the mother of Kentucky. Mrs. Magill has three brothers living; Julius and James, living at Nevada, Missouri; and William, an Indiana farmer. Her brother Adolphus, who was a member of the Twentyninth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, was at the siege of Vicksburg, and died shortly afterward. Mr. and Mrs. Magill have seven children; William F., in Wasco county; Fred G., at Wamic; George G.; Annie, wife of Elmer Remington, of Grass Valley, Sherman county, Oregon; Edith, married to John Eubanks, of Wamic; and Jessie, wife of Rufus McCorkle, of Wapinitia; and May, married to Charles Crofoot, of Wamic, who assists his father-in-law in conducting the extensive farm. Mr. Magill is a Republican, but not active.

ARTHUR W. FARGHER. In the Irish sea, midway between Ireland and England, and seventeen miles south from Scotland, lies the well-known Isle of Man, the ancient Eubonia, and sometimes called Manx Mannin, or Manx Vannin. It is a small country, thirty odd miles long and one-third as wide, but supports a population of over fifty thousand souls. At no point in this little kingdom can one get so far inland that the sighing of the sea is not heard. Here, where his ancestors had lived for generations, dating back far beyond a connected record, and evidenced by the moss-grown headstones that bear dates centuries ago, the subject of this sketch was permitted to first see the light. A genuine Manxman, he inherited the sturdiness and independence of his country and his family and from the date of his birth, December 10, 1855, until the present, he has shown a spirit and worth that characterize the true man in any country. His parents, Thomas C. and Susan (Christian) Fargher, were born in the Isle and the mother's family, as well as the Farghers, was one of the old and prominent ones of the land. On both sides they were Quakers for many generations back but now are allied with various denominations. The father was a prominent real estate owner there and had much land, which he left to his children. The parents both died in that country. The spirit of adventure overcame the love for home land and in 1870 our subject accompanied his father to the United States to search for new locations and attain greater success. They came direct to San Francisco and there remained with an elder brother, Thomas, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work. Another brother, Horatio, had also come with our subject. Arthur learned the blacksmith trade from his brother Thomas, and wrought there for eight years. During that time, Thomas had come to Oregon and thither Arthur came in 1878, and for a time was employed with the O. R. & N. After that he took land near Bakeoven, but for five years remained in The Dalles, having previously spent one year in Portland. Then he drifted into the sheep business as his brothers were both engaged in that industry. He did well from the start, owing to his care and industry, and now he owns nearly six thousand of these profitable animals. He has four thousand acres of deeded land and leases much besides. He is one of the heavy sheep owners of The Dalles and while his property is located in Bakeoven, he makes his home in The Dalles, his residence being at 804 east Third street.

On July 2, 1885, Mr. Fargher married Miss Maria Baker, the wedding occurring at The Dalles. She was born in Nanaimo, British Columbia, on February 11, 1865. Her father, George Baker, was employed by the Hudson's Bay Company and came from his birthplace, Birmingham, England, to America in 1852. He is now a capitalist in Nanaimo. For many years he was foreman for the company in their large mine of coal. He was associated with Mr. Dunsmuir, who after located the famous Wellington mines. Mrs. Fargher's mother was born in the same place as her husband and was married just before their trip which consumed five months around the "Horn" in a sailing vessel. She lives in Nanaimo. Mrs. Fargher's brothers and sisters are named as follows, Benjamin, Joseph, James, Daniel, Mrs. Esther Nichols, and Mrs. Mary A. Shaw. Mr. Fargher's brothers are already mentioned. To this worthy couple the following named children have been born; Clarence, aged eighteen; Frederic, aged five; Arthur, aged twelve; Mona, aged fifteen; and Ellen, seven years old. Mrs. Fargher is a member of the Methodist church and also of the relief corps. She is an active worker in church lines. Mr. Fargher is a Republican, well informed and active, but never an aspirant to office. He stands well in the county, is a man whose judgment and advice are sought and is of influence and prominence in the community.

ALVIN A. THOMAS, deceased. Among the worthy pioneers of the great state of Oregon, the name of Alvin A. Thomas appears well up in the roll of honor. He was a man of staunch Christian character and lived the faith that makes faithful and manifested in his career the principles of Christianity in every day life. He was born in Michigan on October 6, 1837, the son of Laren L. and Mary A. (Mathews) Thomas, natives of the eastern part of the United States. The mother died when this son was small. The father died in Marion county, Oregon. Our subject was educated in Michigan and Oregon whither he came with his father, who had married Eliza Spoons. Settlement was made in Marion county and they took a donation claim, where the father remained until his death. His widow still resides there. The date of this journey across the plains was the forties. Our subject was reared principally in the Willamette valley and there on April 12, 1860, he married Miss Mary J. Quinn, the wedding occurring in Clackamas county. Mrs. Thomas' parents were Joseph and Polly (Walker) Quinn. They were married in the east and crossed the plains in 1852. The father suffered terribly from the cholera, but survived. The mother was born in Orange county, Indiana, on November 10, 1822, and died in Clackamas county, on August 7, 1888. Mrs. Thomas was born in Indiana and well remembers the trip across the plains. After her marriage in Clackamas county she and her husband resided there until 1900, July 4, when they came east of the mountains and since then she has resided with her daughter, Mrs. Sigman. At Dufur, on March 22, 1904, Mr. Thomas was called to depart from the scenes of his earthly labors and enter into the realities of the world beyond this wilderness way. He died as he had lived, a true Christian, and all knew that a good man had that day been taken from among them. He was buried with becoming ceremonies and his remains rest in the Dufur cemetery. He had for many years been a member of the Christian church as his widow is now and they supported the faith with zeal. To Mr. and Mrs. Thomas six children have been born; Margaret E., the wife of Alvin Sigman, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work; Polly A., the wife of Cyrus Covey, on a farm nearby; Walter A., a teamster at Boyd; Lorenzo M., a farmer near Prineville; Charles K., at Dufur; and William H., who died March 1, 1884, aged eighteen. Mrs. Thomas' mother bore sixteen children; she was a woman of whom it may be said, because of her Christian life, that she was a real "mother in Israel."

THOMAS STACKPOLE LANG, deceased, one of the old-time settlers, was well and favorably known throughout Wasco county. A memoir of him is fittingly placed in a history of Central Oregon, since he had much to do with business and political events in that section.

Thomas S. Lang was born in North Berwick, Maine, on June 16, 1826, and was the eldest son of John Damon and Anne (Stackpole) Lang. His father was a native of Gardiner, Maine, whose ancestors were among the early settlers of Massachusetts; his mother was born and reared at North Berwick. John D. Lang was prominently identified with many large enterprises in his native state. He built the first steamboat on the Kennebec river, was one of the promoters of the Maine Central Railroad, was an extensive woolen manufacturer, and one of the most prominent Quakers of New England.

Thomas Lang was educated principally at the Friends' boarding school in Providence, R. I., which is now Brown University, and while a lad removed with his parents to Vassalboro, Kennebec county. After his days of school life were over he was associated with his father many years in charge of the Vassalboro woolen mills, in which they were both deeply interested. On December 4, 1856, he was married to Miss Mary M. Varney, of Brooks, Maine, the eldest daughter of Moses and Margaret McClure Varney, who were both natives of Sandwich, N. H. He was also interested in lumbering, owning large tracts of timber lands in the north of Maine and operating an extensive lumber business on the Kennebec river and at Bath, where his mills were situated. He was also intensely interested in and owned much fine blooded stock, horses and cattle, at times owning the finest herds of Jersey, Hereford and Alderney cattle in New England.

In 1867 Mr. Lang was appointed commissioner from the United States to the Paris Exposition, and, retiring from business for the time, traveled for about two years in Europe. After his return he resided in Augusta. For two terms he was in the State Senate and for one term in the House of Representatives. He was a very prominent man in his state and was marked by those sterling virtues of integrity and uprightness which characterized him through life. His political colleagues were Reed, Dingley, Blaine, Frye and others.

Owing to ill health he determined to try the west, and in 1875 came to Oregon, spending the winter in the Willamette valley at Rickreal. The following year he went to The Dalles, investing in sheep and ranches near Heppner. For twenty years before his death he had resided in The Dalles, at one time being part owner and editor of the Wasco Sun, and also edited the Times-Mountaineer. From 1890 to 1894 he was receiver of the U. S. land office at The Dalles. His death occurred on June 18, 1896. Mr. Lang had lived a good life, had shown himself a man of patriotism, ability and faithfulness, and was sincerely mourned in many places. His widow and two daughters, Anne M. and Elizabeth L. Lang, survive him, his eldest child, a son, having died shortly after the family's arrival at Rickreal. Mrs. Lang and her daughters reside at The Dalles. Mr. Lang's only brother, the one surviving member of the Lang family, John Alton Lang, is still living at Waterville, Maine.

JOHN L. ELWOOD, M. D., physician and surgeon, residing at Tygh Valley, Wasco county, was born at Leesburgh, Highland county, Ohio, September 8, 1868. His parents, Clark and Charlotte (Hisky) Elwood, were natives of the same state, as were the parents of Clark Elwood. The latter was a druggist, and he died January 13, 1904. The mother comes from Pennsylvania Dutch ancestry, her father having been a pioneer of the states of Ohio and Iowa, and is now living at the advanced age of ninety-two in Iowa. The mother of our subject resides at Ellensburg.

John L. Elwood was reared in the state of Ohio until he reached the age of seventeen years, receiving his elementary education in the graded and high schools. Subsequently he was matriculated in the Presbyterian seminary, Oakdale, Nebraska, taking a preparatory course comprising eighteen months. He then entered the Missouri Medical College, St. Louis, from which he was graduated in 1890 with honors. This course was supplemented by a term at the Ainsworth Medical College, St. Joseph, Missouri, from which he was graduated in 1891. He began practice with his uncle, Robert P. Elwood, at Oakdale, Nebraska, who was one of the oldest practitioners in the state, his practice covering a period of fifty years. With his uncle, Dr. Elwood, he remained eight months. Coming to Oregon afterward he appeared before the state board of medical examiners, and subsequently was appointed state health officer of Oregon, at Gardiner, and began practice at Gardiner, where he remained five years. He was, also, assistant United States marine surgeon. In 1898 Dr. Elwood disposed of his practice and came to Tygh valley, where he bought out Dr. N. G. Pown, and has since remained here. He owns a six hundred acre ranch, one-half mile from Tygh valley, which is stocked with one hundred and fifty head of hogs. Dr. Elwood recently sold one hundred head of cattle, having at present twenty head of graded stock. He has two standard bred horses, two thoroughbreds, and three Percheron mares, each of them weighing about sixteen hundred pounds. Altogether Dr. Elwood has twenty-one head of horses.

Three uncles of our subject are physicians, as are seven of his first cousins. During thirty-eight years the father of our subject was the leading druggist in Leesburgh, Ohio. The political affiliations of Dr. Elwood are with the Republican party, he was a delegate to the last county and state convention, and he takes as active a part in the campaign issues of his party as his practice will permit. He was a school director at Gardiner, and fills the same office at Tygh valley.

At Ellensburg, Washington, January 10, 1893, Dr. Elwood was united in marriage to Ora F. Hatfield, born near Ellensburg. Her father, John Hatfield, was one of the early pioneers of Kittitas valley. M.; Degree of Honor, of which Mrs. Elwood is, also, a member; and the M. W. of A., of Tygh valley.

Mrs. Elwood's people, the Hatfields, are pioneers of Washington, and are prominent and esteemed people. She has three sisters; Mrs. Ella Conner, in Seattle; Prudence, an accomplished vocalist now living in Wilbur, Washington; and Geneva, a school girl at home.

CHARLES W. WING, the popular proprietor of the Tygh valley hotel, in Tygh valley, Wasco county, was born April 20, 1856, in Portland, Oregon, the son of Martin and Margaret (Cleggett) Wing. The father is a native of Wisconsin, who came to Oregon in 1852 with ox teams, striking first, The Dalles, after which he went by boat to Portland. The mother of our subject was born in Missouri, crossing the plains with her parents. At present she resides at Wamic, Wasco county.

Twelve miles east of Portland our subject, Charles W. Wing, was reared on a farm, attending "district school" in a log building. When he was eighteen years of age his family removed to the Wamic country, Oregon, and in 1885 he preempted and homesteaded land, also purchasing other tracts until he now owns five hundred acres, three hundred acres of which he cultivates. He winters from thirty-five to forty head of cattle, mainly graded stock. October 15, 1902, he purchased the hotel from Samuel Broyles, which has a commodious feed barn in connection. Mr. Wing has made this hotel a most popular resort for the traveling public, and it is conducted in a highly satisfactory manner. Mr. Wing has seven brothers and six sisters; Milton I. R., Alonzo, Stephen, Frank, Henry, Joseph, and Edward, of Wamic; Ella, wife of Fred Chandler, of Yakima county, Washington; Emma, married to Charles Hayward, of Hood River, Wasco county; Mollie, wife of Orrin Britton, a farmer living near Wamic; Hattie, widow of John Johnson, of Wamic; Dollie, wife of Andrew Knissner, of North Yakima, Washington; and Martha.

Mr. Wing was married January 18, 1886, at The Dalles, to Miss Perly Hayward, born in Iowa, daughter of Horace and Susan (Russell) Hayward, natives of the Empire State. The paternal grandparents were natives of Massachusetts, of an old New England family. The mother was born in Livingston county, New York, as was her father, who was a descendant of prominent New York and New England families, the Russell family having been distinguished for many generations in political, legal and commercial circles, one of whom has been governor of Massachusetts, and prominently mentioned as a candidate for president of the United States. Her mother was a Blanchard, another distinguished family in the New England states. Mrs. Wing has two brothers and three sisters: Charles, of Hood River; Horace, of Wamic; Amelia, deceased, the wife of William Magill; and Essie M., deceased. To Mr. and Mrs. Wing four children have been born: Grace, wife of James Whitman, with our subject; Ivy, Louis, and Martin, boys.

Politically Mr. Wing is independent. Mrs. Wing is a devoted member of the United Brethren church. Martha, a sister of Mr. Wing, was married to Timothy Brownhill, a prominent attorney of The Dalles. She died in November, 1894, at Portland.

JOHN W. WATERMAN, a well known stockman of influence and wealth, resides at 1107 Léwis street, in The Dalles, Oregon. He was born on April 10, 1845, in Missouri, the son of Ezekiel H. and Mary A. (Stroud) Waterman, natives of New York and Ohio, respectively. They are mentioned elsewhere in this volume. The mother died in Marion county, Oregon, in 1866 and the father then married Nancy Smith. Our subject came to California with his parents in 1852, and six years later journeyed with them to the Willamette valley, where he grew up and was educated in the district schools and Jefferson institute. In 1862 he came to eastern Oregon with cattle, accompanied by his father, and was also interested with his father in the mercantile business at Jefferson, Marion county, whither they returned in 1864. When twenty-one he entered the drug business for himself and continued at that for two years. After that, he came east of the mountains, settling in Grant county, that portion which is now Wheeler county. His exact location was about twenty miles east from Mitchell. There he did a large stock business and for six years gave his entire attention to it, then again he removed to the Willamette valley and took up sawmilling. He was occupied by that for four years, then opened a general merchandise store at Caleb postoffice, in Grant county. In the spring of 1882 he had again taken up stock raising in Grant county. In 1895, Mr. Waterman turned over the various business interests which he possessed to his sons and they are handling the stock and operating the general merchandise store at the present time, with excellent success, having recently removed the business to Mitchell. Mr. Waterman retired from active business entirely in 1903 and removed to The Dalles where he purchased his present residence.

On February 13, 1867, at Jefferson, Oregon, Mr. Waterman married Miss Mary E., daughter of Absolam and Sarah (Cullison) Smith, natives also of Illinois where also they were married. The father was accidentally drowned in the Willamette valley and the mother still lives at Jefferson. Mrs. Waterman was born in Illinois, crossed the plains with her parents with ox teams, and died in 1882 at the ranch near Caleb.

On April 15, 1895, Mr. Waterman married Mrs. Angie M. Laswell, the daughter of Enoch and Eliza (Mundy) Bamford, and a native of Canada. Mr. Waterman has one half brother and one half sister. He also has seven children; Hanley A., a merchant at Mitchell; Everett O., who is handling his father's stock; William, in the livery business at Moro; Virgil, with his father; Mattie M., the wife of Everett Knox, a merchant at Antone, Wheeler county; Veva, wife of V. E. Boardman, a graduate of the Washington University, and taking a post-graduate course at Chicago University; Mary, single and with her grandmother in Jefferson. By her former husband, Mrs. Waterman has four children; James E., in Montana; Lulu, wife of C. P. Johnson, a merchant at John Day, Oregon; Anna, wife of Frank McCallum, a merchant at John Day; and Rena, wife of Hanley Waterman, our subject's son. Ernest V., eldest son of our subject, died at Caleb in 1897, aged thirty. He was associated in business with his brother, Hanley, and his father.

Politically, Mr. Waterman is a Republican and is active at the county and state conventions. He has been justice of the peace for many years and is a refined, gentlemanly citizen, progressive and highly esteemed.

OSCAR L. STRANAHAN, a successful and retired business man of Hood River, Wasco county, Oregon, was born in St. Lawrence county, New York, March 6, 1838. His father, James K. Stranahan, a native of Essex county, New York, was a carpenter. His parents were natives of the Empire State, but his grandparents came to this country from Scotland. An uncle of James K. Stranahan presented the city of Brooklyn, New York, with his homestead for park purposes, and it is now a portion of the beautiful Prospect Park, of that city. Stranahan Avenue is named in his honor, and his statute is in the park. James K. Stranahan died at Hood River, in 1897, at the age of eighty-eight years. The mother, Paermelia (Reynolds) Stranahan, a native of Vermont, was a descendant of the prominent old colonial family of Reynolds, who contributed much to the early history of the United States. She passed from earth at Hood River in 1895, at the age of seventy-five years.

In July, 1855, there arrived in Cannon Falls, Minnesota, a party of immigrants from Michigan, which might have been called the Stranahan colony, as a majority of its members bore that family name. James K. Stranahan, the head of one of the families, being a carpenter accepted opportunities to ply his trade in Cannon Falls and vicinity. He was in charge of the construction of the first flour mill in that city, which was completed in 1857, while Minnesota was yet a territory. He was known among the settlers as "J. K." and remained there about ten years, removing to Northfield, Minnesota, where he worked at his trade.

Until he was sixteen years of age Oscar L. Stranahan, our subject, remained in New York state, attended the public schools and learned the carpenter's trade. With his family he became one of the "Cannon Falls," Minnesota, "colony," going thence to Northfield, same state, where he conducted a foundry and machine shop fifteen years. In 1877 he came to Oregon, and was employed three or four years by the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, making his home in Hood River. He filed on a claim adjoining Captain C. H. Coe's, who was the first settler in that vicinity. At the initial election in that district only fifteen votes were cast. The city of Hood River is now built on land once belonging to Messrs. Coe and Stranahan. In 1881 our subject, who had been engaged in building steamers, cars, etc., for the O. S. N. Company, now the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, settled on his farm of one hundred and forty-six acres, which he continued to cultivate for twenty years. He then platted sixty lots which he called "Stranahan's First Addition" to Hood River. In 1896, entering into partnership with Captain Coe, they installed a sash and door factory, disposing of the same in 1901.

In December, 1859, our subject was united in marriage to Adelia Berdan, born in Lake county, Ohio. The ceremony was performed at Cannon Falls, Minnesota. Her father, Albert, was a native of Canada; her mother, Statira (Conley) Berdan, was born in Elmira, New York, as were her parents. Her grandparents were natives of Ireland. Our subject has three brothers and two sisters living; Henry M., of Northfield, Minnesota; C. Horace, manager of the Wasco Warehouse, at Hood River; William G., of Minneapolis, Minnesota; Ann E., wife of Charles Hayes, of Hood River, a surveyor; and Mary B., wife of George Crowell, dealer in general merchandise, Hood River. Mrs. Sarah J. Sheets died at Larimore, North Dakota. Our subject has three children; Albert K., mentioned elsewhere; Mary, wife of S. M. Baldwin; and Jessie, wife of Charles C. Mooney, who died August 3, 1904. Mr. Stranahan is past commander of Canby Post, G. A. R., No. 16. He enlisted January 2, 1862, in Company A, Fifth Minnesota Infantry, Colonel B. Roder, remaining with that regiment one year, when he was transferred to the United States Signal Corps, serving three years in the same. He was with Gen. Sherman in the historic "March to the Sea." He received wounds at the battles of Corinth and Shiloh.

Mrs. Stranahan taught school when young, in Goodhue county, Minnesota, and has been a member of the Methodist church since she was twelve years of age. She was superintendent of the Sunday school here for three years and has taken an active interest in Sunday school work all her life. She was postmistress of Hood River for seven years. Mr. Stranahan is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. Politically he is a Republican, and has been a delegate to county conventions. Throughout Wasco county, Mr. Stranahan is highly esteemed and is an influential, progressive citizen.

broad experience in the business field and has acquired a fair amount of this world's goods as a result of his honest endeavors and industry. He was born in St. Lawrence county, New York, on February 12, 1845, the son of James K. and Permelia (Reynolds) Stranahan, mentioned elsewhere in this work. Our subject was reared principally in Minnesota, whither the family went when he was small, four years of age. He remained on the farm with his parents during the summers and attended school in the winters. In September, 1862, Mr. Stranahan enlisted in Company C, Sixth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry under Captain H. F. Bailey and Colonel William Crooks. He served until May 31, 1865 and then received his honorable discharge in Montgomery, Alabama. The first eighteen months were spent in fighting the Indians and then his command went south where he participated in much heavy fighting. He was active at Fort Blakely and Spanish Fort and in many other engagements. After the war he returned to Minnesota and there did farming until 1875, when, with his wife and three children, he came overland to Oregon, settling in Clackamas county. Two years later, in company with his brother, Oscar, who is spoken of in this volume, he came with pack horses over the trail from Portland to Hood River and squatted on railroad land. He farmed the same until 1897, when he purchased a section of choice wheat land in Sherman county, about the largest wheat farm there, and tilled it for two years. He then sold and returned to Hood River, his sons having handled his farm here in the meantime. In 1902, Mr. Stranahan sold this property and purchased other property and accepted a position where we find him at the present time. He has made a good success in his business ventures, is a prosperous man, and like his brother, Oscar, is a leading and influential citizen here.

On November 11, 1869, Mr. Stranahan married Miss Margaret McKinley, a native of Baltimore, Maryland. The wedding occurred in Goodhue county, Minnesota. Mrs. Stranahan's parents, John and Mary (Dunns) McKinley, were natives of Scotland. The father came to the United States with his parents when a child and the family is a very old and prominent one. President McKinley was from the same family. Mrs. Stranahan's uncle, William McKinley, was known as the "Fighting parson" and was chaplain of the Eighth Wisconsin Infantry during the Civil War. Following that struggle he was for many years president of the Hamlin College in Minneapolis. Mr. Stranahan has three brothers and two sisters, who are mentioned elsewhere in this volume. Mrs. Stranahan has two brothers, Alexander and George, and two sisters, Mrs.

Mary McCorkle, and Mrs. Kate Sumner. In political matters, our subject is a staunch Republican and is frequently at the county conventions, and is a careful and enterprising man. Fraternally, he is affiliated with the A. F. & A. M., and the R. A. M., while in church matters he is allied with the Unitarians. Mrs. Stranahan belongs to the Methodist church.

The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Stranahan are named as follows: James A., mentioned elsewhere in this work; George F., a contractor and builder; Charles H., a farmer; John L., also a farmer; Maud M., a teacher; Ida E., also a teacher; and Eva B., a bookkeeper. All are in Hood River. Maggie A., died in 1898, aged eleven. Bessie P. and Oscar E., are school children. Misses Maud and Ida are very popular and thorough educators, the former having charge of the school in the Crapper district, the largest single room school in the county, having more than fifty pupils, while the latter is now teaching in Sherman county. They maintain a very high standing and enjoy a well merited popularity.

SAMUEL S. JOHNS, who resides at the corner of Bridge and Eighteenth streets, in The Dalles, is one of the best known and most progressive stockmen of the state of Oregon. He has not excelled in raising large numbers of stock, but he has certainly excelled in bringing in and raising some of the finest horses and cattle to be found. This, in reality, is one of the greatest works for the upbuilding of Oregon that one could do. It is eminently a stock state and one that makes such strides in getting good breeds into the country is bringing the entire standard to a higher point, and the value of it can scarcely be overestimated. Mr. Johns has, also, made a first-class success in financial matters and has a holding in valuable property, both personal and real, that does credit to his business ability. He owns a fine stock ranch ten miles out on Mill creek, which is well improved and where he has a choice herd of one hundred and fifty thoroughbred Shorthorns. A part of the herd are registered animals and are among the choicest to be found in the west. In addition to these, Mr. Johns owns some fine horses, among which we may mention Vespasian, a Suffolk Punch draught stallion, registered in 1898, number 2498. He has one of the best records of any stallion and is one of the choicest ever imported to the United States. He weighs two thousand and ten pounds and is making the seasons at The Dalles. Mr. Johns also owns a three year old colt of Vespasian, which seems to be in every point equal to his famous sire. These two animals cost three thousand dollars. Mr. Johns is making a record of excellence in stock breeding and is one of the most skilled men in this line in this part of the country.

Samuel S. Johns was born in Wales, on November 14, 1863, the son of Thomas and Bessie (Pritchard) Johns, also natives of Wales. The father comes from an old Welsh family which has resided in the vicinity of Cardiff for many generations. He followed stock breeding and dairying. His death occurred in The Dalles, in July, 1902. The mother's father, Captain Pritchard, was an Englishman and was drowned in the wreck of his vessel on the Loochoo or Liu Kiu islands, before the birth of this daughter. She died at Spokane, in 1897, aged fifty-eight. The family came to the United States in 1868 and settled in Kansas, two of the father's brothers, John and Henry, coming with them. For thirty years they did railroad work there, the father being master mechanic on the Kansas City & Southern railroad. In 1880, the family came to Wasco county and the father entered the employ of the O. R. & N. Six years later he engaged in the sawmill business. While in this business he erected a flume from Mill creek to The Dalles, a distance of sixteen miles, and later sold that flume to The Dalles. It is utilized today for the city water supply. After a good high school education in Ottawa, Kansas, our subject learned the machinist trade and wrought at it five years with the O. R. & N. Then he was with his father in the mill business until they sold the flume. He had purchased the land on Mill creek for stock purposes and gave his attention to that exclusively as soon as released from the mill proposition. He owns twelve hundred acres and all the improvements required on a first-class stock farm, besides a good residence and property in The Dalles.

On December 22, 1887, at The Dalles, Mr. Johns married Miss Alice Walker, who was born near St. Helens, Oregon, and died in June, 1882, at The Dalles. Her parents, Robert and Julia (Hull) Walker, were early pioneers of Oregon. The mother died in The Dalles, on March 5, 1902, and the father a few days before Mrs. Johns. On November 14, 1895, at The Dalles, Mr. Johns married Mary Zable, a native of Kansas. Her parents, Frederick and Louisa Zable, were natives of Germany, and are now both deceased. They dwelt many years in Wisconsin and Kansas. Mrs. Johns has the following named brothers and sisters, William, Frederick, Ferdinand, Mrs. Christina Rabensdorf, Mrs. Dora Martin, Mrs. Louisa Mayer, Mrs. Lena Geyer, and Mrs. Amelia Stenber. Mr. Johns has two brothers, Walter I. and David P., and three sisters, Mrs. Mary O'Neill, Mrs. Martha Campbell, and Bessie. Mr. Johns has two children by his first wife, Dora, aged fifteen, and Alice, aged twelve. He is a member of the United Artisans, while he and his wife belong to the Baptist church. He is deacon of that institution and also superintendent of the Sunday school. He is active in church work as also in all lines of enterprise for upbuilding and betterment of the community and is considered one of the best men of the community. In politics, Mr. Johns is a strong Republican and has been city councilman for six years.

AUSTIN C. RICE, who resides on Jackson street in The Dalles, was born on Fifteen Mile creek on October 29, 1865, the son of Horace and Eliza J. (Bolton) Rice, natives of Ohio and West Virginia, respectively. They are mentioned elsewhere in this work. The district schools of this county supplied the educational training of our subject and in studying and working on the farm with his father, he spent the days of his youth. In early manhood he was with his father on the ranch and in raising cattle and was well trained. When twenty-four, he purchased land from the military road grant and farmed it for six years. Then he sold his entire property and engaged in the grocery business at Ashland. Two years later he sold that business and came again to Wasco county and took up stock raising and farming. He purchased a farm from his brother, three miles from the old home estate, and after handling it for three years, he sold it and came to The Dalles, where he resides at the present time. In all his career, Mr. Rice has been an active and wide awake business man and has shown marked financial ability and thus has secured for himself a fine competence.

At The Dalles, on November 11, 1890, Mr. Rice married Miss Ada A. Waller, who was born in Polk county, on August 11, 1860. Her parents, George T. and Mary J. (Doty) Waller, were born near Quincy, Illinois. The father's father died when that son was an infant and then the mother brought her children across the plains with ox teams in 1849. Mrs. Rice has three brothers, Oliver, Lorin W., Alton J., and three sisters, Emily C. Fell, Minnie Winters, and Lulu Herritt. Mr. and Mrs. Rice have three children: Darrell L., aged eight; Verl W., aged four; and Dale G.

Politically, our subject is a good Republican and displays an interest in all matters both public and educational. His wife belongs to the Christian church. She is a graduate of the Monmouth college and for thirteen years previous to her marriage she was one of the educators of Oregon, teaching both in the Willamette valley and in Dufur.

ARCHIBALD C. MOAD, one of the progressive and popular citizens of Tygh valley, Wasco county, is a general blacksmith and wagon maker. He is a native Oregonian, having been born in Boyd, Oregon, June 19, 1874. He is the son of John N. and Mary E. (Flett) Moad, the father a native of Missouri, the mother of Quebec Province, Canada. In 1848 the father came alone across the plains to California, where for a few years he was engaged in mining. He went thence to Oregon and engaged in packing from The Dalles to Canyon City, in which business he remained for eight or ten years. He then located on Lower Fifteen Mile creek, eight miles from the present site of Dufur, where for twenty years he resided, with occasional visits to other localities. He came to Tygh valley in 1886, purchased a farm on the creek, one and one-half miles from Dufur, where he died in 1899. The mother came to Oregon in 1841, accompanied by her father, one of the earliest pioneers of the country. He was in the employment of the Hudson's Bay Company, and stationed at Oregon City. He died and she was adopted by Archie McKinley, another attache of the Hudson's Bay Company, who conducted a store for the company at Champog in the vicinity of the present Oregon City. At the age of twenty-two she was married, and at present resides with our subject's brother, Edward, on White river, one and one-half miles from Tygh.

Mr. Moad was reared and has lived all his life in Wasco county, attending the public schools, in youth, being nine months in Tacoma. On completing his education he was on the ranch with his father, and rode the range. In 1898 he worked through the winter in a blacksmith shop, in Dufur, and during two years was a member of the forest rangers. In the autumn of 1900 Mr. Moad purchased the blacksmith shop of James Gillmore, mention of whom is made elsewhere, and has since conducted the same. Mr. Moad has two brothers and three sisters: Adolphus and Edward, the former of Wapinitia, and the latter residing one mile and a half from Tygh valley, on the White river; Frankie, wife of Mark Painter, residing three miles west of Dufur; Nettie, married to James Easton, four miles from Boyd; and Tillie, wife of Edward Henderson, of Wapinitia.

Mr. Moad was married at the residence of the bride, near Dufur, May 5, 1897, to Levie Vanderpool, born near Prineville, Crook county, the daughter of William and Susan (Heisler) Vanderpool, both of which families are mentioned in another portion of this work. Fraternally, our subject is a member of Ridgely Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F., the Rebekahs, of which Mrs. Moad is also a member; and the M. W. of A., of Tygh, of which organization he is banker. He is a Republican.

KATHLEEN D. LINTON, who resides at 1107 Elm street, The Dalles, was born in Ashtabula, Ohio, on November 28, 1844. Her father, Stephen Shuart, was a native of New York and his ancestors were prominent and among the early colonial families. The descendants have a reunion every year in August, and at the last time one hundred and thirty-seven sat down at the table. He married Mary M. Beckwith, a native of Vermont. The Beckwith family is one of the old colonial families that dates their ancestry far back before the settlement of the colonies. The Beckwiths were very prominent in the early history in the new world and furnished many representatives to the colonial struggles and the wars since. Of Mrs. Linton's family it is stated that every male representative who was eligible was in the Civil war and fought for the stars and stripes. From these families came many prominent educators both in the classics and mathematics and many professional men. Mrs. Linton was well educated and followed school teaching, as did her mother. September 28, 1861, at Girard, Pennsylvania, she was married to George S. Roberts. He had served three months in the Civil war and in 1864, enlisted again and died of a fever in New Orleans. Mrs. Roberts had two small children, one six weeks old and the other less than two years of age, when he enlisted the second time. Robert Calder was with Mr. Roberts at the time of his death and later became acquainted with Mrs. Roberts, the widow, and on May 22, 1866, they were married. They remained in Pennsylvania seven years, when he was called away by death, leaving one son. He was a tanner by occupation and had served through the entire Civil war in the Independent Battery B, of the Ohio Volunteers, being in active service at Vicksburg, Shiloh, Pea Ridge, and in other large battles. He was clerk for his company during the war and was promoted to first lieutenant just before the war closed. After his death, Mrs. Calder taught school in Girard until 1875. On May 10, of that year, she arrived in Nevada, in response to a telegram from her sister, who was sick. Her two oldest children were left in the soldiers' orphan school in Pennsylvania.

nia, and the youngest she brought with her. She attended her sister and taught school and was there married to Joseph Kerr, a mining man and a native of St. Johns, New Brunswick. To this union two children were born. On November 11, 1878, he was shot by an intoxicated man shooting into a crowd, and this resulted in his death. After that, Mrs. Kerr taught school for five years and then married Andrew J. Linton, on September 11, 1883, the nuptials occurring at Salt Lake City. Andrew J. Linton was born in Fort Wayne, Indiana, on December 19, 1838. His parents were natives of Glasgow, Scotland, where they were married. Their death occurred at Fort Wayne. Andrew J. was educated in the public schools and then started to learn the machinists' trade, but owing to the death of his father, which brought responsibility to him, he was obliged to take more remunerative employment. At the time of the breaking out of the Civil war, he promptly enlisted and served three years then was honorably discharged and returned home. A relative offered him fifteen hundred dollars to enlist as a substitute and he took the money and again faced the enemy. This nice sum of money was sufficient to meet all the needs of his mother and the children, but while Mr. Linton was serving this last time, his mother died. He was in Company A, under Captain Kellogg, Sixteenth Army Corps, and was in the heat of the fiercest battles throughout the entire war. After the surrender of Lee, he was honorably discharged and came direct to Utah where he did mining. He later operated in various places in the west and discovered the placer camp at Osceola, White Pine county, Nevada. Owing to ill health, he sold his property and came to Wasco county, purchasing a farm on Ten Mile creek. He made a specialty of raising prunes and built the first dryer in the county. For twenty years the farm was his home, and on November 27, 1903, he was called hence by death. Mrs. Linton's children are named as follows: Ida M. Roberts, the wife of Frank Jeanney, who is a blacksmith at Wells, Nevada; Wesley S. Roberts, a stockman, whose death occurred at Baker City, Oregon, on November 5, 1902; Gerald M. Calder, a popular mining man of Baker City; Florence J. Kerr, now the wife of D. F. Cruise, in Seattle; Joseph Kerr, Jr., who lives at home with his mother.

Mrs. Linton has just rented her farm for five years and is living a retired life in The Dalles. She has a goodly competence that is sufficient for all the needs of life and is entitled to the enjoyment of the same owing to her faithful labors in the years gone by. She is a highly esteemed and popular lady and active in all labors of charity.

THOMAS F. MORRIS, farmer and stock-raiser, residing one-half mile west of Kingsley, Wasco county, was born in Wyandottè, Kansas, July 4, 1861. His parents, William R. and Catherine (Fox) Morris, were natives of Ireland, the father of Tipperary and the mother of County Carlow, Village of Nurney. When a small child William R. came to the United States with his parents, and they lived in New York, New Jersey and Ohio. At the age of six years Catherine Fox came, accompanied by her parents, to the United States. She died April 5, 1902, on our subject's place. During the Mexican war our subject's father enlisted in the Sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, serving one year and nine months. He was shot twice in the right leg, and almost in the same place on the limb. Following the close of the war he came to Kansas, where he found employment as a cabinet maker, going thence to Calaveras county, California, where he engaged in the sawmill business and mining. He drifted to Sonoma county, remained two years, and in 1869 came to this location in Wasco county, pre-empted land and lived here until his death in 1882. On the death of his mother, Thomas F. Morris inherited the ranch.

During his boyhood days he had attended the public schools in California. At present he has a handsome fourteen-acre orchard, the largest in that neighborhood. He cultivates mainly winter apples, having four hundred "Ben Davis," one hundred Springdale, one hundred Mammoth, Black Twig, Stayman Winesap, Arkansas Senator trees, and thirty other varieties. He owns about six hundred and eighty acres of land, his principal business being hog raising. He has recently erected a handsome story and a half cottage. His brother, John, died a short time after the family came to Wasco county, aged four years. Annie, a sister, died at the age of six, two weeks previous to the death of her brother. Mr. Morris never married. While he is, politically, a Republican, he is by no means a partisan, and not active in the various campaigns. He is a whole-souled, genial and popular man, broad-minded and progressive, and his devoted attention to his invalid mother for many years won the respect of the entire neighborhood in which he resides.

SAMUEL B. JOHNSTON, one of five brothers, progressive men and leading citizens of Wasco county, sketches of whom appear in other portions of this work, resides two and one-half miles west of Dufur. He was born in Centreville, New Brunswick, April 20, 1870. Biographical articles concerning his ancestry appear elsewhere.

Mr. Johnston came to the Pacific coast in 1891, the last of the family to remove thither. On leaving school he conducted the old home farm in Centreville, New Brunswick. In Wasco county he purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land and began the cultivation of the same. The extensive farming operations of the family are described in other sketches. At present the subject of this article is in charge of all the farming lands of the five brothers.

July 27, 1896, Mr. Johnston was united in marriage, at Dufur, to Miss Annie Neal, born at Hood River, the daughter of Milton and Margaret J. (Ward) Neal. Mrs. Johnston has one brother and one sister, Richard, a farmer, near Boyd, Wasco county, and Clem, wife of Charles Acker, of Portland, Oregon. To Mr. and Mrs. Johnston two children have been born, Kate and George, aged seven and two years respectively. Politically the affiliations of Mr. Johnston are with the Republican party, although he takes no very active part in the various campaigns, and is by no means a partisan. Personally, he is a public-spirited citizen, liberal minded and progressive, and one who has won the confidence of a host of friends.

S. I. EVERETT, proprietor of the Central Hotel, at Dufur, Wasco county, Oregon, was born in Ohio, March 27, 1858. His father, Isaac Everett, a native of Ohio, was a descendant of an old and distinguished American family, running down through many generations. He died in Iowa when our subject was eight years of age. The mother, Amelia (Cosgrove) Everett, born in Pennsylvania, was a descendant of a prominent family of the Keystone state.

The parents of our subject remained in Ohio until he was four years of age, removing thence to Iowa. Here the father purchased a farm, upon which young Everett worked, alternately attending district school. On the death of his father, he remained with his mother on the farm, in company with two elder brothers, until he was twenty. He then came to Dayton, the county seat of Columbia county, Washington, passed one winter there and after that came to what is now Sherman, then Wasco, county. He settled seven miles northeast of Wasco, filed on a homestead, and purchased an adjoining quarter section of land and upon which ranch he remained fifteen years. This property he rented and came to Dufur, bought the hotel and liverystable attached to the same, occupying half a block, the stable facing on Main street. The Central Hotel is the leading one in the town of Dufur and is exceedingly popular with commercial travelers and tourists. Mr. Everett has two brothers and six sisters living, viz: John, a merchant and farmer, of Glenwood, Iowa; Edward, of Sherman county; Mary, widow of Harrison Dolley, residing near Nelsonville, Ohio; Mrs. Sarah Connor, near Nelsonville; Priscilla, widow of James Carson, in Morrow county; Nancy, widow of Samuel Ornduff, of Sherman county; Ida, married to William Fleenor, a dealer in horses at Abington, Iowa; and Clara, wife of John Connor, a farmer residing near Beulah, Kansas.

At The Dalles, October 19, 1890, Mr. Everett was married to Minnie Frazier, born in Normandy, Indiana, December 31, 1863, the daughter of Aaron Frazier, of Dufur. Before marriage, Mrs. Everett had been engaged in teaching school and so popular was she throughout the county that she came very near being elected as county school superintendent although her party was more than two to one in the minority. She came of Scotch-Irish ancestry. Mr. and Mrs. Everett have the following named children, Olga, Hazel Esther, Verne Frazier, and Gladys. The first three were born on the farm in Sherman county and the last one at Dufur in Wasco county. Hazel E. died at Dufur, February 28, 1904.

Mr. Everett is a member of the I. O. O. F. and the Encampment at Dufur.

ALEXANDER HEISLER, who is now operating a meat market in Dufur, is one of the industrious and enterprising business men and land owners of Wasco county. He has been in this part of the county only a few years, but he has dwelt in Oregon all his life and is entitled to the honor of the pioneer for many sections of this great state. He was born in Lane county, on December 12, 1857, the son of William and Martha (McConnell) Heisler, who have mention in another portion of this work. Alexander was educated in the district schools and remained with his parents until eighteen years of age. Then he took up the cattle business with his brother, Monroe, who, also, is sketched in this work. Two years later he leased his father's farm on Wilson creek, Crook county, and a year later engaged in the stock business again, this time, with another brother. For fourteen years they were thus associated, and then our subject bought the entire business and conducted it for six years more. This was all in Crook county, then Mr. Heisler sold out his interests there and came to Dufur. He soon purchased a choice farm of fertile bottom land on Fifteen Mile and after conducting it for a time, rented it to his son-in-law and opened the meat market where he is at present engaged in a lucrative business. He is a man of good business ability and integrity and stands well in the community.

Mr. Heisler's first marriage was celebrated in Canyon City, Oregon, in 1882. At Dufur, on September 11, 1892, he married Mrs. Agnes Gilmore, the daughter of Benjamin F. and Elizabeth (Lantzenhizer) Saunders, natives of Akron, Ohio, and England, respectively. Mrs. Heisler was born in Indiana. Her mother's father was adopted by a German family and hence the German name. Mrs. Heisler was married first to Harry Bradshaw, who died before she was twenty. By this marriage she had two children: Byron H., at Twisp, Washington; and Richard H., a telegraph operator in Oklahoma. In 1887, she was married to Professor Herbert Gilmore, a professor in the Iowa Agricultural college. Three years after his marriage, he died. To Mr. and Mrs. Heisler four children have been born: Ada, wife of Cossie Woodford, now renting his father-in-law's farm; Eva, Bruce, and John, all at home. Mr. Heisler is a member of the I. O. O. F., and the Encampment and has passed all the chairs, having also been representative to both grand lodges. Mrs. Heisler belongs to the United Brethren church, also to the Maccabees, the Fraternal Union, the Rebekahs, and the B. O. A. She was well educated, graduating from the Priscilla Academy in Ohio, in 1877. Mr. Heisler is a well informed Democrat.

JAMES M. NOLIN, a prosperous farmer living two miles up Fifteen Mile creek from Dufur, was born in Ontario, Canada, on July 18, 1856. His father, William Nolin, was born in the Province of Quebec and his parents in the same place. His grandparents, the great-grandparents of our subject, came from France. William Nolin married Isabel Laird, a native of Ireland, who died here in Wasco county, in 1896. William Nolin had come here with his wife in 1886, and since her death he has resided with our subject. He is a man eighty-six years of age, remarkably well preserved, both physically and mentally, one of the best for his age that one will find in searching the state over. This indicates a wisdom and care on the part of Mr. Nolin that are very commendable for during the long years of his life he has so conducted himself as to preserve intact his powers.

Our subject was raised principally in northern New York near the Canadian line and for many years worked on the St. Lawrence river on a logging. With his brothers, he owned also a large farm in that country. In 1877, Mr. Nolin determined to explore the west and accordingly made his way to California where he followed dairying for two years in Gilroy. In the fall of 1879, he came north to Oregon and for a few years worked out in this vicinity, then rented the place upon which he now lives, also handling the Cates farm with it for nine years. Then he went to the Willamette valley and bought the farm which was his home for four years. After that, he sold out and came back to Wasco county and purchased the place where he now lives. For a few years before going to the Willamette valley, he was in the employ of the Staver and Walker agriculture firm of Portland and traveled for them extensively, during this employment, then moved to the valley and purchased the farm mentioned before. It was 1900 when he bought the place that he now lives upon, from Mrs. Louisa E. Turner. It consists of one hundred and sixty acres of as fine wheat land as can be found in this part of Oregon, and averages forty bushels to the acre and last year produced forty-seven bushels. All improvements necessary have been provided and Mr. Nolin is considered one of the first class farmers of the county.

On October 25, 1885, in Clackamas county, Mr. Nolin married Miss Flora E. Frost, a native of Illinois. Her father, Elam Frost, was also born in Illinois and is now deceased. He came to the coast with his family in 1869, settling in the Willamette valley where he died. His father died at Hood River. Mr. Nolin has three brothers, George E., Edward and David. His wife has one brother, Walter, and three sisters, Mrs. Mary Stevens, Mrs. Laura Turner and Mrs. Luella Shank. Mr. Nolin has been a school director for a number of years, has filled other offices and is active in the interests of the community and for general improvements. He belongs in the Democratic harness and is often seen at the conventions. Altogether, he is a man of stability, intelligence, genialty and kindness and enjoys an excellent standing in the community.

CLAUDE E. MARKHAM resides on the west side of Hood River about five miles south from the town, where he has a choice farm of fifty-seven acres. Three acres of this are devoted to strawberries, about fifteen to apples and the balance to general crops. He is one of the prosperous men of this section of Wasco county and has labored here for nearly fifteen years, in the good work of fruit growing in which he has gained a first class success.

Claude E. Markham was born in Dane county, Wisconsin, on September 28, 1866, the son of John W. and Agnes E. (Blount) Markham, natives of New York and Wisconsin, respectively. The father died in 1889, January 24, and the mother is now married to T. J. Cummings, a retired capitalist in Hood River. The first twelve years of our subject were spent near Madison, Wisconsin, then the family went to Kansas, where they engaged in the loaning business at Clay Center and there remained sometime. After completing the graded and high schools, Mr. Markham finished his education in the Lawrence business college. Returning to his home, he was employed in an insurance office for three years. It was 1890, when he came to Puget Sound and labored one year in the vicinity of Tacoma at various occupations then came in the spring of 1891, to Hood River where he bought eighty acres of land. He at once gave his attention to the cultivation of the same and its improvements and has labored continuously at that since. The place is well laid out and improved with good buildings, fences and so forth and is one of the nicest farms in the valley.

On July 28, 1891, at The Dalles, Mr. Markham married Miss Mattie A. Morton, a native of Sparta, Illinois. Her father came from Ireland and died in Sparta, Illinois, in 1901. Her mother, Catherine (Stewart) Morton was a native of Ireland and died on January 27, 1904, on the old homestead in Illinois. Mrs. Markham was engaged in teaching school some years before her marriage, being employed in Kansas and Illinois. She has eight brothers and two sisters living and one sister deceased. Mr. Markham has no brothers or sisters living. Three children have been born to our subject and his wife, Wesley, Agnes and Edward.

Mr. Markham is a member of the K. of P. and served three terms as C. C., and has also been a delegate to the grand lodge several times. He is a strong Republican and active in the campaigns and attends the conventions.

JOHN J. GIBBONS, who resides about four miles southwest from Hood River, is one of the substantial and industrious fruit raisers of the valley. He was born in Ireland, on May 21, 1846, the son of Martin and Annie (King) Gibbons, natives also of Ireland. The father died in Mayo county and the mother lives there at the present time. He was a civil engineer and a farmer. Our subject came to the United States when nine years of age with his older brothers and sisters. They settled in New York city and John obtained work as an errand boy in a large store where he continued two years. Then he went to St. Louis and joined relatives there and spent two years in learning the carpenter's trade after which he entered the car shops and was employed in that capacity for ten years in St. Louis and St. Joe. About 1878, Mr. Gibbons came to San Francisco and took a place in the Southern Pacific shops. In 1881, we find him in The Dalles, operating for the O. R. & N. In 1892, he decided to quit the railroad and retire to the farm, where he now lives, which he had bought during his service in the shops. Then he settled down to the cultivation of his farm and to raising fruit. He has about eleven hundred fine apple trees, Spitzenberg mainly, and sold many hundreds of boxes last year. He also raises grapes, pears and berries but apples are his main crop.

On October 9, 1870, at St. Joseph, Missouri, Mr. Gibbons married Miss Sarah McSherry, who was born in Maryland, opposite Alexandria, Virginia, whence her parents moved when she was an infant. Her father, Richard M., was a native of north Ireland and came to the United States when a young man. He served in the Confederate army and died in Kansas in 1899. Mrs. Gibbons' mother was also a native of Ireland and there was married. She died in Kansas. Mr. Gibbons has six brothers, Edward, Peter, Michael, Patrick, David, deceased, and James. The latter died in India as a member of the British Heavy Artillery. Mrs. Gibbons has two brothers, James and Thomas, and four sisters, Alice Goldsberry, Mary Magney, Theresa Dever, and Maggie Gurry. Mr. Gibbons has five children living, Frank, Charles, Albert, Willis and Emma, and three deceased; David M., who served in Company D, Second Oregon infantry in the Philippines where he died from disease contracted in the army; John, who died at Hood River when eighteen; and Richard, who died at Hood River, on September 18, 1898, aged twenty.

On October 29, 1898, Mrs. Gibbons was killed by a runaway horse. Mr. Gibbons is a member of the A. F. & A. M. and also belongs to the Christian church. He is a Republican and has been delegate to the conventions although he is not especially active. In all school matters, Mr. Gibbons manifests a marked zeal and interest. He has held the office of director a long time and with John Wilson, succeeded in establishing the Barrett district school which is a fine property of three rooms and one of the largest of its kind in the county. Mr. Gibbons spent a great deal of time in bringing the matter before the people and raising funds for the enterprise and finally was successful and it is a monument to his wisdom and labor in which he may well take pride. Mr. Gibbons is a good man, highly respected by all, and has shown marked industry in the labors he has performed in this valley.

His father, Elisha Potter, was a native of Pennsylvania, descended from an old colonial family. Seven brothers of the family came from England in the early days to New England and were among the very first settlers in Pennsylvania. The mother of Mr. Potter was Minerva Moore, also a native of Pennsylvania and from an old and prominent family. Mr. Potter is a cabinet maker by trade. At the time of the Civil war, he enlisted in Company C, Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, and served three years. Since that time, he has been broken in health and has been unable to work at his trade only at intervals. He followed the same in Pennsylvania as he could until 1875 and then came with his family as a member of the Pacific colony to Hood River. They bought their present home of one hundred and fifty acres, built a large three-story, eighteen room house and made other important improvements. The Belmont church was the first to be organized in the Hood River valley. Mrs. Potter was a prime mover in the organization, there being but six charter members. Mr. Potter spent the greater part of a year in the erection of the church building, and was obliged to secure a hand to attend to his farm work while he wrought on the church. Frank Sherrieb hauled the lumber and assisted Mr. Potter all he could in the erection of the building.

In the little Island of Fohr in the North Sea, on March 8, 1848, occurred the birth of Martin H. Nickelsen. At that time the island was owned half by Denmark and half by Germany. It is but a small piece of land containing from thirty to fifty square miles and has a population of over

He first settled in California and operated a shop for five years then came to The Dalles in 1879, and worked for the O. R. & N. railway. In 1884 he bought twenty acres on Belmont street where his family resided and he opened a shop. Later he gave up work in his shop and came to his farm which he cultivated for two years and then sold. The place is now owned by Robert Jones. Mr. Nickelsen then moved into town and engaged in the mercantile business for six years after which he sold out and bought his present place of fifteen acres. He raises the usual varieties of fruit and has made a good success of his labors.

ering its vicissitudes as well as the smiles of fortune, is now comfortably located at Dufur, Wasco county, Oregon. His avocation is that of a painter, grainer and paper hanger. He is the son of Daniel H. and Levina (Cummings) Peabody, the former a native of New Hampshire; the latter of Vermont. It is claimed that the family of Peabody is of kingly descent, and that it springs from Boadicia, famed in history as the British Queen who so valiantly resisted the Romans when they invaded Britain. Her own name and that of her kinsman, Boadie, is considered to be the origin of the name Peabody, Pabodie, etc.

Our subject's father, Daniel Harris Peabody, is of the family of Isaac Peabody, one of a number of brothers. Isaac Peabody was born November 28, 1775, and was married in January, 1799, to Mary Dodge. Their children were Ada Satira, born November 12, 1857, and Miles, born February 24, 1862. Nancy Jane, daughter of John Dalton, was born May 1, 1833, and December 18, 1856, was married to Josiah Loveren, to whom were born John Edward Loveren, February 2, 1858, and George Miles Loveren, born August 14, 1866, and Satira Wadleigh, born November 18, 1836, dying in November, 1869. May 12, 1858, she was married to John F. Burnham. Their children were Herbert Byron, born April 7, 1859; Susie W., born May 15, 1861; Addie Leona, born December 19, 1863; Mary Ella, born October 22, 1866.

Isaac Peabody's second child, Hannah Bachelder (Mrs. Coggins) resided in Medford, New Hampshire. Her son, Charles H., also lived there. The other son, Isaac C., is a miner and farmer in California. Isaac's fifth child, Elizabeth (Mrs. Hersey), resided in Meriden, New Hampshire. She also lived in Croydon, Sharon, Vermont and in North Grantham, New Hampshire. Her third child, John F. served in the Fifth New Hampshire Volunteers and was killed at Fair Oakes, June 1, 1862. Emily C. was her fourth child. She was a young woman of marked literary ability, some of her compositions having been published in the Boston Transcript.

Daniel Harris, the father of our subject, was Isaac's sixth child. He was married in New Hampshire, dying in Hooksett; his wife passing away in Lowell, Massachusetts. Their second son, John Chapman, left home at an early age to seek his fortune. Lydia, the seventh child of Isaac, was an invalid most of her life, and never married. Isaac and Jacob were twin children. Isaac's first wife was born in Lebanon and died in Lowell, Massachusetts, during his absence in the army. Jacob lived in Bridgeport, Connecticut, and at one time was a member of the police force in that city. Ezra, Isaac's youngest child, lived in Medford, New Hampshire. He served in the Third New Hampshire Volunteers and was grievously wounded in a skirmish in South Carolina. He was a man of great natural ability and force of character. His daughter, Celia, married Benjamin F. Foster.

John Chapman Peabody, our subject, was reared in New Hampshire. He was born in Lowell, Massachusetts, from which city his parents removed when he was three years of age. When he was fifteen years old he returned to Lowell and worked in the cotton mills up to the time they were closed by a financial panic. At Boston he shipped before the mast on the Flying Fish, for a voyage around the world, but deserted in San Francisco. He was penniless, and while in this condition was drugged and "shanghaied" aboard a Danish vessel, but the effects of the drug wore off and he escaped. Following many exciting and perilous adventures in California he enlisted in Company C, Seventh California Infantry, Colonel Lewis commanding. Our subject's company was sent to Fort Mojave, where it remained fifteen months. Having been mustered out of the army he returned to the Atlantic coast via the Isthmus, and while en route was robbed of six hundred dollars. He returned to Lowell and secured employment in the mills, and also worked in the laboratory of Dr. J. C. Ayer. In 1881, with his family, our subject went to Oregon, locating at The Dalles, where he was employed two years in the car shops, and then opened a paint shop on his own account. In 1884 he located a ranch thirteen miles southeast of Dufur, where he resided with his family five years. In 1895 he disposed of the ranch and purchased property in the town of Dufur, and erected a fine, two-story residence in which he now lives, owning another which he rents.

September 14, 1871, at Rock Island, Illinois, Mr. Peabody was married to Celia L. Hewitt, a native of Michigan, having been born at Jackson. Mrs. Peabody has one half brother, Frank Hathaway, a painter at St. Johns. To Mr. and Mrs. Peabody have been born three children; Edith M., wife of Andrew J. Douglas; Maud M., wife of James H. Johnston, one of five Johnston brothers; and Roy H., born October 10, 1880, at Juniata, Nebraska. Mr. Peabody is a member of Ridgely Lodge, No. 71, I. O. O. F., of which he is past grand; Nicholson Encampment, of which he is chief patriarch, and James Nasmith Post, G. A. R., The Dalles, of which he was a charter member. He has been a delegate to the grand lodge of Odd Fellows, and is universally esteemed by all his numerous acquaintances. It is important to notice that our subject's father was a first cousin of Nathaniel Hawthorne's wife. Elizabeth Peabody, a second cousin to our subject, was the first to introduce the famous kindergarten system from Germany into the United States. She was a well known educator and famous over the civilized world. Horace Mann, the famous educator, and one time superintendent of education for the state of Massachusetts, married a sister to Elizabeth Peabody. Elizabeth Peabody never married. Julian Hawthorne is now compiling a record of the Peabody family.

EDWIN M. HILL, of the firm of Hill & Robinson, blacksmiths and wagon makers, resides at Dufur, Wasco county. He is a native son of this grand state, having been born in Malheur county, April 22, 1872. The house in which he was born stood on the Idaho and Oregon state line, one-half of the edifice in Oregon, the other half in Idaho. The family postoffice was at Silver City, Idaho. His father, Marshall Hill, is a native of Tennessee, his parents being descended from a prominent Pennsylvania Dutch family. His mother, Prudence (Thomas) Hill, was born in Linn county, Oregon, her ancestry being, also, of Dutch extraction. Her parents crossed the plains so early as 1849. Marshall Hill, father of our subject, accompanied his parents on the perilous journey over the plains, in 1852. He was an active participant in the Indian war of Rogue River, in 1855 and 1856, and in the Piute war in Idaho. He is a fruit grower, residing one mile south of The Dalles, on a farm, with his wife, the mother of our subject.

With his parents young Hill moved to Gilliam county when he was about six years of age. Two years afterward they moved to The Dalles, and our subject attended public schools and worked on the farm. He received the benefit of a course at the high school at The Dalles. In 1897 he went with the Lane brothers of The Dalles where he learned the trade of a blacksmith. With them he remained until March, 1902, when he located at Dufur, and purchased his present shop from the Summer Fallow Machine Company. Later he associated himself with Mr. Robinson as a partner. They have one of the best equipped shops of the kind in the country, doing all descriptions appertaining to the trade. They employ one man the year round, and the greater portion of the time they have two helpers. Mr. Hill has one brother and three sisters; Roy, with his parents at The Dalles; Melissa, who taught school at The Dalles twelve years, and is now one of the faculty of McMinnville College; Julia, who has taught ten years; and Bertha, wife of J. B. Spite, a Baptist minister at Hood River, Oregon.

Mr. Hill was married at The Dalles, September 6, 1898, to Lulu J. Berrian, born at Golden-dale, Washington, the daughter of James and Leona (Wendell) Berrian. Her father died when Mrs. Hill was nine years of age. At present her mother resides at Hood River. Mrs. Hill has three brothers and one sister; James, in the employment of the government fish hatchery at Roseburg, Oregon; George, with a mercantile firm, at Portland; Howard, at Portland; and Ada, wife of Lucius Clark. Mr. and Mrs. Hill have two children, Lois and Howard. Our subject is a member of the United Artisans, the I. O. O. F., and politically is a prohibitionist. Personally he is a fine, progressive gentleman, and an influential citizen.

AARON FRAZIER, a most efficient and cultured school teacher at Dufur, Wasco county, was born in Kenton county, Ohio, October 22, 1834. He is the son of Abraham Frazier, a native of North Carolina, whose parents were born in the same state. The paternal grandfather of our subject was born in 1748. During the War of the Revolution the Fraziers owned a mill on Deep River. They were a Quaker family and remained neutral during the conflict, although the old Scotch Fraziers had been valiant fighters for over six hundred years, or longer. At the historical battle of Colodan Field the Clan Frazier fought fiercely and many of them were killed in the engagement, some of them having been tortured to death by the English soldiery.

Abraham Frazier, our subject's father, was a farmer, and on his place young Frazier grew to manhood, having attended a Quaker school at Martinsville, Ohio. Here he perfected himself in mathematics. He thence went to New Vienna, Ohio, where he was matriculated in the academy at that place, studied the languages and was there four years. Later he entered Yellow Springs College, at Antioch, Ohio, remaining only one year owing to illness. One year later he entered the Southwestern Normal School, at Lebanon, Ohio, where he studied industriously two terms. Following this thorough course of study he began teaching, which he since continued most successfully, until 1902. He taught six years at Frankfort, Indiana; three years at Berlin, Wisconsin; seven years at Leon, Iowa; three years at McMinnville, Oregon; nine years in Dufur, besides a short period in Sherman county and other places, aggregating four hundred and fifty-two months of teaching.

In 1883 Mr. Frazier filed on a claim in Sherman county. Seven years thereafter he sold it. He owns property in Dufur. At present he is not teaching, but devoting his attention to fire insurance and newspaper work. He also holds the office of justice of the peace. Our subject is the youngest of seven brothers: William C., of Clinton county, Indiana; Madison, a farmer in Kansas; Lewis, of Ohio; John, Moses and Abraham, deceased. He has two sisters, Eliza, wife of Jacob Quigley, of Ohio, and Margery A., married to Abraham Skein, of Clinton county, Indiana.

August 15, 1860, Mr. Frazier was married, at Blanchester, Ohio, to Jennie Williams, a native of that city, the daughter of Walter and Huldah Williams. Mrs. Frazier died October 20, 1872, at Farmers Station, Ohio, where she was visiting. The second marriage of our subject took place in Leon, Iowa, November 5, 1873, when he was united to Huldah H. Ham, born near Cleveland, Ohio. Mrs. Frazier has one brother and four sisters. Mr. Frazier is a member of the A. F. & A. M., and past master; of the R. A. M., and past high priest, and a K. T. of Osceola Commandery, Iowa; the I. O. O. F., being past grand; and he and his wife are members of the Christian church.

Our subject is a Democrat and has been a delegate to county and state conventions, ever active and stanch; has served as county superintendent of schools in Oregon and Indiana; has been county surveyor in Yamhill county six years; city recorder in various places including Dufur; nine years principal of Dufur school, and was principal of high schools in Frankfort, Indiana, Berlin, Wisconsin, Leon, Iowa and McMinnville, Oregon. He assisted in the framing of a legislative bill, and was instrumental in the organization of the present excellent school system in Iowa. Mr. Frazier has two children by his first marriage; Minnie A., wife of S. I. Everett, mentioned elsewhere; and Guy L., in the United States army, stationed in Alaska. By his second marriage he has Frederick D., of Dufur, and Annie, wife of James Adamson, of Mitchell, Oregon.

CHARLES N. BURGET, coroner of Wasco county and associated with C. J. Crandall, undertaker and embalmer, resides at The Dalles. He was born in Little Rock, Lyon county, Iowa, March 4, 1875, the son of Isiah I. and Nannie (Fisher) Burget, natives of Michigan. The parents of Isiah I. died when he was three years of age. He was engaged in the undertaking and furniture business in Iowa many years, coming to the Pacific coast in 1875. He returned to Iowa, remaining until 1883, when he removed his family to The Dalles and worked four years as a carpenter. Associating himself with C. J. Crandall he engaged in the undertaking and furniture business, dying September 1, 1895.

Up to the time of the death of Isiah I. Burget, he was city treasurer of The Dalles and past master of The Dalles Lodge A. F. & A. M. The mother of our subject died at his birth. She was the daughter of Charles A. and Rebecca Fisher, natives of the Empire State, descended from an old and distinguished New York family.

Our subject was educated at The Dalles graded schools and the high school. He is a member of Columbia Lodge, No. 5, I. O. O. F., the A. O. U. W., and The Dalles Aerie, No. 156, Eagles. In June, 1902, he was elected coroner of Wasco county as a Republican, running far ahead of his ticket. There were three tickets in the field, and he lacked but eight votes of tying the other two opposition tickets.

January 1, 1900, at The Dalles, Mr. Burget was married to Miss Jennie Young, born in Wasco county, November 17, 1878, the daughter of William and Julia (Clark) Young. The father is a native of Pennsylvania, a blacksmith, at present residing at Prineville, Crook county. The mother is a native of Cottage Grove, Oregon.

Mr. and Mrs. Burget have one child living, Viva Elizabeth, born July 11, 1901. Mr. Burget has two half brothers, Guy, aged twenty, and Roy, aged eighteen, now living with their mother, the subject's step-mother, at The Dalles. Mrs. Burget has one brother, Grover, living at Prineville with his parents, and four sisters, viz: Carrie, wife of Will J. Van Dorn, engaged in the livery business at Mountain View, California; Elnora, married to William C. Palamountain, of Palo Alto, California; Bessie, with our subject; and Estella, residing with her parents at Prineville.

MRS. ELIZABETH L. LORD, a most cultured and estimable lady of The Dalles, Wasco county, was born in Scotland county, Missouri, April 29, 1841. Her parents, William C. and Mary (Yeargain) Laughlin, were natives of Kentucky. An extended mention of her father appears in this volume.

For our subject, the foundation of her education was laid in the public schools of The Dalles, which was continued at the Convent at Vancouver. In those early pioneer days school facilities were meagre, so Judge Laughlin devoted considerable time, personally, to educating his children.

January 15, 1861, at The Dalles, our subject was united in marriage to Mr. Wentworth Lord. Mr. Lord is a native of Denmark, Maine, and the date of his birth is May 4, 1832. His parents, Job C. and Evelyn (Ingalls) Lord, were residents of the Pine Tree State, and the mother died when Wentworth was an infant. Mr. Lord was reared and educated in Maine and remained there until 1857, when he came to California by water. After a short time spent in work at camp Angels, he came to Portland in 1858. Late in the same year, he made his way to The Dalles and engaged in mercantile business and followed it for years. He has always been identified with the business interests of The Dalles, but is now retired, although he is still president of the Wasco Warehouse and Milling Company. He has shown himself a capable and good business man and stands well in the county. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lord, one dying when one year old. The other, Evelyn, is the wife of Fred L. Houghton, of The Dalles, engaged in the hay and feed business. Mrs. Lord is a member of the Christian Science church, of The Dalles, of which she is First Reader, and also a distinguished member of the Sorosis Club. She has one brother living, Frank Laughlin, a wheat dealer and capitalist at The Dalles. Mrs. Lord is a lady of marked literary taste and ability, and the author of a number of interesting articles and books.

JOSHUA W. FRENCH, of French & Company, bankers in The Dalles, is one of the foremost financiers in eastern Oregon. He was born in Holland, Vermont, on September 13, 1830. His brothers, Daniel and Smith French, are mentioned elsewhere in this work. Joshua W. was educated in the district schools and by personal investigation and reading. Until twenty-one, he labored on the farm between school terms and knows well the rugged life of the agriculturist. In 1852, he journeyed via the isthmus to the Mecca of the west, California, and for two years was industriously engaged in panning the golden sands of that favored region. With his brothers, Daniel and Joseph, he was also engaged in operating a ferry on the Stanislaus river and also handled a roofing business in San Francisco. As early as 1864, Mr. French landed in The Dalles, joining his brother, Daniel, who had preceded. him to this location. They established the first bank in The Dalles and since the day it opened its doors it has taken and held the position of one of the sound moneyed institutions of the land. Its policy has been dictated by men of marked financial ability and there is no more thoroughly established banking house on this coast. Our subject has had a great part in forming the policy and conducting this business, being always associated with his brother, Daniel, who has since passed away. Since the death of his brother, Mr. French assumed charge of the bank and has stood at its head maintaining the most excellent reputation the institution has always borne and conducting its affairs with an aggressiveness, yet always tempered with a wise conservatism, sagacity, and breadth of grasp, that have added still greater triumphs to the bank and demonstrated, as well, the manner of man at the helm. In addition to this responsible position, Mr. French is associated with various other enterprises of importance and is sought after in counsel by all who may have the good fortune to obtain his ear and receive his expressed judgment. His personal attention is given to the bank and other enterprises are secondary when compared with this. He is president of the Arlington National Bank and also director in several companies with which he is associated.

Like his brothers, Daniel and Smith French, Joshua W. French is a man of strong individuality and with them has been an important factor in the development and growth of eastern Oregon.

Mr. French married Miss Ellen Burke, a native of Maine, the wedding occurring in California. The children born to this happy union are: Mrs. Nellie J. Bolton, of The Dalles; Edward H., paying teller in French & Company Bank; and Vivian H. assistant manager of the Wasco Warehouse and Milling Company. Mr. French is a leading member of the A. F. & A. M. and in politics is Republican, but not active.

JOHN W. NOLIN, deceased. In the person of Mr. Nolin, Wasco county lost one of her respected and substantial citizens, a good man, a patriotic citizen and a kind father and husband. His brother, James M. Nolin, is mentioned elsewhere in this work. Like his brother, James, he was reared on the St. Lawrence river in New York and for several years engaged in the fishing business, which was very profitable. The same being prohibited by law, they then turned their attention to farming in 1882, after which they came to Oregon. Our subject purchased two hundred and eighty-six acres about four miles up Fifteen-mile creek from Dufur, where his widow resides at the present time. He gave his attention to the cultivation and improvement of the same continuously until his death, on February 1, 1903, he being then aged fifty-two years and ten months. Had he lived until April 11, he would have been fifty-three years of age. In Canada, Mr. Nolin was a prominent member of the Orangemen and after removing to New York was a staunch Democrat. He also took an active interest in politics both in New York and here in Oregon. He was clerk in Jefferson county, New York and was offered the nomination the second time, but owing to the fact that he had decided to come to Oregon, he refused it. Here for nineteen successive years, he was clerk of the Remsey district and no one was more zealous for good schools and general upbuilding than Mr. Nolin. He was frequently judge of the election and even delegate to the conventions. His education had been carefully looked after in his younger days as he had received a thorough high school course from the famous Kingston schools in Ontario.

Fraternally, he was a member of the United Artisans at Dufur and in church affiliations of the Episcopal denomination. He was a good man, intelligent and kind, and was deeply mourned at his death.

On June 8, 1875, at Gananoque, Ontario, Mr. Nolin married Miss Cora Potter, who was born in that place on September 1, 1858. Her father, Augustus Potter, was a native of Rhode Island and came from the old Potter family, which was prominent on the Atlantic seaboard all through the early days. His great-grandfather fought for independence in the Revolution and many of the Potter's fought in the War of 1812, and the Mexican and Civil Wars, they were prominent in governmental affairs, were represented liberally at the bar and are large manufacturers throughout New York and in New England. The progenitor who first landed in this country, came on the Mayflower. Augustus Potter's father, the grandfather of Mrs. Nolin, was one of the first school teachers in western New York and later became a very successful physician. With Mrs. Nolin's father and another son, he was later engaged in the woolen manufacturing business. After heavy loss by fire, in this business, Mr. Potter began farming in 1868. His death occurred in Clayton county, New York, on January 6, 1894 at his son's home, being aged seventy-nine. He had married Mary McCuen, a native of Glasgow, Scotland and from an old lowland family. She lives with Mrs. Nolin's sister in New York state. The children of this family besides Mrs. Nolin, are Albert, Ulysses, Nelson, Ernest and Mrs. Elizabeth Murdick. To Mr. and Mrs. Nolin, three children were born; Ella, the wife of Charles Magee, a retired farmer at Dufur; Wilbur and Earl. Mrs. Nolin, like her husband, was well educated and was a graduate of the Lewiston seminary at Gananoqua, Canada. Since the death of her husband she has taken up the management of affairs with a display of courage and wisdom and receives the respect and approbation of all.

HENRY KLINDT resides about two miles west from The Dalles, where he has a valuable farm and one of the most beautiful locations for a residence in the country. His house is so situated that it overlooks the river for miles, and commands a view of The Dalles, and the foot hills of Klickitat county, Washington, across the Columbia. It is an ideal location and one of the most beautiful in this part of the country. His land produces two crops each year, in this respect being better than any around. Before the high water comes he sows wheat and cuts it for hay and then the land overflows from the Columbia. When the water has subsided, he plants vegetables, and in the fall he harvests abundant crops. His potatoes are known far and near as the finest in the entire country. Altogether he is one of the most successful and thrifty tillers of the soil in the country.

Henry Klindt was born in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, on February 22, 1830, the son of Goris and Viebke (Stuhr) Klindt, also natives of the same province as our subject. The father served in the Danish army when that nation had charge of the Schleswig province. The parents both died in their native country. Our subject was educated in the public schools and learned the trade of the mason in his native land. In the spring of 1851, he came to the United States and after a few days in New York, he came on to Connecticut, whence he went to Cumberland, Virginia and later journeyed on to Iowa. There he followed his trade until 1859, when he started for Pikes Peak, but owing to unfavorable reports, he turned aside to California. There he spent two years and in 1862, he returned to Iowa, via the isthmus. His family had been left in Comanche and a tornado swept away all his property. The family were in a stone building, which was blown to the ground, but none of the inmates were killed. Selling his property, he brought his family across the plains with ox teams and since then has remained in Wasco county. The first six years were spent in town, doing building and contracting. Three buildings still stand in

The Dalles, which he erected, while many of the bricks went down before fire and flood. In 1868, Mr. Klindt bought his present place and since that time he has continued steadily in producing the fruits of the field.

At Davenport, Iowa, on November 16, 1854, Mr. Klindt married Miss Doris Stottenberg, a native of Germany. When eleven she came to the United States in 1847 with her parents, Hans and Angie (Mundt) Stottenberg. The father died the year he landed in Iowa, and the mother passed away when Mrs. Klindt was an infant. Mr. Klindt has one brother, Hans, now deceased, and formerly a sea captain. He has the following named sisters, Annie Niehs, Trina, Viebke, Abel and Gretchen. Mrs. Klindt has the following named brothers and sisters, Hans, Claus, Lenke, Trina, Silke, Beke, Abel and Angie. All the family are very wealthy. To Mr. and Mrs. Klindt five children have been born, who are living; George E., in the Horseheaven country; Charles A., at home; Alvina, wife of Hans C. Nielsen, a merchant in The Dalles; Amalie, with her father's sister on Puget Sound; and Walter in the Horseheaven country. Mr. Klindt has accumulated a handsome fortune by his wise efforts and skill and has also won the esteem and confidence of all who know him.

HENRY PRIGGE, deceased, was one of the substantial men of the Hood River valley and labored long and assiduously for the improvement and upbuilding of the country. He was born on January 28, 1850, near Hanover, Germany and died on September 10, 1903 at his home in Hood River. His parents, John and Laura Prigge, were natives of Germany where they remained until their death. He came to the United States in 1872, having received a liberal education in the latter country. Settlement was made at Winona, Minnesota first, and two years later, he went to San Francisco. After spending some time in various employments, he engaged in the saloon business and there remained until 1880. Then came the journey to Oregon and they finally selected the place which is the family home today. Mr. Prigge bought a settler's right and filed on a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres. It is especially fine soil, well improved and shows the marks of his long and wise labors bestowed here. Mr. Prigge was a zealous advocate of good roads, excellent schools and general advancement and labored here to attain these ends. He served as school director and road supervisor at various times and did excellent work in these public capacities. During the last five or six years of his life, Mr. Prigge was ill much of the time, being afflicted with cancer of the stomach. Finally, at the time mentioned, death claimed him and he passed from the scenes of his labors here to the world beyond. He was well known and highly respected and was deeply mourned at the time of his decease.

At San Francisco, on March 12, 1880, Mr. Prigge married Miss Wilhelmine Hillman, who was born in Saxony, Germany, on September 27, 1850, the daughter of Carl A. and Laura (Petculd) Hillman, natives of Saxony. The father was a tailor and musician and died there in 1890. The mother still lives there aged seventy-five. Mr. Prigge had the following named brothers and sisters, Lewis, John, Heinrich and Claus. Mrs. Prigge had three brothers, Clemence, Emil and F. Henry and two sisters, Augusta and Emma. To Mr. and Mrs. Prigge, six children have been born, Herman, Louis, Freda, Emma, Annie, and Laura, all at home.

Mr. Prigge was a member of the A. O. U. W., while he and his wife were members of the Lutheran church. Miss Freda attended school at Napa, California, after attending the district schools in this place. Mrs. Prigge is a woman of many virtues and has many warm friends in this part of the country. She has a very fine family of children and is taking up the added burdens of life since the death of her husband with a fortitude and wisdom that are commendable.

WILLIAM J. HARRIMAN is at the present time one of the commissioners of Wasco county. He is one of the leading farmers in this portion of the state and now resides at 1103 Elm street, The Dalles. He was born in Leicestershire, England, on November 11, 1854. His father, John Harriman, who is given mention elsewhere in this volume, was a native of the same place. For many generations back, the family has lived there and our subject's cousin now owns the old Harriman estate. He married Miss Elizabeth M. Hanford, also a native of that shire. Her father was a noted implement manufacturer for many years and took a fine prize of a ten guinea gold cup for the best plow manufactured in the realm. Mrs. Hanford's brother succeeded to the business and after his death, the factory passed out of the hands of the family. Both the Hanford and the Harriman families were very prominent and influential people in Leicestershire. Our subject was well educated in the public and private schools and after fourteen remained on the farm with his father until twenty-six. After that, he was employed on the street railway in Nottingham, then traveled for Robinson and Company, brewers of Burton. After that he was distributing agent for a large newspaper and in May, 1882, came to the United States, locating in Wasco county. Although he had been active at various labors in the old country, he had not amassed sufficient funds for the trip and so was supplied by his mother. Upon arriving here, he immediately took a preemption and went to work for A. J. McHaley. His wages were used to make improvements upon the farm and he labored along gradually improving the place until he had a fine farm with capital enough to buy another quarter section, which he did from J. H. Harris. He soon bought another quarter from J. H. Harris. He has in this farm now, five hundred and two acres. He owns another farm on Eightmile creek, near Endersly postoffice, of four hundred and forty acres, a portion of which is very rich bottom land. It is one of the finest places in the county. Both of the farms he handles through tenants and hired overseers and he is thus largely retired from active business. In the fall of 1903, Mr. Harriman retired from the farm and moved to The Dalles, purchasing the property where he lives at the present time.

At The Dalles, on March 20, 1888, Mr. Harriman married Miss Jane M. Nelson, who was born in Glasserton, Wigtonshire, Scotland, on December 6, 1865. Her parents are James and Elizabeth (McKeand) Nelson, natives of that same country. The father died in 1902 on our subject's ranch near Endersly. The mother died at the home of her son-in-law, William Hastings. Mrs. Harriman has two brothers, Thomas H. and David, and three sisters, Jessie, single, Mrs. Agnes Hastings, and Mrs. Elizabeth Nicholson. Mr. Harriman's brothers, Edward M. and Arthur M. are mentioned elsewhere in this work. To our subject and his wife, seven children have been born: William T., December 17, 1888; Charles N., March 23, 1890; George E., November 30, 1892; John H., November 21, 1894; Florence M., June 10, 1896; Lizzie M., June 18, 1899; and Jane C., April 20, 1903.

Mr. Harriman is a good stirring Democrat and has always been very active in the campaigns and for the interest of his party. He is frequently at the county conventions, has been justice of the peace and in 1900 was elected commissioner of Wasco county, running two hundred and seventy-five votes ahead of his ticket. At the time he was installed in office, the county owed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. On May 1, 1904, it owed a little over eleven thousand dollars. This speaks well of the financial ability and sound wisdom of our subject and his associates. Mr. Harriman has given considerable personal attention to building good roads and is a strong advocate of the best in every line. He has the reputation throughout the country of being one of the best farmers and stockmen to be found. In the fall of 1903, at The Dalles, he took the prize for the best team of carriage horses, first prize for roadsters, first prize for mare and colt, first prize for plow team under fourteen hundred pounds, first prize for Shorthorn yearling, first prize for yearling Hereford and won the farmer's team and buggy race. In 1902, he took four first prizes on fruit but in 1903, he did not enter fruit.

Mr. Harriman is a member of the I. O. O. F. and was raised in the Episcopalian church. His wife was a member of the Congregational church. On April 2, 1904, after a continued illness of typhoid fever, which was succeeded by pneumonia, Mrs. Harriman was called to pass the river of death. She was a noble Christian woman and left a record unsullied.

Since the above was written, Mr. Harriman again entered the race for county commissioner, but as the Republicans were in the majority he lost, but by a small majority.

WILLIAM H. DAVIS is a man of kindness, affability and geniality, always ruled by a sense of honor and justice and guided by unswerving integrity. His birth occurred in Linn county, Missouri, on August 28, 1843. The parents, James and Nancy (Johnson) Davis, were natives of Ireland and Kentucky, respectively, and died when our subject was a small boy. The father preceded his wife, some time over the river of death, and when this lad was about seven, he awoke to the sad fate of being an orphan. He was bound out and lived the life of an ordinary boy, but had little opportunity in those early days to attend school. But young Davis was not made of the stuff that wilts at one adverse blast, for he picked his way along with the training to be had and became fitted for life's duties. About twenty-one, or a little before, he departed from his guardian and in 1862 enlisted in Company F, Forty-second Missouri Infantry, and served throughout the entire struggle with distinction, being called on to do much heavy fighting and the arduous duty of the soldier. He acted as a scout and a spy and would often be called to headquarters to doff his uniform for citizen's clothes to undertake some hazardous mission where his life would pay the forfeit should his identity become known. Frequently he made his way into the rebel lines, fraternized with them and always left without exciting suspicion, his successful plan being to act the part of a green, gawky boy. His services were highly appreciated and he was intrusted with many very important enterprises. When the war ended and the time came to lay down his musket and take again the plow, he had the satisfaction of knowing that he had done what he could for his country. While he participated in none of the large battles he had a life of the most trying danger during the entire service. Being mustered out in 1865, he returned to Linn county and there engaged in farming until 1877, when he came to Oregon and settled on Wapinitia flat. He landed here in July and since that time he has continued in the business of stock raising and farming. He owns eleven hundred and sixty acres of land, the beginning of the estate being secured through the homestead act. Half of this is cultivatable, and he reaped this year three hundred acres of good grain. Last winter, Mr. Davis fed nearly two hundred head of cattle. He started with Shorthorn breeds but is now handling Hereford, almost exclusively. He has some fine registered animals and ships as far as Missouri. His stock is of the best and the thrift, care, and wisdom manifested in all his enterprises, show a man of ability and one who could but be crowned with success.

In Linn county, Missouri, on December 12, 1865, Mr. Davis married Miss Eliza H. Woodruff, a native of Linneus, Missouri. Her parents, David and Frances (Alexander) Woodruff, were born in Kentucky and are now deceased. On March 19, 1904, after many years of faithful life, Mrs. Davis was called hence by death. She had many friends, being, like her husband, popular and highly esteemed. No children have been born to this marriage. Owing to the fact that Mr. Davis had little opportunity to gain an education, and his knowledge of books being circumscribed, he relied more especially on his faithful wife to assist him in his business relations. She was a woman of refined and gentle nature, possessed of excellent business qualifications, and her loss was most keenly felt by her husband as well as by all who knew her. Mr. Davis is one of the active Republicans of the county and is almost always at the conventions, where he is an influential participant. He never seeks office for himself, but is greatly interested in putting good men into the places of importance.

Mr. Davis is justly entitled to credit for improving the cattle stock of Wapinitia flat, and also of this section of Oregon, as he was the first settler to bring Shorthorns to the flat. Some time since he returned to Missouri and brought back eleven cows and five bulls, all fine registered stock. He has devoted his entire time to cattle raising and his enthusiasm along that line has resulted in his nick name, "Cow Davis," by which he is known all over central Oregon.

JONATHAN N. PATTERSON, deceased. For many years, the subject of this memoir was identified with the growth and the upbuilding of Wasco county. He was one of the best known pioneers throughout the west and was engaged in arduous duties that required much fortitude and genuine grit, for many years. He was born on July 11, 1835, the son of Jonathan and Teena (Foster) Patterson, natives of Kentucky and North Carolina, respectively. Both families came from Tennessee to Illinois thence to California. The father died en route in Bear Valley, Nevada, while the mother with nine children came on through to California where she was married six years later to Mr. Robinson. Our subject was thirteen years old when they crossed the plains with ox teams, it being then 1848, and he mined and drove stage in California, making two good fortunes. After that, he engaged in the livery business. Burning out in that, he turned his attention to mining in Nevada, Idaho and Montana. He made frequent trips to Oregon with stock and in 1867, he drove stage from The Dalles to Boise City. In 1875, he drove stage from The Dalles to Canyon City. About this time, he filed on a homestead in Rail Hollow and after five years sold it and took railroad land near by. Abandoning this, he came to his present place which Mrs. Patterson bought. He was then broken in health and suffered much. Mr. Patterson had served in the Rogue river and other Indian wars of the fifties and participated in the Kern creek Indian struggle at which place he received a hernia as the result of heavy lifting. From this, after a short illness, his death occurred on March 18, 1901.

In February, 1874, Mr. Patterson married Miss Jane Hurst, who was born in Linn county, Oregon, on March 17, 1857. Her father, James Hurst, was a native of Kentucky and his ancestors were born in Virginia and England, and were early pioneers to Tennessee, Kentucky and Missouri. He married Melinda Davis, a native of Illinois, whose father was born in Germany. They crossed the plains with ox teams and in 1851, settled in Linn county on a donation claim and now live on Ten-mile creek near the free bridge in Wasco county. Mr. Patterson had three brothers, George, Daniel and William, and one sister, Mrs. Carrie Zekehouse. Mrs. Patterson has the following named brothers and sisters, Benjamin, Marion, James, William, Uriah, Mrs. Susie Gray, Mrs. Emily Love, Mrs. Melissa Evans, Mrs. Sina Brown, Mrs. Nancy Brown, Minerva and Mrs. Millie Boles.

Mrs. Patterson has managed her estate with becoming wisdom and is a lady whose labors are worthy and whose life has been such as to win the confidence and esteem of all who know her. She has had much to endure and to try her during her life, owing to the illness of her husband, but she has borne all patiently, manifesting a wisdom that has enabled them to pass successfully along and it has won a good competence for her to enjoy in these later years of her life.

ANDREW J. HOWIE, one of the industrious and thrifty agriculturists of Wasco county, is residing about four miles up Pine Hollow from Dufur. His place consists of one section of choice land and has been secured as the result of his own labors and sagacity. He took a homestead here first and later purchased adjoining land until he has now six hundred and eighty acres, three hundred of which are annually cropped to wheat. The place bears the marks of a man of intelligence and care in his labors and it is one of the profitable estates of the county. Recently Mr. Howie erected a fine two-story eight room dwelling, where his wife presides with the graciousness of which she is so well possessed. Their home is a beautiful place and they are dispensers of excellent hospitality. They are substantial, intelligent and leading citizens of this part of the county and are real Oregonians with the true patriotism of the genuine American.

Andrew Howie was born in Scotland, on May 12, 1866, the son of Robert and Marion (Stevenson) Howie, both natives of Scotland and farmers. They remained in their country until death. In 1886, Mr. Howie, having gained a good education in his home place, determined to try his fortune in the land of the free, and accordingly set his face westward. His journeys landed him first in Essex county, Ontario, where he wrought for wages for about four years. Then he came hither and went to work on the farms. In 1889, he filed his homestead right on the land where he now lives and continued his labors. He soon began to improve and subdue the place and as the time went by added by purchase as stated above until the place is now one of the large ones of the county. In addition to general farming, Mr. Howie winters about thirty-five head of cattle, raises a great many Poland China hogs and has some fine thoroughbred animals. He has all the improvements needed on the farm and it is well kept.

On November 28, 1895, at Dufur, Oregon, Mr. Howie married Miss Katherine Heisler. She was born in Lane county, Oregon, on September 24, 1864, the daughter of William and Martha (McConnell) Heisler, who are mentioned elsewhere and are better known all over the country as "Grandpa and Grandma Heisler." Mrs. Howie's brothers and sisters are all mentioned in this work. Mr. Howie has two brothers, James and John, and two sisters, Mrs. Marion Gray and Mrs. Mary Welsh. Fraternaly, the subject of this article is affiliated with the I. O. O. F. and the W. W., while he and his wife belong to the Rebekahs. They are also members of the United Brethren church, and in politics, Mr. Howie is a good Republican.

HON. ZELEK M. DONNELL, deceased. The following memoir is devoted to one of the earliest pioneers of Oregon, a worthy man, and, in life, a most excellent citizen. His occupation was that of a stock raiser. He was born in Indiana, May 5, 1829, the son of James Donnell, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, who came to America early in the eighteenth century. The youth of our subject was passed on a farm with his father, sixty miles south of Indianapolis, in Decatur county.

February 3, 1852, our subject was married, and March 1st, of the same year he left with his bride by steamer from Cincinnati, Ohio, for St. Joseph. Here he outfitted, and with ox teams began the long journey across the plains. This trip was uneventful, and in September, 1852, they arrived at The Dalles. As the company was mostly made up of young couples they walked the greater portion of the way, the train being known as Dr. Crawford's company. Leaving The Dalles our subject and his young wife went down the Columbia river to Portland. During this trip Mrs. Donnell went through the Cascade Rapids—with a sick child whose mother died en route—in an Indian bateau. The Donnells finally located near Brownville, on donation land. Here they lived until November, 1858, and then disposed of the claim to Captain James Blakeley, father of Judge George Blakeley, of The Dalles, elsewhere mentioned in this work, and engaged in the cattle business and was among the first to range cattle between the Des Chutes and John Day rivers. In this business he continued until his death, November 28, 1873, at the age of forty-four years. In 1866 Mr. Donnell and his family removed to

The Dalles in order to provide his children with educational advantages. June 4, 1864, he was elected Territorial senator from Wasco county, serving one term each in two regular sessions, and one special session held for the purpose of ratifying the Thirteenth Constitutional Amendment. At this period he was a prominent and leading Republican. Mr. Donnell was a charter member of the first Congregational church organized in The Dalles, in 1859.

The marriage of Mr. Donnell took place at Greensburg, Indiana, the bride being Camilla Thomson, a native of Indiana, born April 3, 1827, in Decatur county. Her parents, John and Spicy (Hamilton) Thomson, were natives of Kentucky and pioneers of Indiana. Mr. Donnell left four children, Lulu, wife of Charles J. Crandall, elsewhere mentioned; Orvilla, living in Montana, and Martin Z., a druggist at The Dalles. At present Mrs. Donnell resides at The Dalles with her son, Martin.

SMITH FRENCH, a retired merchant in The Dalles, has been one of the heaviest operators in commercial lines in this portion of Oregon. During a long career in active business life here, he manifested ability and energy, coupled with industry and uprightness that won both success liberally and for him a standing that is certainly enviable. A well outlined account of his life will be interesting and we append the same.

Smith French was born in Holland, Vermont on March 26, 1837. His father, Joshua French, a native of New Hampshire, was born in 1803, went to Vermont when a young man, became a successful farmer, and died in April, 1857. The mother, Polly (Mead) French, was born in New Hampshire, the year being 1801, and died August, 1850. In 1875, Mr. Smith French came to The Dalles to visit his brothers and see the country. After a month spent here, he returned to the east and one year later went to California, whence he journeyed to The Dalles arriving there February, 1877, and bought the interest of Mr. Samuel Brooks, in a mercantile establishment owned by Brooks and McFarland. Mr. Brooks is mentioned elsewhere in this volume. The title of the firm was changed to McFarland and French. They did a large and successful business for fifteen years, then sold out and Mr. French retired from the very active duties of business life. At the present time he is president of the Gilman French Land and Live Stock Company, one of the largest cattle raising companies in the state of Oregon. He is a member of the firm of Bolton and Company, general merchants, at Antelope. He is a large stockholder in the Wasco Warehouse Milling Company. He is a stockholder and director in the Arlington National Bank at Arlington, Oregon. In addition to which, he has minor interests in different parts of the state.

Politically, Mr. French has always belonged to the ranks of the Republican party until recently, being now a Prohibitionist.

On September 18, 1861, at Stanstead, province of Quebec, Canada, Mr. French married Miss Esther B., daughter of James F. and Sallie (Brown) Magee. The father was born in Lebanon, New York and was a carpenter. He went to California in 1854, via the Isthmus, and followed his trade and mill work there for twelve years. After that, he returned to Canada and in 1877, came to Oregon with the subject of this article. He remained here until his death, on June 23, 1894, being aged eighty-three years. The mother of Mrs. French was born at Andover, New Hampshire, on February 19, 1812. Her parents moved to Canada in 1821. Mrs. French was born in Stanstead, Quebec, Canada, on December 5, 1838 and has one brother, William B. Mr. and Mrs. French are the parents of three children: C. Gertrude, a doctor of medicine, and practicing in Portland, Oregon; Grace Maude, who married J. W. Condon, in November, 1889 and died on November 20, 1898, leaving her husband and one son, Clifton French Condon; Frank Arthur, who is the manager of the New York Cash Store, a mercantile house in The Dalles.

Daniel M. French, eldest of the three French brothers of The Dalles, came to The Dalles in 1862, and for many years was a leading business man here. A sketch of his life with that of his widow are found elsewhere in this work. Joshua W. French, brother of our subject, came to The Dalles in 1864 and for many years was engaged in the mercantile business with his brother Daniel. In 1877, they established the first banking house in The Dalles, and the same is now owned by Mr. Joshua French and the estate of Daniel M. French. Our subject is one of the executors of the estate of his brother, Daniel M. deceased.

Joseph M. French, the eldest one of the brothers, went to California from Massachusetts, in 1849, and died in the Golden State in 1889, a retired merchant. Marsh French, the youngest brother, came to the coast about 1863 and now lives at Port Townsend, Washington.

Mr. and Mrs. French are members of the Methodist church and for twenty years, he has been a trustee. Mrs. French was superintendent of the M. E. Sunday school for more than twenty years, is now president of the W. C. T. U., and is closely identified with the social functions of the city. She was appointed chairman of a committee by the Columbia River Conference of the M. E. church to formulate plans for the removal from Stanstead, province of Quebec, Canada, the remains of the late Rev. Jason Lee, the first Protestant missionary sent across the Rockies, to be interred by the side of his wife and child in the Lee Mission cemetery, at Salem, Oregon. From early life Mrs. French has been an aggressive worker in the church and for the cause of temperance.

LUTHER E. CROWE, of the firm of Mays & Crowe, dealers in hardware, implements and groceries, and having a magnificent store at The Dalles, was born in Nova Scotia, March 22, 1858. His parents were Jacob and Maria (Fletcher) Crowe, the father a native of Massachusetts, of an old New England family, the ancestors of whom came from the North of Ireland. The mother was born in Nova Scotia. Both parents are deceased.

In the spring of 1868 our subject came to California accompanied by his mother and step-father, D. A. Faulkner. They located in San Jose valley, Alameda county, where he attended school at Centreville until he was sixteen years of age, when he entered the service of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. He removed to Oregon in 1880 and obtained employment with John L. Hallett, superintendent of construction of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's road, as operator and electrician. Later he was with Julius Thielsen, in the construction department of the Northern Pacific Railroad. Subsequently he returned to the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and was station agent at Hood River five years. He came to The Dalles in 1890 and associated himself with his father-in-law, Robert Mays, and purchased the hardware business from Abrams & Stewart. During the autumn of the same year they were burned out and they then took over the hardware business of Fish & Bardon, and erected a building on the corner of Second and Federal streets. In 1897 they were again burned out, and until they had completed the present handsome brick building they occupied a store room across the street. Their store is a two-story edifice, one hundred feet square, containing two stores and a commodious basement, affording them about twenty-five thousand square feet of flooring. Their plumbing shop is in a separate building, of corrugated iron, in the rear of the main store. They have also, stables, warehouses, implement sheds, etc., covering four lots, extending from Second to Third streets, and one other lot which they lease.

They carry a stock of from $30,000 to $50,000. From fourteen to twenty clerks and artisans are employed in the establishment.

At The Dalles, in September, Mr. Crowe was united in marriage to Eunice Mays, born in Tygh valley, Wasco county. Our subject has two half brothers and one half sister: Fletcher Faulkner, of Ogden, Utah; George A. Faulkner, of Oakland, California; and Letitia, wife of Fred A. White, of San Francisco, California. Mr. Crowe is a Republican, though far from being a partisan, and he has been a member of the city council. Fraternally, he is a member of Cascade Lodge No. 303, B. P. O. E., of which he is past exalted ruler, and a member of the grand lodge; Friendship Lodge No. 9, K. of P., past C. C.

JOHN F. HAMPSHIRE, ex-treasurer of Wasco County, residing at The Dalles, and one of the popular and influential citizens of that progressive town, was born in Marysville, California, October 6, 1872. His parents were John A. and Kate (Sweeney) Hampshire, the father a native of Pennsylvania, the mother of New York state. John A. Hampshire was descended from old English ancestry. He was a machinist and blacksmith, and went to California in the early 50's, and for many years he was interested in the Marysville foundry. He came to The Dalles in 1877 and was connected with the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, with which corporation he remained until his death, June 3, 1887. The mother, born in Binghampton, New York, of Irish ancestry, now lives in San Francisco, California.

John F. Hampshire was educated in Wasco county, attending the Wasco Independent Academy, until the death of his father. He then entered the employment of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company as errand boy in the office of the master mechanic; was subsequently in the ticket office and various other positions seven years. He was then with The Dalles, Portland & Astoria Navigation Company in the office, and as purser, two years, and subsequently with Mays & Crowe as bookkeeper. Mr. Hampshire purchased an interest in the firm, in 1903. In June, 1900 he was elected county treasurer on the Democratic ticket, receiving at his first election a majority of one hundred and fifty-six, and at his second election about four hundred. Mr. Hampshire was the first Democratic county treasurer elected in twenty-four years.

He is a member of The Dalles Athletic Club, of which he was director two years; of Cascade Lodge B. P. O. Elks, No. 303; K. O. T. M., The Dalles Tent, No. 20, of which he is past commander. He is a member of the Roman Catholic church. Mr. Hampshire has never married. He has one brother, D. Harry Hampshire, residing at The Dalles. Our subject is eminently popular with all classes and is an influential citizen who is highly esteemed and respected throughout Wasco county and eastern Oregon.

GREGOIRE TRUDELL, who dwells on Fifteenmile, about five miles up from Dufur, in what is known as Rail hollow, is one of the thrifty and intelligent residents of Wasco county. He owns a good farm, raises much grain, as barley, oats, wheat, besides brome grass and other farm productions. He handles some stock and is a man of energy and push.

Gregoire Trudell was born in Ontario, Canada, on February 20, 1859, the son of Benjamin and Argon (Lovloewy) Trudell, natives of Essex county, Ontario. The father's father came from Paris. The mother's parents came from France and dwelt many years in Michigan. After completing a good education in the public schools of his native county, our subject followed various occupations and then came to Michigan, where he wrought in the logging camps. Later he did the same work in Wisconsin and Minnesota. He had served his first lessons in the lumber business in Canada. Finally, in 1891, Mr. Trudell determined to seek what could be found in the west and accordingly, he came hither. He purchased a half section of land where he now lives, being pleased with this country, and since then he has devoted himself to farming and stockraising. He has won good success in his labors and is rated as one of the well-to-do men of the county now. Recently Mr. Trudell purchased one hundred and twenty acres more land.

Mr. Trudell has the following named brothers and sisters: Benjamin, Frank, and Anthony, farmers in Canada; Alfred, a farmer at Kingsley in this county; Nellie, the wife of Alexander Cochois, in Massachusetts; Annie, the wife of Paul Pasnote, of Ontario; Argon, the wife of Dennis Mayhew, in Massachusetts. Mr. Trudell is a member of the I. O. O. F., and of the Encampment. He is a Republican in politics and intelligent in the issues that interest the people.

His father died in Canada in 1888, leaving a farm valued at ten thousand dollars besides a large property in Stony Point, which town he had promoted. He gave first a portion of land for a Catholic church and then the place grew to a thrifty village. He was always interested in public affairs and was a man of genial ways and good spirit. He never would hold office but sought other good men to fill all places. He was an influential and upright man. His wife died in 1870, at the same place. The name of the postoffice was Chevalier. Our subject has never seen fit to take a wife, but contents himself with the more quiet joys of the bachelor's life. His standing is first class and he has many friends.

GILFORD D. WOODWORTH owns real estate in various places in the Hood River valley and is one of the heavy fruit producers of the section. His home place is about three miles southwest from town. He was born in Berwick, Nova Scotia, on December 25, 1853, the son of Gilford D. and Salina (Corbett) Woodworth, also natives of Nova Scotia. Two brothers, Woodworths, came to the New World on the Mayflower and from one of them descended the family of our subject. Part of them were loyalists during the struggle for independence and part of them were patriots. Our subject studied until eleven and then went to sea and obtained a good education from various places. In 1869, he went to San Francisco and shipped from there on the bark, Helen Snow, for the Arctic regions. They were obliged to abandon her in the ice and with the balance of the crew Mr. Woodworth was twenty-one days in open boats. They finally reached Point Barrow, by sea and by land, where they were all taken in by the ship, Josephine. Two weeks later the Helen Snow drifted out of the ice and our subject, with three boats' crews and six men from the vessel that picked her up, brought her to San Francisco, where she was sold to the Russian government. Mr. Woodworth again shipped for the Arctic regions, this time on the bark, Alaska, and was gone seven months. Their vessel was crushed in the ice and our subject came back to San Francisco on the bark Minerva. For about two years after that he was coasting out of San Francisco. Then he went to Contra Costa county where he remained until 1880, when he came to what is now Sherman county and took land to which he added by purchase until he had thirteen hundred and fifty acres, which was known as the Locust Grove wheat farm. Mr. Woodworth was a pioneer in the Sherman county country and was one of the first wheat raisers in that favored section. There were only twenty-five or thirty families in what is now Sherman county, and those pioneer days brought their hardships and trying times to Mr. Woodworth as they did to the other pathfinders. In 1894 he raised the largest crop of wheat ever produced by any one individual in that section, it amounting to forty thousand bushels. In 1899, he sold his estate to William Barzee. Three years before that Mr. Woodworth had brought his family to this place, and on November 26th, of that year, bought fifteen acres. Now he has thirty-five acres in this piece. He has another orchard of five acres near by, one of twenty acres on the east side and eighty acres one mile east. He handles twenty acres of strawberries, has two thousand trees, Newtown and Spitzenberg apples, besides other fruits, and the balance of the land raises diversified crops. Last year he cleared three hundred and sixty dollars on Newtown apples from three-fourths of an acre.

On December 18, 1878, Mr. Woodworth married Miss Rose Benton, at Martinez, California. She was born in Noble, Michigan, the daughter of Clark N. and Marietta (Gillett) Benton. The father was born on Lake Superior and was named from the captain of the craft. His parents were of Scotch descent. The mother was born in New York. Both are now deceased. Mrs. Woodworth came to California with friends in 1874. Mr. Woodworth has two sisters: Mrs. Amanda Pineo, and Ermina, single. Mrs. Woodworth has three sisters, Mrs. Esther Andrews, Mrs. Myrta Catelle, and Lulu, single. She also has three half brothers, Dudley, Ora, and C. N. Four children have been born to this worthy couple: Roy N. and Guy, farmers in the Hood River valley; Ethel, in Sacramento county, California; and Idell, at home. Mr. and Mrs. Woodworth are members of the United Brethren church and are zealous workers for the faith. They are prosperous and industrious people and have many friends.

RICHARD J. GORMAN, of the firm of R. J. Gorman & Company, engaged in the real estate, loans and insurance business, and one of the active, progressive citizens of The Dalles, Wasco county, was born in Kingsley, this county, November 22, 1878. His parents are Patrick and Sarah (Brookhouse) Gorman, natives of Ireland. They now reside at The Dalles. Patrick Gorman came to the United States in 1861, locating at Chicago where he engaged in the tanning business. He migrated to Oregon in 1876, and in this state he filed on a homestead near Kingsley, devoting his energies to farming and stock raising until 1900. At this period he retired from active business and came to The Dalles to reside.

The public schools of Kingsley, the Wasco Independent Academy and a literary and commercial course at Mount Angel College, Marion county, contributed each to the really excellent education of our subject. From the latter institution he was graduated with honors in 1897, and he then began the study of law with Judge Bennett. Subsequently for eighteen months he was editor of the Chronicle, and was with the Times-Mountaineer two years as city editor. In April, 1903, he commenced his present business in company with silent partners, and it is but just to say that he has been eminently successful. Our subject is a member of the Y. M. I. and the Roman Catholic church. He is a Republican, but not particularly active and not at all partisan. He still remains a bachelor, and has one sister, Mary, wife of T. J. Senfert, of The Dalles. His two half brothers are John, a mining man in Mexico, and Patrick, now on the home ranch at Kingsley, their names being McGrail. Mr. Gorman is an estimable gentleman, and one who has won the confidence of a large community.

DAVID A. TURNER is one of the oldest living pioneers of the Hood River valley and has done a labor here that commends him to substantial and good citizens. He was born in Randolph county, Missouri, on September 21, 1836, the son of David and Jane (Cloyd) Turner. The father was a native of Virginia, and his father was born in England. The grandfather of our subject came to the New World and made a settlement in Virginia, where he died. The widow then married again and the family moved to Kentucky, our subject's father being then a child two years of age. David Turner grew to manhood in Kentucky, then learned the carpenter's trade, then went to Missouri. His mother lived to be ninety-nine years and seven months of age. The mother of our subject was born in Kentucky and her parents in Virginia. She died in 1838, David A. being then two years of age. The father married again. In 1857, our subject came to San Francisco via the isthmus and clerked in a store in Eldorado county. In 1861, he invaded the wilds of the Hood River valley and bought a squatter's right to land. Soon after, however, he went to Baker county and worked in the mines near Auburn. A year later, he returned to this valley and bought another squatter's right and since then has remained here. His farm was five miles south from Hood River and he continued in his labors until 1902, when he sold out and removed to Hood River and purchased town property which he now rents. He and his wife have six dwellings and these with his other property, give them a good income.

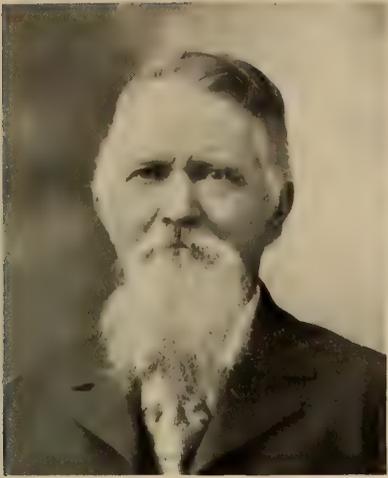

On March 19, 1866, Mr. Turner married Miss Amanda J. Neal, who was born in the Willamette valley in 1850. Her father, Peter Neal, was a native of Virginia and a pioneer of Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee, Texas and Oregon.

He crossed the plains in 1844 and settled at Oregon City, where he was a mill man and blacksmith for the Hudson's Bay Company. He came to Hood River in 1861 and built the first mill in this vicinity. His death occurred in Roseburg, in 1901. Mrs. Turner died on the ranch, on November 25, 1887. In June, 1897, Mr. Turner married Miss Laura E. Frost, a native of Illinois, the wedding occurring at The Dalles. Her parents were Elam and Samantha Frost, now deceased. Mr. Turner has the following named children by his first marriage: Luella, the wife of Ed Rand, city marshal of Sumpter, Oregon; William W., Roswell C., and Arthur M., all deceased. The sons were aged twenty-eight, twenty-four, and twenty-two, respectively, at the time of their death. Two died in one week, and the other two years later. Mr. Turner is a non-affiliated Mason, while he and his wife belong to the Methodist church. In politics, he is a staunch Republican, but not especially active.

Mr. Turner had six brothers all older than himself and two are now living, Richard B., in San Luis Obispo county, California; and Samuel, at St. Joseph, Missouri. He also had one sister who died recently. Mrs. Turner has two brothers, Edward, who died September 22, 1886; and Walter H. Frost, living near Mohler, Idaho. She also has three sisters; Mrs. Mary E. Stevens, of Portland; Mrs. Flora E. Nolin of Dufur, Oregon, and Mrs. Luella M. Shank, of Canby, Oregon.

JESSE W. RIGBY is now retired in Hood River, after a long life of service as a minister of the gospel for the Methodist church. He was born in Morrow county, Ohio, on January 10, 1843. His father, Caleb P. Rigby, was a native of Washington, Virginia, and his parents were Titus and Elizabeth (Pumphrey) Rigby, natives of Maryland. The mother's father, John Pumphrey, was born in Wales and her mother was a Cromwell of England. Our subject's father was a tanner by trade, learning the same in Belville, Ohio. Later he did farming and his death occurred on August 5, 1871 at Mechanicsville, Iowa. He married Miss Christiana Fait, who was born in Utica, Ohio. Her father, Martin Fait, was a prominent Methodist preacher and well known all over the state of Ohio. His parents came from Holland. The mother's father was a native of England and her mother, Jane Watson, was born in Ireland. Our subject spent his boyhood days in Cedar county, Iowa, where the family moved in 1846. His first education was obtained in the district schools and then he enlisted on July 25, 1862, at Mechanicsville, Iowa, in Company B, Twenty-fourth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, under Captain R. S. Rathbun and Colonel E. C. Byam. He was in active service until August 5, 1865, being mustered out at Davenport, Iowa. He was confined for four hundred and fourteen days at Camp Ford prison in Texas. He participated in the siege of Grand Gulf, battles of Fort Gibson and Champion Hills, in the siege of Vicksburg—forty-seven days under fire—and with his company was on provost duty at Vicksburg. He was also in the siege of Jackson. Then he fought at the battle of Carrion Crow Bayou and next at Sabine Cross Roads where he was kept a prisoner until the close of the war. He returned home in August, and the following September he entered Cornell college, Mt. Vernon, Iowa, six years later graduating with the degree of Master of Arts. He then entered the ministry and in 1871 was ordained at Webster City, Iowa by Bishop E. S. Andrews. Then he preached two years at Sargent Bluffs, Iowa and was later stationed at Smithland, Sibley, and in 1879, came to Lewiston, Idaho. He was prominent in the work there, organizing the Methodist church at that point and at Asotin, Juliaetta, Kendrick and other places, plodding steadily along all the years in this vicinity until 1892 when he came to Hood River and took charge of the Belmont church. Two years later, he organized the Asbury church and was in that church for two years. Then he went to Fossil, Wheeler county, thence to Bickleton, Washington, after which he was placed on the superannuated list in 1896, and returned to Hood River where he still resides. Although relieved of churches in the ministry, Mr. Rigby is still active in the Master's work and is one of the highly esteemed men of this part of the country.

On August 17, 1871 at Mount Vernon, Iowa, Mr. Rigby married Miss Julia A. Case, who was born in Mount Morris, New York. Her parents were David and Mary (Bassett) Case. She died at Bickleton, Washington, in 1894. Mr. Rigby married again on May 22, 1901 at East Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to Martha R. Weaver, who was born in Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania. Mr. Rigby has the following brothers and sisters, Elmer C., Martin F., Thomas H., Washington H., deceased, Joshua C., deceased, Eliza J. deceased, and Mrs. Melissa D. Todd. Mrs. Rigby has four brothers, Hon. Frank Weaver, James R., Stewart, Homer, and several sisters.

Mr. Rigby is a member of the G. A. R. and prominent in that organization. Four children were born to Mr. Rigby and his first wife; Ethel J., wife of Rev. G. R. Archer, pastor of the Methodist church at John Day, Oregon; Ruth E., at home; Gertrude M., wife of Rev. C. D.

Nickelsen, she died June 6, 1898, and Nellie J., wife of Claude E. Weatherell and now deceased.

Mr. Rigby has been a very faithful and conscientious preacher and has wrought well in the vineyard. He is a man whose faith has made him upright and careful in his walk to show forth the principles that he taught. He and his first wife endured many hardships and together they labored both in church work and Sunday school for the upbuilding of the faith. He and his family now have the satisfaction of seeing much good result from these labors, while they are secure in the love and esteem of hosts of friends.

WILLIAM L. CLARK, resident engineer for the United States government at the Cascade Locks and a man of a vast fund of practical experience, is one of the leading civil engineers in this part of the country. He has gained every part of this instruction while he followed working, by careful study after hours. While in some respects the college man has the advantage of trained professors, still there is nothing that can take the place of practical field work and the man who studies principles out at night and puts them into practical execution the next day, is more thoroughly drilled and equipped in his profession than can be done by any other method. William L. Clark is thoroughly conversant with every part of his profession and has mastered it as few men have. He was born on May 19, 1867, in Sauk county, Wisconsin. His father, Newton Clark, was a native of Illinois and a civil engineer of great experience through Wisconsin. He is now residing in Portland. Our subject's parents moved to Hood River when he was about eleven years of age and there he completed his literary education in the public schools and the private school of T. R. Coons. He soon took a position under his father who was in the government employ and by him was thoroughly trained in civil engineering and remained with him until nineteen. Then he entered the employ of the Northern Pacific railroad under John Q. Jamison, assistant engineer of the Northern Pacific railroad. He was then in charge of the construction of Stampeded tunnel and our subject worked there until that enterprise was completed, being associated with various leading engineers during that time. Then Mr. Clark engaged on the Southern Pacific Railroad in various engineering enterprises until 1893, when he was appointed to the important work at the Cascade Locks under G. W. Brown. In July, 1900, he resigned that position and accepted the position of district city engineer in Portland. In May, 1903, he was appointed to his present position and is discharging the duties incumbent upon him in a very efficient manner.

At Middleton, Idaho, Mr. Clark married Miss Mary E. Mabee, on November 6, 1898. She was born in Dade county, Missouri, the daughter of S. P. and Jane Mabee, natives of Indiana. The father enlisted in the Civil war when very young and served four years. He is now living in Missouri. Mr. Clark has two sisters, Grace Dwinell and Jeanette.

Mrs. Clark has five brothers, George, Frank, John, Joseph and Jacob H., and two sisters, Ada Pyle and Cora Polly. Mr. Clark has one son, Newton, Jr., four years of age. Our subject is affiliated with the A. O. U. W., while his wife is a member of the Christian church.

In political belief, he holds with the Republicans and is an active worker for the interests of his party. He is a young man of promise and scholarly attainments and stands exceptionally well with the people in his profession.

HON. THOMAS R. COON is the present efficient mayor of Hood River and a prominent fruit grower of the valley. Formerly he was occupied in the work of the educator and made an excellent record in the same. He was born in Marion county, Oregon, on March 4, 1854, the son of Thomas L. and Polly L. (Crandall) Coon. The father was born in Allegany county, New York and followed school teaching. He died on January 10, 1854, before our subject was born. He came from an old colonial family of Scotch and English ancestry. The mother was a native of New York and died in Salem, Oregon, the widow of Stephen Price. The Crandall family descended from John Crandall, who came to Massachusetts in 1636 and married Elizabeth Gorton, daughter of Samuel Gorton, a noted leader in the colonies. Crandall was very prominent among the promoters of the constitutional guarantee for religious toleration in Rhode Island. He was five times chosen to represent his town, Newport, as a commissioner of the general court of Rhode Island. He was appointed by this court a member of a committee to draft a letter that should be presented to "His Highness and Council" of England asking for protection against the hostile efforts of the other colonies of New England insisting that Rhode Island should prevent the Quakers from having "theire liberty amongst us, as entertayned into our houses or into any of our assemblies." The idea of full religious toleration which this colony always maintained toward each of its inhabitants was quaintly expressed in this letter as follows: "Plead our case in such sorte as wee may not be compelled to exercise any civill power over men's consciences soe longe as humane orders in poynt of civility are not corrupted and voyalated."

Speaking of the descendants of John Crandall one writer says: "The peculiar features in the character of the Crandall family are seen to have been patient industry, unvarying independence, firmness in adhering to principle, soberness of mind and unflinching support of high moral and religious views and movements, though some times very unpopular."

Our subject's parents came to Oregon in 1850 and settled on a donation claim where Silverton now stands. Mrs. Coon laid out the town of Silverton and lived there until 1861. Our subject was educated in the public schools of Salem, and in the Willamette University and commenced teaching when twenty. He took a teacher's life diploma at the earliest age possible and was the first native teacher of Oregon to secure a diploma by examination. He helped organize the first state teacher's association in Oregon and also the first territorial teacher's association in Washington. He was principal of the Mt. Tabor school and the Central school in Portland, of one of the Seattle schools and of the city schools in Astoria. In 1883, he came to Hood River, bought state land near town and was one of the first strawberry raisers of the country. He was first to discover the value of the Clarke's Seedling strawberry, an Oregon variety, now known all over the United States as "The Hood River Strawberry." He shipped the first berries from Hood River and helped to organize the Hood River's Fruit Growers Union and wrote articles of incorporation.

On April 12, 1874, at Tacoma, Washington, Mr. Coon married Miss Delia McNeal, who was born on Green Bay, Wisconsin, on April 12, 1854. The Tacoma Ledger claims that they were the first couple married in Tacoma. Mrs. Coon's father, Abraham McNeal, married Miss Beebe. Mr. Coon has one half-brother, Eugene Price. Mrs. Coon has three sisters, Sarah Orchard, Jennie Cooper and Annie Coad. Our subject and his wife are members of the United Brethren church and are prominent people of Hood River. In politics, he is independent and was for many years identified with the Republican party. He has held various prominent offices and is a man of ability and energy. He served two terms as joint representative, in the sessions of 1893 and 1895. He was elected mayor of Hood River on the ticket called the Majority Rule but recently resigned the position. In 1894 Mr. Coon representing the Hood River Fruit Growers Union was one of four delegates from Oregon who took part in organizing the Northwestern Fruit Growers Association at Spokane, Washington. Mr. Coon has labored zealously for the advancement of the fruit growing industry throughout the northwest, and has accomplished more than can be written in promoting the same, and it is with pleasure that we have the privilege of mentioning these items wherein he has done so much labor, beneficial to the Hood River country.

Mr. Coon, assisted by his two sons, now owns and operates a large orchard and fruit ranch overlooking the Columbia just below Lyle, Wash. Here and at the old home on Hood River Heights Mr. Coon, a pioneer, will follow the bent derived from his ancestors, many of whom in their later years engaged in literary and reformatory pursuits.

ALEXANDER STEWART, a merchant of Mosier, is a man of large experience in the business world and is now handling a thriving trade. He carries a five thousand dollar stock of well assorted general merchandise and is the recipient of a generous patronage. He was born in Wisconsin, on March 2, 1856, the son of Alexander and Elizabeth (Clark) Stewart, natives of Pennsylvania and descended from prominent Scotch and American families, respectively. They are now deceased. When Alexander was five years of age he went with his parents to Illinois, and later to Iowa, where he finished his education in the Brighton high school. Following that, he taught for a term and then clerked in a general store for a time. After that he was engaged in mining in California for seven years. Then he turned his attention to railroading, and for a series of years was clerk in the road master's office on different lines in Kansas, Missouri, Colorado, Arkansas, and Wyoming. Also he had charge of sections at different times. He came to Oregon in 1893, and accepted a position as section foreman at Mosier. Three years were spent thus, and then Mr. Stewart bought the store which he is now operating. R. A. Powers was the former owner. He has shown himself an enterprising and competent business man and is doing well.

At Mosier, in 1898, Mr. Stewart married Miss Rachel Roland, nee Warren, a native of Portland, Oregon. Mr. Stewart has two brother's and two sisters, James, Joseph L., Mrs. Lizzie Arnold, and Hannah. No children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Stewart, but by her former husband Mrs. Stewart has three: Ira W. Roland, the owner of the ferry at White Salmon; William L., a farmer near by; and Myra, the wife of Orrin Depee. Mr. Stewart is a member of the A. F. & A. M., the I. O. O. F. and the M. W. A. He is a Republican and is frequently a delegate to the conventions. He is clerk of the school board, and was postmaster for four years. Mrs. Stewart now holds that office.

BENJAMIN F. BELIEU, a prominent contractor and builder in Hood River, Oregon, was born in Grundy county, Missouri, on July 26, 1851. His father, Jesse Belieu, was a native of Tennessee and his father, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Massachusetts. That venerable gentleman's father came from France and the name was originally Ballou and many of the family still retain that spelling. Some of the Ballou's of Boston were well known publishers. Many of the family are preachers and professional men and our subject's grandfather and three of his father's brothers were preachers. The father died in 1862, in Grundy county, Missouri. Our subject's grandfather was sheriff fourteen years in Tennessee, then resigned that office and commenced preaching. When eleven years of age, Mr. Belieu was left an orphan and soon thereafter came to Iowa and remained until twenty years of age, receiving his education in the public schools. In 1877, he went to California and a year later to Oregon where he did saw milling at Salem. He was employed in various other portions of the state and in 1883, landed in Hood River and was occupied with sawmilling at Lost Lake for three years. Then he took up carpenter work and wrought for the O. R. & N. building tanks and cars for several years. After that, he was occupied in Portland in general building and contract work and in 1899, came to Hood River and built a home. He traded the same for a twenty acre fruit farm. Then bought more land and built another home. He has completed many residences here and with S. W. Arnold, built the Knights of Pythias hall.

On August 27, 1871, Mr. Belieu married Miss Sarah I. Cox, a native of Decatur county, Iowa, where the wedding occurred. Her parents, Martin A. and Eliza (Sutherland) Cox, were natives of Indiana, her father springing from a Tennessee family and her mother from an old southern family. Mr. Belieu has three full brothers, William H., Arch, and Richard R. and one half brother, John H. Drinkard, and one sister, Mrs. Rachel Starkey. He also had one brother, Columbus Belieu, and one half brother, A. Drinkard, who died in the Civil war. Mr. Belieu is a member of the K. P. and the Order of Washington. He and his wife have four children, Nancy, wife of John Nasmythe; Albert M., Perry G., and Eva B.

Mrs. Belieu is a member of the Seventh Day Adventist church. Mr. Belieu is a relative of the Gilliams of eastern Oregon. One of his uncles, Leander Belieu, came to Oregon in 1843, crossing the plains with ox teams. Michael Belieu came in 1845, James, two years later, and John in 1864. Michael Belieu took the first stock of goods south of Oregon City in what is now Polk county and opened a store there in 1849. Eliza Belieu, our subject's grandfather's sister, was the mother of President Garfield.

LARKIN LAMB is one of the pioneers of Wasco county. At present, he resides in Mosier. He recently sold a fine farm that was taken as a homestead many years ago. He was born in Iowa, on September 30, 1841 and his parents, William and Fanny (Garr) Lamb, were natives of Virginia. The father's father was born in Scotland and his mother in Virginia. The Garr family have been written up and found to extend back for many years. John C. of Jacksonville, Florida, has been compiling their history which is very interesting. Lorenz G. came to America on the ship Royal Judith when sixteen, sailing from Dinkels Buehl, Bavaria over two hundred years ago. He settled in Virginia and from him descended the Garr family of America. They spell their name, Gar, Gaar and Garr. Many of the family fought in the various Indian wars of colonial days, in the Revolution, in the War of 1812, and in the Civil war. Through the middle west and the south, they are prominent in the manufacturing circles and so forth and are a very thrifty and enterprising family. The men are usually all large in stature and the women especially thrifty housewives. Our subject was raised and educated in Iowa and when twenty-two, came to Wasco county, landing at The Dalles, on October 16, 1864. Since then, he has given his attention to farming in this part of the country. In 1879, he homesteaded the place which he just sold. Mr. Lamb is a carpenter and works at his trade some, but is practically retired now. At The Dalles, in 1869, Mr. Lamb married Mary J. Marsh, who was born in the vicinity of The Dalles. Her parents are Josiah and Bell Marsh, natives of Tennessee. They crossed the plains with ox teams in 1850 and settled near The Dalles. Sometime since, Mr. and Mrs. Lamb secured a divorce and she now resides at Colfax, Washington. Mr. Lamb has three brothers, Wallace, Smith and Jackson and four sisters, Katherine, Mrs. Martha Cooper, Mrs. Rosanna Newcomer, and Mrs. Elizabeth Young. To Mr. and Mrs. Lamb two children have been born, Lizzie, the wife of Andrew J. Knight at Wardner, Idaho and Katie, wife of George W. Millson, of Kalispel, Montana.

Mr. Lamb is a member of the M. W. A. and a strong Democrat. For the past ten years, he has always been in the conventions yet never aspires to office himself. By way of reminiscence, it is interesting to note that Mr. Lamb's paternal grandfather was one of Daniel Boone's party of Scotch Highlanders that were ambushed by the Indians in Kentucky when Daniel Boone lost two sons.

WILLIAM E. WALTHER, of the enterprising and progressive firm of Sexton & Walther, dealers in hardware, farming implements, wagons, carriages, etc., at The Dalles, was born in Saxony, Germany, January 28, 1862, the son of Gustav and Wilhelmina (Traetner), natives of Germany. The mother died in San Diego, California, in 1894; the father is now engaged in the hotel business in Redding, California.

In May, 1881, accompanied by his brother, Adolph, our subject came to the United States, locating at Oshkosh, Wisconsin, where he was employed in a trunk factory. One year later the brothers were joined by their parents, and in the spring of 1885 the entire family migrated to San Diego, California. Our subject, his father and two brothers each purchased ten acres of wild land fifteen miles from San Diego, and planted vineyards. There Mr. Walther remained until the spring of 1888, when he came to The Dalles, following a short visit east. Ten years he was in the employment of Mays & Crowe, as manager and buyer, and his abilities won deserved recognition, not only from his employer, but from all with whom he was thrown in business relations. In 1901 Mr. Walther engaged in his present business in partnership with Felix C. Sexton. They occupy a substantial and commodious building on the corner of East Second and Jefferson streets, utilizing a space 100x150 feet square, including their plumbing, locksmithing, gun and tin shop. They do an extensive business in dynamite, blasting powders, etc., and are agents for the California Powder Works, Mitchell & Lewis Company, Racine, Wisconsin, wagons, Champion harvesting machinery, J. I. Case farming implements, Hancock disk plows, Mitchell, Lewis & Staver & Company, Portland, buggies and spring wagons, and Flint & Walling windmills. Commencing with a limited capital the firm has increased to large proportions, employing not less than fourteen people, and doing an approximate business annually of $100,000.

At Oshkosh, Wisconsin, in September, 1883, Mr. Walther was united in marriage to Susan A. Heitz, born in New York state, the daughter of Gregory and Carolina (Oldfield) Heitz. The father, deceased, was a native of Germany; the mother of Rome, New York. Her parents were New Englanders, and she now resides at Wapinitia. Our subject has two brothers, Adolph with Mays & Crowe, and Theodore, at El Cajon, California, employed on the vineyards which the brothers purchased in 1883. He now has thirty acres in grapes and peaches. Mrs. Walther has two brothers and two sisters; Gregor J., of Spokane, Washington; George, with his mother at Wapinitia; Aulousia, wife of M. Speischinger, of The Dalles, a farmer; and Tinney, married to B. Tapp, a farmer residing near Susanville, Oregon.

Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Walther; Harry E., aged sixteen; May Z., aged fourteen; and Gertrude, eleven years of age. Mr. Walther is a member of Friendship Lodge No. 9, K. of P., of which he has been master of exchequer for the past twelve years; Cascade Lodge No. 303, B. P. O. E.; and the W. O. W. He and his estimable wife are members of the Rathbone Sisters, of which she is mistress of finance. Our subject is a Republican and has, although not persistently active, been a member of county conventions. He at present carries life insurance to the amount of $22,000; $10,000 of which is co-partnership insurance.

JOSHUA T. ADKISSON has shown what a man can do in Wasco county, by taking hold with his hands and attending strictly to business. He came here with only ten dollars and five horses, having a wife and five children to support. He immediately rented land of J. A. Gulliford, who is mentioned in this work, and commenced the good work of carving out for himself a home and a fortune. The place which he first rented, he still rents, which shows his continuity. During the intervening years, he has purchased two farms, one of four hundred and fifty-three acres, which lies about one mile southeast from Boyd, and is the family home, and another of two hundred and twenty-three acres. This shows that Mr. Adkisson has achieved the best of success in his labors. He raises about three hundred acres of wheat annually, and has bred and handled a great many horses. Recently he has commenced raising mules and he finds a ready sale for all his animals in this county, especially, as he raises the choicest that are to be found here. After a review of these facts, it is needless to say that Mr. Adkisson is a man of enterprise, energy, wisdom, and industry. He has shown it well in the successes he has achieved.

Joshua T. Adkisson was born in Franklin county, Virginia, on May 10, 1861, when the dark clouds of the Rebellion were settling in their horror on the land. His father, Thomas Adkisson, was a native of the same place, as were also his parents, the grandparents of our subject. The great-grandfather of our subject was one of the earliest pioneers in the Virginia wilds and his descendants were large planters there. They lived and died in the old Virginia colony. The mother of Joshua T. was Cynthia E. (Richardson) Adkisson. She was also born in Virginia and her parents and grandparents were natives of that colony. The original Richardson family was prominent in colonial affairs and fought in the early wars including the Revolution and that of 1812. Our subject's father fought in the Confederate army, and died during the war. His mother died in Davies county, Missouri, in 1896. She married Mr. Faulkner when our subject was twenty-one. Joshua was reared and educated principally in Davies county, Missouri. Owing to poor health, he came to Oregon in 1882 and located a claim in Washington county, Oregon, where he spent twelve years in trying to clear land, which was heavily timbered. He had thirty-five acres clear in that time and finally closing out he got to The Dalles on the boat with five head of horses and the ten dollars mentioned. Since then, he has done well, as we have outlined above.

In Davies county, Missouri, on August 16, 1882, Mr. Adkisson married Martha J. Snyder, the daughter of Samuel C. Snyder, a native of Indiana and of German ancestry. He married Miss Nancy Stevens. Mr. Adkisson has two brothers, Reuben and Eli, and one sister, Mrs. Mary A. Wise. His wife has the following named sisters: Mrs. Frances Ritchardson, Mrs. Adeline Joy, Mrs. Alice Elliott, Mrs. Ella Horner, Mrs. Belle Bauer, and Mrs. Susan Coarth. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Adkisson: Willard E., Elwood, Raymond, Alva, Flossie A., the wife of Gus Underhill, living near our subject; Elsie and Agnes, at home. Mr. Adkisson is a member of the W. W., and is a strong Republican. For twenty years he has been a school director and is zealous in labors for educational advancement. He and his wife belong to the United Brethren church and are liberal supporters of the faith.

JOSEPH H. McCOY, a native of the Occident, is one of Wasco county's enterprising young farmers and stockmen. He resides near Boyd, adjoining the old McCoy estate, which is owned by his mother. In fact, his farm is a part of the original estate. He is enterprising, energetic and wide awake, is well known through this part of the country and is a man whose actions and achievements indicate good ability. He was born in Tulare county, California, on April 15, 1871, the son of Henson and Clarissa (Rusher) McCoy, who are named elsewhere in this volume. The district schools of Tulare county furnished the educational training of our subject then he came with the family to Wasco county where he continued his studies in the public schools. He remained with his parents until the death of his father, being occupied on the farm and in handling stock. In the latter business, he became especially skillful in breaking and taming wild horses both for riding and driving, and he has never met the animal yet which he has not been able to subdue to quietness and docility.

At The Dalles, on January 28, 1895, Mr. McCoy married Miss Lillian M. Phipps, who was born in Ballston, Oregon, on October 28, 1877. Her father, John S. Phipps, was a native of Missouri, where also his parents were born. He came from an old American family and his mother was a Boone, related to Daniel Boone. He crossed the plains with ox teams with his parents in 1855 and now lives with his family near Boyd postoffice. Mrs. McCoy's mother, Amanda (Davidson) Phipps, was born in Polk county, Oregon. Her father was a native of Tennessee and her mother of Indiana. Mrs. McCoy has one brother, Clarence, and three sisters, Inez M., Lois B. and Wanda S. Her brother is only four years of age. To Mr. and Mrs. McCoy four children have been born: Frances, aged nine; Ernest, aged seven; Dora, aged four; and Joseph, thirteen months old. Mr. McCoy is serving his second term as president of the Utopian Literary Society, is deputy stock inspector of Wasco county, and is an active man in political matters and school affairs. For three years he was a member of Company C, of the Oregon National Guards, under Captain Crisman. He is a member of the M. W. A., and has filled all the chairs.

JOHN H. STIRNWEIS is one of the substantial and thrifty farmers in the vicinity of Boyd. He was born in Germany on October 20, 1837, the son of Frederick and Kunigunda (Walters) Stirnweis, both natives of Germany. The father came to the United States in 1851, settling first in Baltimore where he remained until 1855, then he went to Westminster in that state and there he remained until the time of his death in 1859. He practically retired from business after coming to the United States having made a goodly competence before. The mother died in Baltimore, in 1863. Our subject learned the shoemaker trade in Baltimore, after having received a good education, and worked at the same for many years. On April 20, 1863, he came via Nicaragua to San Francisco, and in various places in California worked at his trade, finally settling in Tulare county. There he bought land and raised sheep for twenty years. On January 1, 1886, he landed in The Dalles and shortly after bought two hundred and forty acres of land where he resides at present near Boyd. He is giving his attention to general farming, and raises horses, cattle and hogs. He is thrifty, prosperous and a leading farmer.

On January 4, 1870, at the residence of the bride's parents, in Tulare county, California, Mr. Stirnweis married Miss Mary A. McCoy, who was born in Missouri, on April 24, 1854, the daughter of Henson and Clarissa (Rusher) McCoy, who are mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mr. Stirnweis has no brothers and two sisters, Mrs. Margaret Bachman, a widow, and Mrs. Mary Gabriel. To Mr. and Mrs. Stirnweis the following named children have been born: William, who resides on the farm two miles distant from the home place; George, at Nansene postoffice; Washington, at home; Omer, a school boy; Annie, the wife of Frank Hathaway, of Portland; Maggie, the wife of James Underhill, in Tygh valley; Hattie, the wife of Marshall Poppleton, in Portland.

Mr. Stirnweis is a member of the A. O. U. W. and also belongs to the Lutheran church. Politically, he is a Democrat and always takes a lively interest in the affairs of the county and state. He has been director in district number thirty-one since coming here and is a zealous advocate of good schools.

JOHN S. PHIPPS resides on Center Ridge eight miles southeast from Boyd, where he owns a half section of land, two-thirds of which are cropped. He was born in Missouri, on August 18, 1851, the son of William and Sarah (Boone) Phipps, natives of Indiana and Missouri, respectively. The father's parents were also born in Indiana and died when he was a small child. They were of Scotch-English extraction. The mother's parents were born in Missouri. Her grandfather was a brother of Daniel Boone. Our subject's parents now live in Yakima county, Washington. The father is aged nearly eighty and the mother is past seventy. They crossed the plains to Oregon in 1853 settling on a donation claim in Washington county, where they remained sixteen years, then journeyed to Yamhill county and eight years later went thence to Polk county. John S. was educated in the various places where the family lived during his youth and when twenty-two started out in life for himself. He first rented land and about 1879, went to Klickitat county, Washington and spent four years near Bickleton, then we find him teaming in Portland for ten months after which he was in Polk county for two years. Then he came to the east side of the mountains and filed on the claim where he now lives and also purchased railroad land. Since then, he has given his time and attention to the improvement and cultivation of this place and he has a good farm which pays good annual dividends.

On January 1, 1877 in Polk county, Mr. Phipps married Miss Arminda Davidson, the daughter of Andrew and Rachel (Goodrich) Davidson. Her marriage occurred near Ballston, Oregon. She was born in Polk county on November 24, 1858. The father and his parents were born in Tennessee from an old colonial family of Scotch-Irish ancestry. He died in 1884. The mother was born in Indiana and died in August, 1901. Both were on the old Polk county donation claim at the time of their death. They crossed the plains with ox teams in 1846 and settled on the donation claim where they remained the balance of their lives. The trip was fraught with great hardship and suffering. At the point where the Applegate cut off branched from the old road, one-half of the train took that and the balance came on the usual route. Mrs. Phipp's grandfather came to Oregon in 1844 and when word was brought him that his son-in-law and family would come by the Applegate cut off, he immediately with all speed fitted out a supply train to meet them as he well knew what they would have to encounter. Hurrying to the rescue, he arrived just in time as they were nearly starved to death and sick besides. Their cattle were dead and he was obliged to leave the wagons and all their luggage. He finally transferred them to the valley and they arrived in Dayton in a condition well expressed by the homely phrase "more dead than alive." To add to the trouble, the mother had broken her arm and her husband was down with mountain fever and two small children were to be cared for. However, they were nursed back to health in the Willamette valley and there lived for many years. Mr. Phipps has one brother, Ellis, and five sisters, Mrs. Eliza Goldie, Mrs. Annie McLean, Mrs. Wilmina Hayden, Mrs. Mary Godaberg, deceased and Cassandra, who died when fifteen years of age.

Mr. Phipps is a good active Democrat and has been school director for twelve years. To our subject and his wife, the following children have been born, Lillian, Inez, Blanche, Wanda, and Clarence.

AUGUST BUCHLER, proprietor of the Columbia Brewery, The Dalles, Oregon, a popular and influential citizen of Wasco county, was born in the Canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, August 8, 1841, the son of Anton and Francisca (Neff) Buchler. They were, also, natives of Switzerland, where the father died in 1853, the mother in 1871. For many years Anton Buchler was proprietor of a summer resort which was freely patronized by tourists and others.

Our subject was sixteen years of age when he left school, and entered a wholesale grocery and wine house for the purpose of thoroughly learning the business. Later he traveled for the same firm, successfully selling goods in Switzerland, Germany, Italy, Sicily and France. It was in 1864 that he came to the United States, going directly to Montana, where for seven years he was engaged in mining. In November, 1871, he migrated to Portland, Oregon, and for seven more years was in the employment of the Weinhardt brewery. He arrived at The Dalles April 16, 1877, where he purchased a brewery and eleven and one-half lots from Emil Schanno, which he has since prosperously conducted. Throughout the counties adjacent to Wasco his beer is freely sold, and Mr. Buchler employs from five to seven men in its manufacture.

He was united in marriage, October 8, 1875, at Portland, Oregon, to Sarah Buckhalter, a native of Pennsylvania, the daughter of Stephen and Susan (Jacoby) Buckhalter, both of whom were born in the Keystone State, and descendants, each, of old Dutch families. The paternal great-grandfather of our subject's wife came from Switzerland. Stephen Buckhalter died in Hillsboro, Oregon, November 26, 1903. His widow still lives at Hillsboro, where she came with her husband in 1874. Mr. Buchler has one brother and two sisters: Albert, a retired merchant, passing the sunset of life amid the picturesque scenes of Switzerland; Paulina, widow of Jacob Breitenmoser, of Switzerland; and Amanda, wife of Edward Grass, also of Switzerland. Mr. and Mrs. Buchler have seven children: Dollie, wife of Charles Tibbetts in the dairy business, Monterey, California; Bertha, married to Ernest Gerichten, bookkeeper in our subject's brewery; Rosie, wife of James Shim, of Baker City, Oregon; Mamie, wife of Claude Martin, a miller in The Dalles; and Herbert, Adolph and Jennie, school children. Mr. Buchler affiliates with the B. P. O. E., and the A. O. U. W. He is, politically, independent, and for many years was water commissioner of The Dalles. Mrs. Buchler has two brothers and three sisters.

JOHN L. HENDERSON, who came to Hood River with a capital of two hundred and fifty dollars, has property now valued at over twenty-five thousand dollars. He is a prominent citizen, an attorney at law and also a practical surveyor. He was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on September 11, 1851. His father, John Henderson, was a native of Indiana and his father, also John Henderson, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Scotland and came to the United States when young, settling finally in Mississippi. The grandfather was admitted to the practice of law in Cincinnati. He was prominent in state and national affairs, being the only Whig ever elected to the United States senate from Mississippi, and was a colleague with Webster, Clay and Calhoun in the senate, receiving from Daniel Webster the commendation of being the best land lawyer in the United States. In 1850, he was impeached for assisting in a filibustering scheme, known as the "Lopez Expedition," connected with Cuba's struggles. The officers of that expedition had their headquarters in his office in New Orleans. He defended himself in the senatorial trial and was acquitted. At one time, he took several Spanish claims against the United States for a large tract of land, of over twenty miles frontage on the Gulf of Mexico and gained his case after seventeen years of fighting. He received as fee, a portion of the land, part of which he sold later for one hundred thousand dollars. His son, our subject's father, was also an attorney at law and one of the principal leaders of the Republican party in New Orleans right after the war. He was shot in a riot there, in July, 1866, and died soon after. Our subject's mother, Catherine Leland, was born in Boston and commenced teaching school when fifteen years of age and taught until seventy-five, thus spending sixty years in that worthy work. She is now eighty-six, being born in 1818, and has traveled all over the civilized world and spent three years abroad, after being seventy years of age. She is a linguist of rare ability and speaks French, Spanish, Italian and German, besides her native tongue and is thoroughly educated. For many years, she fitted students for Cornell University and was known as one of the best educators of the day. Her home is at Hood River but she spends much time in the east. Our subject's father was conscripted in the confederate army, but deserted at the first opportunity and joined the union army, fighting under General Banks.

John L. first attended school at North Fork, Arkansas and when six years of age, went to Boston, with his mother, where he attended six months in a private institution. Later, he received instruction in a private school his mother conducted in Mississippi then studied in the Jesuit college, and high school in New Orleans. Afterward, he took a course in a military school at Brattleboro, Vermont and until 1869, in Cornell University. He came west during his sophomore year and finally, on August 4, 1870, arrived in Portland. For eight years he was teaching in the Willamette valley, holding the principalship of several schools. Later, he taught in a military academy in Oakland, California. Then he was principal of the public schools in Helsingborg and Olympia, Washington for two and one years respectively, and was head of the Olympia collegiate institute in the same city for six years. Next we find him in charge of the Chehalis Indian reservation, after which he took up real estate and abstract business in Olympia and made considerable money. In January, 1891, Mr. Henderson went to Bay St. Louis, Mississippi, in the same line of business and was there admitted to the practice of law, which he has followed since. In February, 1898, he opened an office in Hood River and since that time has continued here in the practice of his profession. Up to the time of the Spanish war, Mr. Henderson was a staunch Democrat but is now a Republican, having imbibed the doctrines of expansion from his grandfather, Senator Henderson. He holds a prominent position in politics in his county and is a very active and influential man.

In 1873, Mr. Henderson married Miss Harriett E. Humphrey, at Harrisburg, Oregon, her native place. Her father, Alfred Humphrey, a native of Ohio and a graduate of Oberlin College, crossed the plains in 1851. Mr. Humphrey married Miss Polly Loomis, a native of New York, and descended from an old and respected family of noted ancestors. Mr. Henderson celebrated his second marriage, July 29, 1897. Marian I. Grimes, a native of Rapides Parish, Louisiana, then becoming his bride. The father, John C. Grimes, came from an old Scotch family, the name being originally called Graeme. He married Mary White, a native of Louisiana and of a very prominent southern family. Mr. Henderson has one brother, Louis F. Henderson, for ten years a professor in the state university at Moscow, Idaho. Mr. Henderson has the following named children: Leland, at New Orleans, Louisiana, in the real estate business; Louis A., a student at the state university at Eugene, Oregon; Edwin A., at Hood River, Oregon; Sidney E., in the high school at Olympia; and Mrs. Faith F. Lott. To the second marriage two children have been born, Lynn R. and William E., aged about six and two years, respectively.

Mr. Henderson is a member of the I. O. O. F., of the Encampment and the K. P. He has passed through nearly all the chairs in these orders and has frequently been a delegate to the grand lodge. Mrs. Henderson is a member of the Congregational church.

They are respected people, whose kindly and genial ways have won the admiration and esteem of all who have had the pleasure of their acquaintance. Mr. Henderson has won a splendid success during his interesting career and has fully merited the many encomiums which have been generously bestowed upon him.

We desire to state in this connection that Mr. Henderson is a man of great physical endurance and powers. Among other feats he has performed, we would mention that of swimming, in which art, he is very expert and skillful. He has made many long and difficult tests, and one was to swim from Cat Island lighthouse to Bay Saint Louis, in the Gulf of Mexico, and another was to swim from Hood River to Cascade Locks. The former was a distance of sixteen miles and the latter was a stretch of twenty-two miles.

DENNIS R. McCOY is a well known member of the McCoy family which has been prominent in Wasco county for many years. He was born in Tulare county, California, on March 31, 1873, the son of Henson and Clarissa (Rusher) McCoy, who are mentioned elsewhere in this work. He remained with his parents during his youthful days and was educated in the public schools. In 1896, he went to The Dalles and learned the barber trade from his brother, Thomas, who was then running the O. K. shop, the leading tonsorial parlors in The Dalles. His brother, William, who is now a prominent physician in Salt Lake City, had first opened this shop. After one year there, our subject went to Heppner, then to Portland, Salem and other places. After this, he spent two years prospecting in British Columbia and in the fall of 1901, returned to Wasco county and leased the home place from his mother, where he is at the present time. He has shown himself an industrious and thrifty farmer and is one of the substantial men of the community. In political matters, Mr. McCoy has been very prominent and is deeply interested in the welfare and success of his party. He is frequently at the county conventions, is clerk of the school board, and supports at all times the Democratic ticket. For three years he was a member of Company C, of the Oregon National Guards under Captain Crisman and is now constable of his precinct, which is Nansene, and he is serving his second term.

On October 6, 1904, Mr. McCoy married Miss Myrtle Markham, the daughter of James F. and Minnie (Page) Markham, who are mentioned elsewhere in this work.

JOHN H. KOBERG is one of Hood River's able business men and has achieved a first class success here in various enterprises. At the present time he is to be found in the office of the Hood River Electric Light, Power and Water Company, where he holds the position of manager. He is efficient and reliable and has the confidence and esteem of all. His birth occurred in Schleswig Holstein, Germany, on August 26, 1865. His father and mother were natives of the same section and are living there now retired. The father was an engineer and machinist. Our subject received a good normal school education and has been a close reader since. He learned the dry goods business and followed it seven years in his country. Then, it being 1887, he came to the United States and joined his uncle, Hans Lage, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work. He was unable to speak a word of English but soon secured a job in a sawmill, but owing to its burning, he lost all his wages. Then he engaged with Tackman & Company, grocers at The Dalles and one year later went to the redwood country of California. Returning thence to Oregon he was car inspector for the O. R. & N. at Albina until 1892, when he went to Walla Walla and took charge of a wrecking crew for this company. In 1895, he came thence to Hood River and purchased the old Stanley estate about two miles east from town. It consists of one hundred and eighty acres and he cultivates about thirty acres, raising mostly alfalfa and some corn. In addition, Mr. Koberg operates a small dairy and handles a large hennery, having about five hundred of these fowls. It is the largest establishment of its kind in the county. On January 1, 1904, Mr. Koberg accepted his present position and oversees his estate in addition to this work.

On March 21, 1894, Mr. Koberg married Miss Emma Lage, the wedding occurring in Hood River. Mrs. Koberg was born in Iowa and is the daughter of Hans and Lena (Hoek) Lage, who are mentioned in this work. Our subject has two brothers, William and Christian and two sisters, Tina Dolfs and Clara Ehmsen. JAMES F. MARKHAM, who resides about seven miles southwest from Dufur in Rail hollow, was born in Missouri, on January 24, 1844. His father, Thomas B. Markham, was born in Virginia, in 1800 and his parents were also natives of the colonies. His father fought in the Black Hawk war and one of the progenitors of the family was sent to Pennsylvania by William Penn. The Markham family is very large and well scattered. Thomas B. died on April 1, 1855. He was a Methodist preacher of note and a pioneer in Missouri. He married Sarah Jones, a native of Kentucky, who died October 9, 1875. Our subject was raised in Missouri until 1857, when the family moved to Kansas and in the latter place, he completed his education in the public schools. In 1863, he enlisted in Company I, Fifteenth Kansas Cavalry under Captain S. W. Greer and Colonel C. R. Jamison and served a little over two years, mostly in scouting and provost duty. Afterward he returned to the farm and in the spring of 1866, moved to Missouri, where he spent thirteen years. After his mother's death in 1875, he returned to Kansas with his family and followed the dairying business for a short time after which he went back to Missouri and in December, 1882, came to Oregon. He has owned several places, at Prineville, at Mitchell and finally in 1895, filed on the homestead where he now resides. He has purchased a quarter section additional and does diversified farming.

On October 27, 1870, at Pleasant Hill, Missouri, Mr. Markham married Miss Minnie Page, who was born in Marion, Ohio, on August 18, 1845. Her parents were Jay and Mary (Young) Page, natives of Virginia and Ohio, respectively. The father's parents were pioneers to Marion county, Ohio when he was an infant. He died in 1898 in Bates county, Missouri. The mother died at Pleasant Hill, Missouri, on October 1, 1875. Mr. Markham has two brothers, John S. and Thomas F. and one sister, Mrs. Margaret V. Colville. Mrs. Markham has two brothers, Jacob and John. Five children have been born to our subject and his wife: Bernard P., who has a farm adjoining his father; Minnie C., wife of Charles F. Douglas, a farmer near Boyd; Myrtle A., a teacher in Wasco county; Teresa G. and Harriet A. both at home. Mr. Markham is a staunch Republican.

ROSWELL SHELLEY is an enterprising merchant and fruit raiser in the Odell district, seven miles out from Hood River on the east side. He was born in Jefferson county, Iowa, on September 26, 1846, the son of Michael and Sena (Mays) Shelley, natives of Kentucky and Tennessee, respectively. The father's ancestors came from Holland and the mother was from a prominent southern family. In 1848, the father with his family and our subject's grandparents started in early spring from Monmouth, Illinois, for the Pacific coast, using ox teams and milch cows. At the Platte river the grandfather was stricken with cholera and he was buried on the dreary plains. After great hardship and suffering, besides much trouble with the hostile savages, they arrived in Oregon City in September. The father's uncle, Elijah Bristow, was at Pleasant Hill, having settled there in 1845, and thither the family went. That was the home, the father having taken a donation claim, until 1857, when he came to Monmouth and assisted to found the Christian College, now the state normal. The mother died there in 1859. Then the old place was sold and a farm bought near Independence, which the father sold in 1870, to accompany our subject to Antelope where they started a stock ranch. Two years later he sold to this son and returned to the valley west of the mountains. He died in Yamhill county, in 1894, aged eighty. He was a good and highly respected man and had done much for the cause of education and for the church. In 1874, our subject sold his stock and removed back to Independence and entered the employ of Isaac Van Duyn, a general merchant. Later he was elected county clerk on the Republican ticket, the first one on that ticket in twenty-four years. Following his service, Mr. Shelley bought a third interest in the mercantile establishment where he had worked and continued there until 1886. Then he sold to his partners and for five years was variously employed. In 1897, he was appointed receiver of the land office in Sitka, Alaska, but after two years, he was so dissatisfied with the climate and the lonesomeness that he resigned. He promoted some enterprises until 1902, when he came to Hood River to visit his brother, and being taken with the country, he located where we find him now. With his son, he owns twenty acres of land near by and this is being put into fruit. Mr. Shelley is also doing a real estate business.

At Independence, in 1878, Mr. Shelley married Miss Mary L., daughter of James Tatum, and a native of Jackson county, Oregon. The father was born in Missouri and came to Oregon in 1850. He married Miss Berry. Mrs. Shelley died in 1891, August 26, at Independence. On September 24, 1902, Mr. Shelley married Mrs. Rose McCoy, nee Sherrieb, and a native of Germany. Sommerville, Lodema Huston, Henry, deceased, Ransom, deceased, and Martha, deceased. In 1839 or 1840, the father came to the United States with his family and settled in New York city, where he died in 1897. He was engaged in the furniture business many years. The mother died in Ireland.

Our subject passed through the graded schools of New York, and later was clerk in his father's store until May 20, 1859, when he came west, passing the first four years in California, mining on the south fork of Scott's River, Siskiyou county. For several years he was constable of South Township, and also served as deputy foreign tax collector under M. Sleeper. In February, 1863, he passed through The Dalles en route for Placerville, Idaho. December 7, 1863, he returned to The Dalles where he has since resided. Following a few days' work on the Cascade railroad he was connected with the Umattilla hotel several months, and then engaged in draying, which business he conducted profitably for five years, disposing of the same to Bulger Brothers. In 1876 Mr. Crossen was elected sheriff of Wasco county, on the Democratic ticket, by a majority of one hundred and eight. He was re-elected in 1878 by a majority of three hundred. While he was in office the Klamath Indian outbreak occurred. Mr. Crossen retired from office in 1880, and engaged in the furniture business at The Dalles two years, when he disposed of the same and followed the occupation of an auctioneer. In 1880 he was re-elected sheriff, serving two years, and then he received the appointment of postmaster of The Dalles, by President Cleveland. He served four years, and was elected county clerk, serving two terms. Mr. Crossen was eighteen months in the grocery business, and when he disposed of the same he was appointed superintendent of the city water works which position he still efficiently fills. JEREMIAH M. PATTERSON, the efficient and popular postmaster of The Dalles, Wasco county, was born in Guernsey county, Ohio, November 26, 1845, the son of John and Eliza (Glenn) Patterson, the father a native of Ohio and the mother of Pennsylvania. John Patterson died in Salem, Oregon, in 1873, and the mother in 1880.

In the graded schools of Ohio, most excellent institutions, our subject received a good business education. He was a patriotic youth, and, fully realizing the duty owed to his country, he enlisted before he had reached the age of sixteen years, in Company A., Fifteenth Ohio Infantry, and served gallantly three years during the progress of the Civil war. He participated in the heavy battles of Shiloh, Pittsburgh Landing, Corinth, Stone River, Perryville, Chickamauga and many other minor engagements and skirmishes. Mr. Patterson was in the signal service, during the latter portion of his enlistment, and was, also, telegraph operator. At the breaking out of the war he had just learned telegraphy, with the valuable assistance of his father, who had charge of the railway station at New Concord, Ohio. Following his discharge he went home on a visit and then entered the government employment in the capacity of a telegraph operator, in which he continued until May, 1865. Although not yet sixteen years of age at the time of his enlistment young Patterson carried a musket and saw active service during the first eighteen months. Fortunately he was not wounded, with the exception of a slight scratch on the finger. He emerged from the war none the worse for his hardships and exposures, and in perfect health. The family removed to Iowa where our subject engaged in the mercantile business with his father in Des Moines, one year, and then they disposed of the property and our subject found employment with the Northwestern Railway Company until 1868, as telegrapher. January 9, 1869, he left New York for Oregon via the isthmus, whither he had been preceded by his father a short time previous. Our subject and the rest of the family arrived at Salem, Oregon, February 11, 1869. He lived there sixteen years. During two years Mr. Patterson was assistant postmaster, and the following ten years he was engaged in the real estate business. He conducted a machine shop and foundry three years, was burned out and the following year again became assistant postmaster. In April, 1885, he went to the Warm Springs Indian Agency in the capacity of clerk, remained one year and then came to The Dalles to become bookkeeper for A. M. Williams and Company, with whom he remained eight years. He then became cashier of the First National Bank, at The Dalles, during a period of three years, and afterward was engaged in various enterprises until 1900 when he received the appointment of postmaster of The Dalles. During his incumbency the system of free delivery has been installed, and the office is well equipped with everything necessary for a proper and convenient conduct of the business, including a Doremus cancelling machine and other labor saving devices. The office is served by an assistant postmaster, two carriers, for city work, two clerks, and one rural delivery carrier.

December 18, 1872, at Salem, Oregon, Mr. Patterson was married to Blanche Gray, born in Iowa, who came to Oregon via the isthmus in 1865. She is the daughter of George W. and Minerva (Berry) Gray, the father a native of Pennsylvania, the mother of Iowa. George W. Gray died in August, 1900, and his wife in December, 1903, at Salem. Mrs. Patterson has three brothers and two sisters living: William T. and George B., engaged in the hardware business at Seattle; Charles A., a contractor, living at Salem; Mrs. G. G. Lownsdale, of Portland; and Jennie G. Kyle, of Salem. Mr. and Mrs. Patterson have four children: Edward G., a merchant at Waterville, Washington; Beulah G., Prudence M., and William G., living at home. Our subject is a member of J. W. Nesmith Post G. A. R., at The Dalles, and for the past five years he has been commander. He also belongs to the W. O. W., and Order of Washington. He and his wife are members of the Congregational church. He is a Republican and has frequently been delegate to county conventions, and was two terms chairman of central committee, Wasco county. While in the real estate business in Salem he served two terms as city recorder.

JESSE W. BLAKENEY, engaged in the transfer and draying business, at The Dalles, Wasco county, was born at Georgetown, Danville county, Illinois, November 21, 1850, the son of John W. and Nancy J. (Phelps) Blakeney, the father a native of Kentucky; the mother of Illinois. John W. Blakeney died at The Dalles, in 1900. The mother at present resides twelve miles from The Dalles, with her daughter, Mrs. Emma J. McClure. The parents of our subject crossed the plains to Oregon in 1852. Starting from Georgetown, Illinois, they were nine months on the road, and though amply provisioned at the inception of their long journey they ran short of food before gaining their destination, through dividing with others less fortunate. They paid as high as one dollar apiece for biscuits with which to feed our subject and the other children. Following great hardships they arrived in the Cowlitz country, where the father of our subject filed on a donation claim. In 1862 they came to The Dalles, bringing their furniture and household effects and twenty-five head of cattle on a scow, from the Cowlitz river, to the Lower Cascades. Above the Cascades, they took a river steamer to The Dalles. Our subject had attended school three months in the Cowlitz country, and when he came to The Dalles he continued his studies in the public schools. His first employment was driving a yoke of oxen in the brick yards. He, also, went to North Yakima and worked in the hay fields. Following this he was engaged in a variety of employments, and for twelve years he was in the shops of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company and for six years on the boats. He began teaming in The Dalles in 1889 and has continued it ever since.

In March, 1883, at The Dalles, he was married to Ianthe A. Jones, born in Lane county, Oregon. She died fifteen months later. His second marriage took place at Antelope, Wasco county, when he was united to Laura F. Smith, born in California. Her father, Milton Smith, is a native of Pennsylvania, of Dutch ancestry, and now resides in the Puget Sound country. Mr. Blakeney has three brothers and two sisters: Hugh T., of Baker City, Oregon; James Henry, a dealer in horses, at Portland and The Dalles; Decatur A., a mining man at Baker City; Mary A., wife of Frank Thompson, of Baker City; and Emma J., married to William T. McClure, a farmer living near Mosier, Oregon. Mr. and Mrs. Blakeney have three children, Jessie F., Thomas W. and Cedric A. Mr. Blakeney is a member of Friendship Lodge, No. 9, K. of P., of which he has served two terms as C. C., the I. O. O. F., and the W. O. W. He and his wife are members of the Rathbone Sisters.

ABIEL S. MACALLISTER, one of the leading business men of The Dalles and prominent stock raiser of Wheeler county, resides at The Dalles. He was born in Maine, November 1, 1841, the son of Abiel and Lucinda (Atkinson) MacAllister, natives of the Pine Tree State. The parents and grandparents of our subject's father were natives of Maine, the great-grandparents coming from Scotland. The maternal grandfather of our subject served in the Revolutionary war and for many years he was High Sheriff of the state of Maine. The Atkinson family, from which came the mother of our subject, were early New England settlers, coming from the parent country, England.

Mr. MacAllister came to Portland, Oregon, in 1877 and to The Dalles, in 1878.

January 1, 1867, Mr. MacAllister was married, at South Jefferson, Maine, to Sarah T. Peaslee, a native of Maine. She is the daughter of Merrill and Mary (Curtis) Peaslee, both descendants of old colonial families, representatives of whom were prominent in the Revolutionary war. For many generations the Curtis family has been distinguished in literary, commercial and legal circles. Mrs. MacAllister has one brother, Frank W., a farmer, residing near Salem, Oregon.

JOHN B. McATEE is a native of Wasco county and the energy and enterprise he has manifested in his life here show him to be made of the metal that wins success. He has chosen thus far to cast his lot in the county where he was born, and to such young and energetic men as he are the almost boundless resources of fertile Wasco county opening, and they are carrying on to a commendable consummation the noble work commenced by their forefathers, who labored here when the Indians were the main inhabitants, and who braved the storms of life in a new country, suffering the hardships and doing the arduous labor incident to opening a country for the ingress of civilization's accompaniments. Our subject was born at Tygh Valley, on April 14, 1876. His parents are mentioned in the article relating to Mrs. McAtee, found in another portion of this work. His early life was spent on the farm and his primary education was gained from the district schools near his birthplace. Later he attended school in Dufur and made the best of his opportunities. After the days of school books were past, he wrought for four years in the flour mills of Dufur, then engaged with Johnston Brothers, a well known business firm in Dufur. Since that time, he has been actively occupied here and is well and favorable known. He is a young man of promise and has shown an ability that presages a bright future.

At Dufur, Oregon, on April 12, 1898, Mr. McAtee married Miss Anna Heisler, the youngest daughter of Grandpa and Grandma Heisler. To this marriage, one child has been born, John L. In political matters, Mr. McAtee is a Democrat and evinces an interest that is becoming the American citizen. He has held various offices, as city marshal and city judge. In fraternal circles Mr. McAtee is popular and belongs to the I. O. O. F., the W. W., and the Rebekahs. His wife also belongs to the last named order. She is also a member of the United Brethren church. Mr. and Mrs. McAtee are popular young people and have many admiring friends.

LINDSEY B. THOMAS, who is well and favorably known in Wasco county and throughout the adjacent country, is now dwelling in Dufur. He was born in Prineville, Oregon, on October 7, 1874, the son of Daniel E. and Candace (Smith) Thomas, who are mentioned in this work elsewhere. After commencing his education in the schools of his native place, our subject came with his parents to Dufur, where he studied in the graded schools. Then he took a course in a Portland business college and following that taught for several years in this county. He next embarked in the typographical work and on the Dufur Despatch and the Times-Mountaineer learned the art of the printer and typesetter. He followed the same for some time and then took up merchandising. Owing to his health he was forced to abandon this in one year and was for one year in Portland under the doctor's care. Then he returned to Dufur and entered the employ of Johnston Brothers as bookkeeper, and upon the opening of their bank, February 5, 1905, he became cashier of the same.

Mr. Thomas is a member of Ridgely Lodge, No. 71, of the I. O. O. F. and is prominent in fraternal circles. He has filled the chairs of this order and is also a member of the Nicholson Encampment, of which he is scribe. He has been delegate to the grand lodge and takes a great interest in the welfare of his orders.

In political matters, Mr. Thomas evinces a keen interest and he is well posted on the questions that are before the people. He has been justice of the peace at different times and for several terms was city recorder.

JACOB CRAFT, well known as "Grandpa Craft," is a venerable citizen of Wasco county. He spends much of his time in Dufur and The Dalles, but his home is at Nansene. Everyone who knows of him, and there are hosts, will be greatly pleased to read about his career. He is a benevolent gentleman, always cheerful and kind, and the result is that everyone loves Grandpa Craft.

Jacob Craft was born in Botetourt county, Virginia, on June 25, 1819. His father, Daniel Craft, was born in Pennsylvania, of native German parents and was bugle major in the War of 1812, in General Breckenridge's command. He was in the entire conflict and his old bugle is now owned by John Craft, a son, if he is still living, in Virginia. That venerable gentleman married Mary Hamilton in his youth. She was a native of Botetourt county, Virginia, and her parents were natives of Scotland. He moved to Virginia shortly after the war and there remained until his death. During those days he would not hold slaves, being opposed to the principles. When our subject was nineteen, having previously secured a fair education, he came west to visit his uncle, George Craft, who lived in Ohio. His mother had died just previous to his journey. In Ohio he learned the molder's trade at Leffel's foundry in Springfield and continued there seven years. Then he went to Cincinnati, and for seventeen years followed his trade there, his home being across the river in Newport, Kentucky. During this time, he enlisted in Company I, of the mounted Riflemen, under Captain Ruff and Colonel Harney, afterward General Harney, and fought through the entire Mexican war. He was in the battles of Cerro-Gordo, San Antonio, Contreras, Terrebustoo, Melina-Del-Rey, Tepultepec, and entered with the balance of the victorious army through St. George's gate into the City of Mexico, after fighting two days and nights without cessation. Mr. Craft was shot in the forehead at the battle of Melina-Del-Rey, and also had a shoulder broken by the fall of his horse. After the war was closed he was honorably discharged and he has been of late years receiving a pension for his services. At the breaking out of the Civil war, he bought a farm near Coldsprings, Kentucky and thither moved his family, there being a United States camp there. Here he gave his time freely to drill recruits, being too crippled to go to the front himself. For this service he received no pay, doing it for his friend and neighbor, Colonel Murnann. In 1867, he sold his property and removed to Shelbyville, Illinois and for two years did stone mason work and prospected for coal. He discovered a two foot vein but the expense crippled him financially. Cholera broke out there and he went to Nevada, Missouri, and there he did building and contracting until 1883, when he crossed the plains with a party of ten families. They came direct to Wasco county and here he selected land on Central Ridge and settled to farming. Since then he has followed that business until his retirement from active life. He still owns four hundred acres of good land and the income of this is sufficient to make his years comfortable in this the golden period of his life.

On October 22, 1852, Mr. Craft married Miss Rossana Decker, the wedding occurring in Cincinnati. Mrs. Craft was born in Missouri and her parents died of cholera in Cincinnati. She was then reared by a wealthy maiden lady. On September 12, 1899, after a long life in the Christian faith, she fell asleep, amid many friends and relatives. She was comforted and sustained by her faith to the last and her memory is fragrant with the virtues of Christianity. To Mr. and Mrs. Craft, the following named children have been born: William, a farmer near Dufur and ex-city marshal of that town; Edwin, farming near his father's place; Joseph, a farmer near Nansene; Walter, a blacksmith in the railroad shops in Sacramento; Alice J., the wife of Charles Edmonds, a drayman in Nevada, Missouri; Katurah, the wife of William R. Haynes, a farmer near Nansene; Emma, the wife of Ellsworth Haynes, a farmer near Nansene; and Edith J., the wife of Thomas Harris, a sheepman at Payette, Idaho. Mr. Craft had six brothers and two sisters, John, George, Jacob, Joseph, Daniel, David, Margaret and Annie. These were all living in Virginia before the war and since then Mr. Craft has never been able to ascertain the whereabouts of any of them, although he has frequently attempted so to do, except he ascertained that his brother, Daniel, was a captain in the confederate army and was killed at the battle of the Wilderness, having been pressed into it contrary to his will. Mr. Craft joined the I. O. O. F. in Springfield, Illinois, when twenty-one years of age, passed the chairs, was demitted when he came here, but has never affiliated since. He also belonged to the K. P. and passed all the chairs in that order in the east, but is not active here. When he was sixteen years of age he was baptized in the Missionary Baptist church, was deacon when twenty-two and in 1862 transferred his membership from that denomination to the Christian church, in which capacity he is at this day. He has traveled along the pilgrim way for many years in the power of the faith that sustains him now and his life has been such that he has been a bright testimony for the truth. He is honored by all and holds a warm place in the love and esteem of everyone.

TROY SHELLEY, a farmer residing about seven miles south from Hood River, has also spent a considerable portion of his life in preaching the gospel. In addition to this, for nearly forty years, he has been prominently identified with educational work. He was born on January 6, 1845, in Jefferson county, Iowa and crossed the plains with his parents, as mentioned elsewhere in this volume. He completed his education in the normal school at San Francisco and then taught two years there before coming to Wasco county, in 1870. He taught school all over Wasco county for thirty years, during which time he has given considerable attention to preaching as well, being an ordained minister in the Christian church. He has the distinction of teaching the first school in Tygh valley when he was only nineteen years of age. He came to Hood River in 1885. In June 1890, Mr. Shelley was elected county superintendent of schools for Wasco county on the Republican ticket and was twice reelected; thus serving six years. For a part of this time he lived in The Dalles. Later, he removed to the place where we now find him and is devoting his attention to general farming and preaching.

On June 20, 1871, in Polk county, Oregon, Mr. Shelley married Miss Annie Lewis, who was born in Massachusetts, on February 15, 1851. The fruit of this union has been eight children: Marguerite, now teaching in the school of elocution in Portland; Ralph S., a student at the state university in Eugene; Percy T., in the street railroad business, in Portland; Pauline, wife of Guy Talmage, a manufacturer at Houston, Texas; Albert B., in Portland; Annie H., Jolly M., and Ellen K., all at home.

Mr. Shelley has always taken an active interest in political matters and educational affairs and is a good and upright man.

In his work in the ministry, Mr. Shelley has always labored to get all Christians to work together, believing it the right plan, and as a happy result of this method, there has been erected in his neighborhood a union church.

WILLIAM EHRCK is one of the substantial men of Wasco county, and he has shown himself possessed of those qualities which win, for he came here with limited means. He located his family on the homestead where now is the family home, and went to The Dalles to work at his trade of mason to procure means for the improvement of his place. He spent the winters here and gradually improved the place until he now has seventy acres in cultivation and all the buildings, fences, and other things needed. He is a man of thrift and energy and has labored faithfully here. He has a good home and his wife, who is a woman of many virtues, has been a good helpmeet to him in all the years that have passed. They have reared an interesting family and all are highly respected people in the various walks of life. Mr. Ehrck lives about seven miles up the river from town, on the east side. He was born in Germany, on January 1, 1845, the son of Hans and Minnie Ehrck, both natives of the Fatherland and both deceased. From his father, our subject learned the art of the mason and was also educated in the public schools of his native country. In 1872, he bade farewell to all the dear ones at home and sailed to America. He stopped first in Chicago and two years later came on to Iowa, whence in 1879, he journeyed to Oregon, having spent the intervening years at his trade. He followed the same in Portland and The Dalles and then took the land where he now lives. He has one of the finest places in the valley, thirty acres being into apple orchard and the balance in general crops. His labor has wrought all of this, for it was a wild when he came here.

In Germany, in 1871, Mr. Ehrck married Miss Caroline, the daughter of Christian and Annie (Kroeger) Wilkins, both natives of Germany and now deceased. The wife accompanied Mr. Ehrck on his journeys westward and they are the parents of the following named children; Otto and Willie, at home and popular young men of the community; Lizzie, the wife of James Eggirt, a farmer dwelling near; Emma, the wife of Harry Imlay, a hotel steward in San Francisco; Marie, wife of Claud McCoy, in Portland. Mr. Ehrck has one brother, Henry, a hotel keeper in Hamburg, Germany, and one sister, Hennie, the wife of William Stoeck, a potter in Germany. Mrs. Ehrck has no brothers nor sisters. Both are consistent members of the Lutheran church and are well to do and esteemed people. Mr. Ehrck is a Republican but is not active, although staunch.

EZEKIEL H. WATERMAN, deceased. No one who has dwelt in Wasco county needs an introduction to Ezekiel Waterman. He was known as one of the bright and enterprising business men of this part of the state, and indeed, he operated all over the state, and withal, he was better known as a man of uprightness and generosity, having always bestowed the abundance of wealth which his labors brought him, in a manner to benefit and assist all needy ones, who came within the range of his personal acquaintance. His death was universally mourned and he left a place in the hearts of his fellow citizens where fond memories of a good man will remain for many years to come.

Ezekiel H. Waterman was born in Cayuga county, New York, on February 24, 1812, and died at his farm residence just southeast from The Dalles, on December 3, 1903, aged ninety-one. His father, John W. Waterman, was born in New York and came from Dutch and Scotch extraction. The mother died when our subject was small. He was reared and educated in his native state and in 1852 came thence to California. Four years later he made his way from the Golden State to Oregon and bought land near Jefferson. He opened a mercantile establishment there and also handled a pork packing house. Later he sold his interests there and came to the vicinity of Fort Watson in Grant county where he spent six years in raising stock. Then he sold his property there and repaired to The Dalles, where he did a loaning business for ten years. It was in this latter capacity where the true generosity of Mr. Waterman shone out most. It is well known that human nature as a rule takes advantage of this business to show its greed, but with Mr. Waterman it was used to assist and help others. In any case where he was forced to take a piece of property on a loan, he never hesitated to pay in addition cash to its full value to the unfortunate party and many have given him sincere blessings for these kind and truly benevolent acts. During the time he was loaning money he purchased three farms and after his son, as mentioned in connection with that young man, had operated them successfully for a year, Mr. Waterman removed to the place where his widow now resides. There he spent the remaining years of his life esteemed and beloved by all. At the advanced age of ninety-one, nearly ninety-two, the angel summoned him and he quietly lay down to sleep to awake in the better world where the scenes of time fraught with sorrow never more arise. He was a devout Christian all his life and a liberal supporter not only of the denomination to which he belonged, which was the Methodist, but of all worthy causes.

On September 18, 1866, Mr. Waterman married Mrs. Nancy Miller, the daughter of Martin and Eliza J. (Mitchell) Smith. The wedding occurred in Marion county, near Jefferson, and Mrs. Waterman was born in Iowa. Her father was a native of Ohio and comes from an old colonial family. His father, the grandfather of Mrs. Waterman, fought in the Revolution under the noted general "Mad Anthony Wayne," and it was his lot to endure great hardship and suffering. Still he was of the true patriotic blood and fought through to the end and assisted materially to achieve the victories that gave to the American people the heritage of a free country. Mrs. Waterman's maternal grandfather fought with Perry when he gained his brilliant victory on Lake Erie. To Mr. and Mrs. Waterman, one son, Martin, and one daughter Jennie, were born. The former is mentioned elsewhere in this work and the latter is the wife of Howard Percy, a farmer on Eightmile creek. When Mr. Waterman was nineteen he married and this wife lived for thirty years. By her he had two sons, John W., retired in The Dalles, and Oscar, killed in a mine cave-in, in California. Mr. Waterman was a well informed Democrat and a public minded man as well as patriotic citizen. Mrs. Waterman is a member of the Methodist church and she has taken up the added burdens of handling her husband's large property, in which capacity she shows marked wisdom and excellent judgment. She is a woman of many virtues and stands well in the community. Her father is ninety-one and her mother ninety, and they are both in good health for that advanced age. She is sixty-seven and the years of her life sit lightly as she is of a long lived family and is now in excellent health.

INGWERT C. NICKELSEN, a leading business man of The Dalles, is located at 315 East Second street, where he handles a fine art, music and stationery store. He is skilled in his business and does a large and profitable trade. His goods are the best and up-to-date in every particular and Mr. Nickelsen is well known as a man of integrity and good principles, thus having gained the confidence of the public.

In giving a detailed account of his life, we would note first that he was born in the island of Fohr, which belongs to the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, on January 20, 1842. His parents, Peter and Christina (Petersen) Nickelsen, were natives of the same place and are mentioned more fully elsewhere in this work. The first seventeen years of his life were spent in his native land and there he gained a good education. In the year 1859 we find him in New York city engaged in the restaurant business and for eight years he followed it faithfully. Then he came to San Francisco via the Nicaragua route and two weeks later shipped on the steamer California, for Portland. After a rough passage and just escaping a total wreck at the Columbia bar, he landed in safety and came on to The Dalles. Here he wrought in the Umatilla house for two and one-half years and then opened his present business. He was burned out in the big fire, but started from the ashes a better business than he had before and is now located in a fine store, twenty-five by seventy-five feet, where he has a choice stock of about seven thousand dollars worth of the best goods, well selected. He carries Kranich & Bach pianos, is agent for the Hamburg-American steamship line and has a fine stock of music, instruments and stationery, as well as books. Mr. Nickelsen has, also, a full line of art supplies and goods.

On August 30, 1872, in Germany, Mr. Nickelsen married Miss Josine Fredden, a native of that country and the daughter of Jorgen and Gardina (Nagel) Fredden, also natives of Germany. The father was a seafaring man and was lost on the ocean in 1857. To this union three children have been born: Christina, the wife of Harry Grubb, with the O. R. & N., in The Dalles; Julia, at home; Clara T., a graduate of the Holmes Business College in Portland and now stenographer for Bennett & Sinnott, in The Dalles. On October 18, 1883, Mrs. Nickelsen was called from the duties of life and her family to enter upon the realities of another world. She was an active and prominent member of the German Lutheran church and a devoted Christian. She was deeply mourned and was known as a good Christian woman. Mr. Nickelsen has one brother, Martin H., and three sisters, Mrs. Dorethea Brothersen, Mrs. Catherine Salzer and Mrs. Maria Wyss. Mr. Nickelsen is a member of the I. O. O. F. and has been for thirty-four years, and is past grand. He has represented his lodge in the grand lodge several times. Politically, he is a Republican and was county treasurer from 1882 to 1888. He was water commissioner one term, and in 1870 was a member of the fire department. He is frequently a delegate to the county conventions but does not take the part in politics he sustained in years past, preferring to devote more time to his business. Mr. Nickelsen is an active member of the English Lutheran church and is a man of excellent standing in the community.

WALTER HENDERSON is a man of industry who has labored for many years in agriculture in Wasco county and has today a nice farm about one mile northwest from Kingsley. He was born in Washington county, Oregon, on September 6, 1862, the son of Aaron and Sarah (Butts) Henderson. They crossed the plains with ox teams in early days and settled in Oregon when the hardships of the pioneer were not light to bear. Their donation claim was about five miles from Portland and there the father labored some years, then went to Douglas county where he died when our subject was a small boy. Later the widow gathered her substance together and came east of the mountains. Walter had gained his education from Forest Grove and Hillsboro schools and came with his mother to Wasco county. He labored on the homestead she took and for the farmers near by and in 1895 took the place where he now lives as a homestead. Mrs. Henderson married William Nichols, who lived but a short time. She remained on the homestead with our subject until her death which occurred on August 13, 1890. Mr. Henderson has continued in his chosen occupation since coming here and is a man whose life testifies of his sound principles of honesty and uprightness.

At the home place, on October 26, 1884, Mr. Henderson married Miss Alice Brown, who was born in Butte county, California. Her father, John Brown, followed farming and died at Roseburg, Oregon, in 1902. He had married Miss Catherine Higgins, a native of Iowa, and now lives in Modoc county, California. Mr. Henderson has two brothers, John F., and Silvio, and one sister, Mrs. Laura Hutchison. Mrs. Henderson has the following named brothers and sisters, George, Milton; Mrs. Susan Cole, Mrs. Sarah Wamac. To Mr. and Mrs. Henderson ten children have been born, whose names and ages are given below: Perry, eighteen, John, seventeen, Mary, fifteen, Arthur, thirteen, Rena, eleven, Lillie, nine, Arlie, seven, Louis, five, Willie, three, and Orville, an infant. Mr. Henderson is a Republican and evinces a lively interest both in politics and educational affairs.

HORACE RICE has so labored in Wasco county and the Willamette valley that he is entitled to be classed both as one of the builders of the country and one of its most substantial citizens at this time. He was born in Portage county, Ohio, on May 20, 1829, and now lives on Jackson street in The Dalles. His father, William K. Rice, was born on December 30, 1793, in Connecticut and came from an old colonial family, the progenitors of which on this side of the ocean were brought hither on the Mayflower. Members of the family participated in all of the struggles of the colonies and down until the late war and have been prominent as professional men and commercial operators for many generations. Mr. Rice's father went from Connecticut to New York and was there married and later journeyed to Portage county, Ohio. There he followed his trade of cooper and finally died in Illinois, on December 29, 1839, where the family had stopped temporarily, while en route to Iowa. He and his wife were members of the Methodist church. Before marriage, she was known as Mary Pettingill and was born in Maine, from an old colonial family, some of which came to this country in the Mayflower. She was born on February 5, 1790, and died on February 5, 1874, the latter event occurring in Polk county, Oregon. When our subject was nine years of age, he went with the balance of the family to Illinois and there his father died near Ottawa. The mother took her five children and moved on to Iowa in the spring of 1840, and there married Beckwith Cook, a miller. Horace was with the family most of the time until his marriage. In 1851, with his own family, with his mother, stepfather, and other relatives, he made the trip across the plains to Oregon. They used ox teams until arriving at Bridger, Wyoming, when they traded them for horses. The trip was continued with much hardship and suffering. Their food was exhausted and at Fort Boise, they traded a portion of their bedding for dried salmon skins prepared by the Indians. They were obliged to dig roots, eat hazel brush and roseballs to keep themselves alive until they arrived in The Dalles. At Umatilla our subject assisted some Indians to butcher and dress a steer which gave them a feast, as the Indians gave them meat enough to last several days. At The Dalles, there was a trading post and a tent. From The Dalles to the Cascades the trip was made on the steamer Flint and from there to the mouth of the Big Sandy in a bateau and Judge Taylor drove them from that point to Milwaukee. Mrs. Rice soon obtained employment at one dollar per day, cooking in a boarding house, and her husband at two dollars and fifty cents per day, in a sawmill. Later, he made excellent wages, from ten to forty-five dollars per day in handling wood and timber. Typhoid fever attacked his family and much suffering ensued and finally they journeyed on to Lane county and took a donation claim where they remained twelve years then sold out and came to what is now Wasco county. He took a homestead on Fifteenmile creek and bought railroad land until the estate was one of one thousand acres. He was the first man to plant grain on the upland of Fifteenmile creek. The neighbors laughed at him and he was the butt of ridicule until they saw the excellent crops which he raised when they too took up land and commenced to raise wheat. Thus Mr. Rice may be noted as the leader in opening up the hills of Fifteenmile creek. They continued on their ranch, one of the best in the county, with an ideal residence location, until 1901, when they moved to The Dalles; then he sold out to his oldest son, George W., and since has been enjoying the well earned retirement of his life.

On February 19, 1849, in Cedar county, Iowa, Mr. Rice married Miss Eliza J. Bolton, who was born on June 8, 1830, in Giles county, West Virginia. Her father, George Bolton, was born in Virginia, on December 25, 1802, and died on March 6, 1848. His father was stolen by a press gang and brought to the United States from Holland. Daniel Bolton, George Bolton's brother, is well known. The mother of Mrs. Rice was Margaret Duncan, born in Virginia, on July 10, 1800, and died at the age of eighty. She came from a prominent Virginia family. Mr. Rice has one brother, Cyrenius, deceased; and four sisters, Nancy, Mary, Lucinda and Ruth, deceased. Mrs. Rice has one brother, Charles H., and four sisters, Margaret, the widow of A. Smith, and Elizabeth A., Mary F. and Louisa, all deceased. To Mr. and Mrs. Rice the following named children have been born: George W., on the old home place; Austin C., a farmer in The Dalles; Emma, wife of Charles H. Southern, mentioned elsewhere in this work; Nellie D., wife of Daniel W. Mann near Collins, Washington; Ettie M., wife of M. M. Waterman mentioned elsewhere in this work; Charles W., who died in Riverside county, California, on February 10, 1899, aged forty-five; and Amelia A., the wife of Lemuel Gassaway, who died on Fifteenmile creek, on January 4, 1885. Mr. Rice is a good staunch Republican, has been county commissioner, justice of the peace and held various offices both here and in the valley. He and his wife are estimable people, having labored long and faithfully to build up and improve the country and are highly deserving of the retirement they are now enjoying and the admiration of a large circle of friends.

ABSALOM D. BOLTON, deceased. Among the pioneers of Wasco county and the state of Oregon, it is fitting that we should make mention of the gentleman whose name appears above, since he was one of the sturdy men who labored assiduously to open up the country and brave the dangers and hardships incident to such a life. He was a good citizen and an industrious man, capable and upright and won hosts of friends wherever he dwelt.

Absalom D. Bolton was born in Virginia and died at the family home just east of Boyd, on February 18, 1903, aged eighty-two years. His parents were Jacob and Elizabeth (Inksell) Bolton, natives of Virginia. The father's father was kidnapped from Germany when a boy and brought to Virginia and forced to work on a plantation seven years to pay for his passage. During the Revolution, he was a teamster in the army. His son, our subject's father, served in the War of 1812. The mother of our subject died in Iowa where she went during the Civil war. Mr. Bolton married in the east and in 1852, with ox teams, crossed the plains to Lane county, Oregon. Later he sold his property there and came to the vicinity of Boyd, bought the rights of a settler and began farming. He prospered in his labors and became a well to do and prominent citizen. Upon his death, he left to his wife the old home place of seven hundred acres and a half section to each son besides. His marriage occurred on March 4, 1852 and Oliva Bolton, his half cousin, became his bride. Mrs. Bolton's parents were William and Sallie (Southern) Bolton, both natives of Virginia. Mrs. Sallie (Southern) Bolton is an aunt of Charles H. Southern, mentioned elsewhere in this volume.

She died in Iowa in 1884. Her husband died in Iowa during the war. Mr. Bolton had two brothers, Daniel and George. His widow has two brothers, John and George, and three sisters, Mrs. Virginia Van Meter, Mrs. Agnes Pierce and Mrs. Contrace Emmons. To Mr. and Mrs. Bolton six children have been born: Lee and Park, farmers in Wasco county near by their mother's place; George, a druggist at Moro; Dean, a harness maker in The Dalles; Addie, wife of Lewis Bolton, a farmer in Wasco county; and A. Grant, at home with his mother.

JOHN M. MARDEN, who came to The Dalles, Wasco county, about the time of the admission of the state of Oregon into the union, is now retired from active business. He was born in Georgetown, D. C., November 30, 1838, the son of Nathaniel M. and Mary A. (Lutz) Marden, the father a native of Virginia, of an old southern family, the mother having been born in Georgetown. The father died in the eighties, aged sixty-four, the mother passed away in 1853 at the age of fifty-six years.

In his youth our subject attended private schools and a preparatory school connected with Columbia College, Washington, D. C. Later he learned the carpenter trade, and April 2, 1849, he joined a party of sixty-four men, known as the Washington City & California Mining Association, and crossed the plains with mule teams. He arrived at Lassen's ranch, California, October 13, 1849, and here he mined on Bidwell's Bar until January 1, 1850, going thence to Sacramento in the hope of receiving letters from home. In February he went to Marysville and assisted in building the first frame edifices in that town. He soon went to Shasta with a pack train, thence to Scott's Bar, Weaverville, and back to Marysville. Here he disposed of his mules, in the spring of 1856, returned to Shasta and filed on a placer claim on the headwaters of Whiskey Creek, where he panned out considerable coarse gold and many large nuggets, one of which was worth eight hundred dollars. That fall he left for Marysville, and thence north up the Yuba river, to Trask Bar, where for six years he remained mining successfully. In July, 1858, he went to Fraser river, during the excitement incident to that period, with three other men in an Indian log canoe, from Victoria, up as far as Fort Langley, B. C. Finding nothing there worth their time they paddled down into the Sound to Olympia, and from there he went to Monticello, Oregon, at the mouth of the Cowlitz river, where he took a steamer for Portland, and thence to the Cascades. The following

March he came to The Dalles since which time he has lived in Wasco county. In the autumn of 1859 he filed on a pre-emption claim, where for thirteen years he made his home. During the Snake Indian uprising he had some experience in savage warfare, when buildings were burned at the Warm Springs Agency, and Briggs and his sons were massacred, at Barlow's Gate, in 1860. With his family Mr. Marden came to The Dalles in 1883, where he engaged in the mercantile business with R. F. Gibbons and A. S. MacAllister, mentioned in another portion of this book. When they were burned out in 1891, our subject and Mr. Gibbons settled up the affairs of the company and engaged in the real estate and insurance business which was continued until July, 1902, when they dissolved partnership. Mr. Marden has two brothers, Henry F. and Thomas S., the former a farmer in Prince George county, Maryland, the latter a machinist in Washington, D. C. At The Dalles, February 13, 1869, Mr. Marden was married to Harriet A. Reed, daughter of Calvin Reed. Her parents came to Oregon in 1850 and located near the present site of Troutdale, Multnomah county. Mr. Marden is a member of the California Pioneer Association, of San Francisco; the A. F. & A. M., and is a Royal Arch Mason. Politically he is a Democrat and has served one term as county commissioner of Wasco county and delegate to county conventions.

DANIEL E. THOMAS, deceased. To the memory of him whose name appears above, this brief review is given, as he was a man closely allied with the pioneer life of Oregon and did many worthy things during his career as a frontiersman, and also assisted materially to build up the country and bring to its present prosperous state this great section.

Daniel E. Thomas was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on November 29, 1826. His parents were born in Germany. He studied in the public schools until ten years of age and was then apprenticed to learn the carpenter trade. For four years he wrought at that and then journeyed west to Indiana and Illinois. He traveled to various other middle states and enlisted in an Illinois regiment to fight in the Mexican war. He was a non-commissioned officer and after the war came back to the middle states whence he crossed the plains with ox teams to the Willamette valley in 1859. Later he was identified with the Granite creek mines in eastern Oregon and followed mining for some years. Then he returned to the Willamette valley and followed his trade there until 1869, when he went to the country around Prineville. He did carpentering for a time then started a mercantile establishment. He was appointed the first postmaster of Prineville and for a time conducted the office in Heisler's store, then formed a partnership with Mr. Pickett and did merchandising for ten years. Then he brought his family to Dufur and here followed his trade until about two years previous to his death. That event occurred in Dufur, on August 30, 1895.

In 1869, at Beuna Vista, Oregon, Mr. Thomas married Miss Candace Smith, who was born in Utah while her parents were en route to Oregon. She died at Prineville, in 1876. Three children were born to this union; Agnes, the wife of William Wright, a farmer near Dufur; Lindsey B., mentioned elsewhere in this book; and Freeman, who died in infancy. In 1879, Mr. Thomas married a second time, Miss Mary A. Batty becoming his wife, and to them three children have been born; Inez, the wife of F. B. St. Martin, of Boise, Idaho; Amy, living with her mother; and Essie E., deceased.

VICTOR MARDEN, harnessmaker and saddler, residing at The Dalles, Wasco county, is a native of the county, born September 20, 1874, the son of John M., mentioned elsewhere, and Harriet (Harn) Marden, the former a native of Maryland, born in Baltimore, and the latter of Indiana.

Young Marden attended the public schools at The Dalles, the Bishop Scott Academy, Portland, and the Pacific University, Forest Grove. He began learning the harnessmaker's trade in 1892, with Farley & Trout, with whom and others, he remained until 1900, when he commenced business on his own account. In September, 1903, he moved into his present quarters, corner of Second and Laughlin streets, where he has a handsome store 30x100 feet in dimensions. It is by no means flattery to assert that our subject produces some of the most artistic work in his line in the entire state of Oregon, including Mexican leather work saddles, and everything in the way of stamped goods. At the county fair of 1903 he took the prize for a double harness made for Gifford, the photographer. This is, generally, conceded to be the handsomest piece of harness work ever made in the state. He employs four men, and his business is eminently successful.

Mr. Marden is a member of the A. F. & A. M., being past master of Wasco Lodge, No. 15, and a member of Chapter, No. 6, R. A. M. Politically he is a Democrat. He manufactures many high-priced saddles, but one which he recently delivered to a customer in Harney county, Oregon, is probably the handsomest and most costly of any in the northwest. The price was three hundred dollars and there was used in its construction one hundred and fifty dollars worth of gold and silver in trimmings. The leather was exquisitely embossed and the workmanship could not be excelled.

JAMES A. NICHOLSON is the son of John and Nancy (Frew) Nicholson, worthy pioneers of Washington county, Pennsylvania, who are mentioned more in detail in the sketch of C. J. Nicholson. Our subject was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania, on October 15, 1847, and was there reared and educated. He did various work after arriving to manhood and remained in his native county until 1875. Then he determined to see the great west and accordingly decided on California as the objective point to his first journey. He arrived there in good time and soon found employment on a farm. For three and one half years he continued at that labor and in that time had the best of opportunity to see the country and try the climate. In 1878, he decided to explore the Pacific coast more and so left the Golden State and turned his face to the north. Marion county, Oregon, was the first place to attract him and there he remained one month looking over the country. After this he traveled about some and finally, in July, 1879, he concluded the best place to locate was in Wasco county, and he then took a pre-emption in the vicinity of Boyd. While he did improvement work on this, he also wrought in the sawmills and thus spent some time. Later he was engaged by the O. R. & N. company and continued four years as night watchman and four years in the repair department. Then he returned to the farm and devoted himself to its cultivation and improvement. This continued until 1899, when he rented his lands and gave himself more to a life of retirement. This gave him leisure to investigate other enterprises and he has busied himself variously since that time. He has secured two farms, one here and the other in Sherman county, both of which are rented. In addition to this he owns a house and eight lots in Boyd, besides other property. He has been prospered, owing to his careful industry and his wise management of the resources placed in his hands. He is a good business man, a kind and accommodating neighbor, and a patriotic and well informed citizen. He is a supporter of Republican principles and also affiliates with the Methodist church. Mr. Nicholson, like his brother, is a careful and extensive reader and few men of the country are better posted than he on the questions of the day and general items.

Mr. Nicholson acknowledges his prosperity as due to the kind hand of Providence which has marked his way with plenty and blessed him in basket and store, and he remarks that he has always had sufficient cash on hand to accomplish the purposes of life. He has taken three trips east. One was in 1887, after having been in the west thirteen years. He visited parents, and relatives with friends remaining four months. Again, this time it being 1895, he journeyed to the home scenes, remaining nine months. On December 1, 1904, Mr. Nicholson received a telegram that his brother, H. J. Nicholson, was lying at the point of death. He took the first flyer and sped as fast as the mighty train could carry him, but death would not stay, and he was only in time for the funeral of the loved one. He remained sometime in the east, nearly a year, but arrived in Oregon in time to visit the Lewis & Clark Exposition. Although the east has many attractions for him, still the beauty and resourcefulness of the west come first, and while on his visits he always quotes the words of the grand old abolitionist, Horace Greeley, "Go west, young man, go west."

CHARLES N. GILMAN, of the firm of Gilman & Son, resides at The Dalles, Wasco county, engaged in the real estate business. He was born January 20, 1863, in Kent county, Michigan. His parents, Nathan and Emma (Rose) Gilman, were natives of New York state. The father is a descendant of the old and distinguished Gilman family, early settlers in New England and of English ancestry. The mother's family were equally eminent, her grandfather coming from Germany. Nathan Gilman served a year in the Civil war, in Company D, Twenty-second Indiana Cavalry, and was killed in a skirmish with guerrillas. The mother lives with her son, Charles N. Gilman, as does his stepfather, A. B. Fairchild.

Young Gilman was reared on a farm, attending district and high schools at Cedar Springs, Michigan, graduating with honors at the age of eighteen. While employed in a lumber and shingle mill he found time to apply himself diligently to the study of steam engineering, in which he perfected himself. For six years he was in charge of the company store and lumber yard. He located in Sherman county and filed on a timber culture claim, and purchased railroad land. He lived there eleven years, during which time he was a clerk with Scott & Company four years, and the rest of the time was on the farm. In April, 1901, he disposed of his land, four hundred and eighty acres, and removed to The Dalles, where he was in the employment of Joseph Peters, in a planing mill, one year. He then engaged in his present business, in which he handles considerable farm and city property.

Our subject was married May 31, 1883, at Cedar Springs, Michigan, to Estella Smith, born in Michigan, the daughter of Peter K. and Arminda (Evans) Smith. Her father, a native of New York state, served with distinction during the Civil war, and now lives in Michigan. Mrs. Gilman has two brothers, Eugene D. and Meno C., masons, contractors and farmers, living at Cedar Springs, Michigan. Mr. and Mrs. Gilman have two children, Earl D., in the real estate business with his father, and Verta E., a girl of nine years of age. Politically Mr. Gilman is independent. He is a member of the M. W. A. at The Dalles.

C. JOHANN STUBLING, proprietor of a wholesale liquor, wine and cigar house, The Dalles, Wasco county, was born October 21, 1846, in Saxony, Germany, the son of Thielman and Margreta (Sharfenberg) Stubling, natives of Saxony. The mother died in 1869 and the father in 1884.

In the public schools of Saxony our subject received his education, and then served four years in the army. During his third year a war broke out and he saw much active service. He participated in the battle of Noasville, where he was wounded, and was in the battle of Metz and a number of others. With his father he learned the trade of a blacksmith, and in 1872 came to the United States, going to Canada and subsequently to St. Paul, Minnesota, where he followed his trade two years, thence going to Belleplaine, Minnesota, for one year. After this he was seven years in Hudson, Wisconsin, going from there to Pembina county, North Dakota, he conducted a blacksmith shop and in 1883 came to The Dalles. Finding no opportunity to work at his trade he opened a saloon which he conducted until 1889, when he disposed of the same, and now conducts a wholesale liquor house on the corner of Federal and Second streets. Mr. Stubling enjoys a large and constantly increasing trade in Wasco and adjoining counties.

Our subject was married at Belleplaine, in April, 1877, to Anna Bernau, born in Germany, the daughter of Carl Bernau.

Mr. and Mrs. Stubling have two children, Arthur C., at home, and Anna A. Fraternally our subject is a member of the K. of P., being vice-chancellor; B. P. O. E.; F. O. E., and the Rathbone Sisters, and his wife and daughter are members of the Relief Corps. Arthur C. Stubling, son of our subject, is a veteran of the Spanish-American war, having been quartermaster sergeant of Company F, Second Oregon Infantry. He served six months in the Philippines, and was discharged on account of illness. He is the chancellor commander of Friendship Lodge, No. 9, K. of P.; belongs to The Dalles Aerie, F. O. E., of which he is Conductor; and to the Cascade Lodge, No. 303, B. P. O. E. Young Stubling is a genial gentleman, very popular and highly esteemed for his many social qualities.

CHARLES J. NICHOLSON is one of the industrious and up-to-date farmers of Wasco county and his residence is four miles east from Boyd. He owns a choice farm there and so handles it that it is one of the productive ones and brings in annually a fine dividend. It is a place of neatness and thrift, and good taste and wisdom are everywhere evident in the premises.

Charles J. Nicholson was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania, on June 22, 1859. His father, John Nicholson, was also born in that county and came from Scotch-Irish ancestry. His ancestors followed farming and were prominent and substantial people. He was well educated, settled in the county where he was born, took a prominent part in affairs there, was school director for twenty-seven years, often was appointed administrator for estates, and was very prominent in the Methodist church there. He was a respected and influential man and died in the county where he was born, in 1891. He had married Miss Nancy Frew, a native of the same county, and descended from parents who were born in Pennsylvania. They, too, were Scotch-Irish people and the family was one of prominence. Her father was influential in church circles and was a member of the Methodist denomination. He rode the circuit for years and preached the gospel. He opened his house and later his large brick barn, when it was new, for gospel services. His stone house was erected in 1799, and the services held there in the early days were, so far as is known, the only ones held regular west of the Allegheny mountains.

Our subject was reared and educated in Washington county and there remained until 1896, when he came to Wasco county, bought a farm and homesteaded eighty acres adjoining. Here he has bestowed his labors since and is one of the substantial citizens of the county.

On July 5, 1889, Mr. Nicholson married Miss Lizzie Johnston, who was born in Ireland, on December 8, 1869. Her father, Thomas Johnston, was born in Ireland of Scotch-Irish ancestors and lived near Dublin.

For many years he was an enthusiastic Orangeman. He married Miss Mary Allen, a Scotch-Irish maiden born and reared near Dublin. They were both members of the Episcopal church, came to the United States in 1875, and settled in Washington county, Pennsylvania, where the father bought a farm. He died there in 1901, and his widow followed the way of all the earth on April 24, 1904. Our subject and his wife were both educated in the public schools there. He has two brothers, James A., and Homer J., who died in November, 1904, and four sisters, Sarah D., Mrs. Nellie J. Gregg, Mrs. Annie Carroll, and Mrs. Mary R. Sprowls. Mrs. Nicholson has one brother, Robert A. and two sisters, Mrs. Emily F. Baker, and Mrs. Margaret Holmes, who died March 4, 1899. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Nicholson, Mary B., John C., Russell W., and Romaine, aged fourteen, nine, six, and two, respectively. Mrs. Nicholson is a member of the Methodist church. Mr. Nicholson is a good Republican, is school director and a progressive man.

LEWIS P. BOLTON was born in Cedar county, Iowa, on October 17, 1855, and now resides about four miles east from Boyd, in Wasco county. He is one of the leading farmers of the county, is also interested in stock raising and is known as one of the substantial and capable men of the section. His parents, Charles H. and Louisa (Bolton) Bolton, were born in Virginia and the father now lives at Macedonia, Iowa. The mother died in Pottawattamie county, Iowa, in October, 1886. Our subject was reared in Cedar county until seventeen, then went with the family to Pottawattamie county, where he remained until 1886. In these two places he gained his education and at the date last mentioned put into execution the desire long cherished, to see the west. We find him shortly after in Wasco county where he resides and in this county and southern Washington he remained until 1883, when he returned to Iowa. Three years later he came back to Oregon and since that time, he has remained in this county. For several years after returning he rented land and in the spring of 1898 bought three fourths of a section near his present home. He continued to hold that land until 1903, when he sold it and purchased the estate upon which he resides now. It consists of nine hundred and sixty acres, half of which is tillable. He owns another half section nearby, making two entire sections of land. He raises grain on about four hundred acres annually and is a prosperous, well-to-do farmer. He handles some cattle and horses and has his place well supplied with all implements and improvements necessary for a good farm.

On April 13, 1885, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, Mr. Bolton married Miss Adda L. Bolton, who was born near Boyd, on September 25, 1859. Her parents,, Absolam and Oliva Bolton, are mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mr. Bolton has one brother, George A. and one sister, Mrs. Cora Pettit. Seven children have been born to this marriage; Esta, aged eighteen at school in Tipton, Iowa; Roy, aged seventeen; Erma, fifteen; Clyde, thirteen; Gail, eleven; Elma, eight; and Clair, four.

Mr. Bolton is a well informed Republican and is often at the county conventions; takes keen interest in school matters and labors for the success of his party. He and his wife are both members of the Advent Christian church and are people governed by sound principles and unswerving integrity.

SIMPSON COPPLE, who resides about seven miles south from Hood River, is one of the prosperous farmers of this valley and a skillful fruit raiser. He was born in Marion county, Illinois, on July 12, 1842, the son of Andrew and Christina (Fine) Copple, natives of North Carolina and from German extraction. The father died in Illinois, in 1881. While our subject was studying in the public schools, the Civil war broke out and he enlisted in Company C, Eleventh Illinois Infantry, under Captain George C. McKee and Colonel W. H. L. Wallace, and fought through the most of the war. His regiment is well known in history as one of the hardest fighters in the army and it was so depleted by service that it absorbed the one hundred and ninth to fill its ranks. Our subject participated in the fight at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Pittsburg Landing, and through Grant's campaign and the capture of Vicksburg. He was wounded at Pittsburg Landing where his regiment lost heavily. His regiment was among the very first to occupy Vicksburg. On August 15, 1864, he was honorably discharged at Vicksburg and went to Indianapolis where he attended school then looked after his brother's family and farm until the latter was through with his service in the war. After that our subject studied and taught in various places until he married and settled to farming in Illinois. There he remained until 1886, when he sold and came to Hood River, landing here on October 10. He bought the right of a squatter to his present place and when it reverted to the government from the railroad he homesteaded it. Since then he has given his attention to farming and fruit raising and is one of the successful men of the valley.

He has twenty acres of choice winter apples and has taken prizes many times at the county and district fairs.

On June 15, 1868, at Centralia, Illinois, Mr. Copple married Miss Alice F. Williamson, who was born in Vermilion county, that state. Her parents, Robert E. and Lydia (Madden) Williamson, were natives of Kentucky and North Carolina, and of Irish and Welsh extraction, respectively. The father's father was born in Ireland and was a riverman for many years. Mr. Copple has one brother, Jacob and one sister, Mrs. Mary E. Sanders, while his wife has four brothers, Thomas J., Lina H., John P. and James E. Ten children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Copple; Claud E., of the Davenport Lumber Company; Robert A., a merchant and preacher in Pendleton; Clarence, on his father's farm; Hugh W., a school boy; Cora L., a teacher in Hood River; Bertha, wife of J. W. Taylor, a captain on the Columbia; Lillie B., wife of George W. Fisher, in the postoffice in Portland; Carrie C., teaching in the Hood River graded schools; Edith, a school girl; and Hugh, also in school. Politically Mr. Copple is a Democrat, or rather has been until recently he joined the ranks of the Prohibitionists. He has held various offices in the east but since coming west has not been active in these matters. His first vote was cast for Lincoln. It is interesting to know that Mr. Copple was discharged as sergeant and never missed an engagement while with his regiment. He was in many hard and trying places but showed the true stuff of a soldier and made a first class record. He and his wife belong to the Christian church and he is an elder in that denomination.

Misses Cora and Carrie Copple are very popular educators of Wasco county. The former has taught six years and the latter has taught three years. Both hold first class certificates and have won their present enviable positions by real merit and constant attention to the business in hand.

JOHN J. WOOLERY, who resides about twelve miles southeast from The Dalles, is one of the leading and substantial farmers of the county. He was born in Cooper county, Missouri, on September 25, 1830, the son of Henry and Letitia (Beatty) Woolery, natives of Pennsylvania and Missouri, respectively. The father's people were of German ancestry. The mother died in this county. Missouri was the home of our subject until 1852, and during that time he became an excellent farmer and received a good education from the common schools. In the year last mentioned he crossed the plains, his mother accompanying him, and they used ox teams for the trip. The journey was completed without incident other than is customary on such a trip, and they settled first in Yamhill county. Here Mr. Woolery took a claim and after six months abandoned it. After that he was employed in the valley for wages until 1856, when he joined the Oregon rangers, Company B, under Captain Hiram Wilber. They were out for two months after the redskins and had one pitched battle. In the following spring he came to this side of the mountains and settled on Tenmile creek, some ten miles below where he now resides. After eight years there, he sold his improvements and located near where his home is now. He preempted, homesteaded and bought other land until he has nine hundred and six acres. He cultivates five hundred and pastures the balance.

Mr. Woolery's marriage occurred in Wasco county, when Mrs. Ada Wilson became his bride. She was born in Clatsop county, Oregon, and her death occurred in this county, on September 5, 1881. Mr. Woolery has two children, Ina A., and Floyd, both born in Wasco county. In politics we find our subject a staunch Republican, and his interest in matters of educational import and general enterprises is lively and worthy. Mrs. Woolery's parents crossed the plains in the early forties. Her father was Francis Drake Shane, a Kentuckian and descended from a prominent southern family. The Shanes were related to the Drakes and Mrs. Woolery's father was named from the great navigator, Drake.

HEZEKIAH C. CROCKETT is one of the prosperous farmers in the Odell district, south of Hood River, where he has a quarter section of land. He was born in Maine, on January 16, 1854, the son of James and Mary S. (Spofford) Crockett, natives of Maine. The father came from an old American family, who were ship owners. He died at Rockland, Maine. The mother's family was very prominent in the seventeenth century in the colonies and also in the Revolutionary war and the War of 1812. They are a very large family and now hold annual reunions. Our subject was raised in Maine and there educated. In the fall of 1875, he came to Oregon and filed on a quarter section, sixteen miles southeast from The Dalles. He bought another quarter of railroad land and farmed the same until 1893, when he went to Troutdale and raised hay and did dairying. He had rented his wheat farm in Wasco county and continued at

John J. Woolery

Troutdale for six years, then he came to Hood River and traded a part of his wheat farm for a quarter section he now owns here. He has four acres in fruit and is clearing the balance of the land which is quite fertile and valuable, a portion now being in hay. Mr. Crockett has improved the place and by his own industry and thrift has made it one of the valuable farms of the county.

At the bride's residence, in the vicinity of The Dalles, Mr. Crockett married Miss Hattie E. Chapman, a native of Illinois and the daughter of George D. and Mary A. (Roberts) Chapman, now deceased. Mr. Crockett has three brothers, Charles S., John T. and George A., all masons and builders, and three sisters, Mrs. Ada Freeman, Mrs. Ellen S. Johnston and Mrs. Anna M. S. Weeks, deceased. He also has three other sisters, deceased, Frances H., Flora McL., and Lucy S. Mrs. Crockett has three brothers, Arthur M., John and Leroy, and two sisters, Alice Fridley and Gertrude Taylor.

Mr. Crockett is a member of the Foresters and is a good staunch Republican. He holds the position of read overseer and school director and has shown himself an enterprising and progressive man. To our subject and his wife, eight children have been born, Claire C., Mable G., Fred P., Ada M., Veva G., Margie Helene, Hildred Marie, and Kenneth M., who is deceased.

LUCIUS E. CLARK, who resides five miles southeast from Hood River, is one of the leading fruit raisers of the valley and is a man of energy and ability as his excellent success testifies. His residence is one of the choicest in the county and about the finest in this valley. It is a modern structure of tasty architectural design and provided with all conveniences known. It has seven rooms, commodious and supplied with pantry, closets, bath, and so forth, while a full basement is provided with fine furnace and throughout it is equipped with the best of the market. Mr. Clark manifests wisdom and thrift and has one of the choicest orchards of the county. It is of the best winter apples and embraces twenty acres. His farm consists of one hundred and twenty-six acres.

Lucius E. Clark was born in Peoria county, Illinois, on January 9, 1860, the son of Willard and Mary (Berrian) Clark, natives of New England and New York, respectively. The father died when Lucius was an infant and the mother married Enos Mack, and she died eighteen years later. The district schools furnished the educational training of our subject and when seventeen he went to Kansas to search opportunity.

After renting a farm for a time he engaged on the construction of the railroad until 1887. Then he entered the lumber business at Wasco and Biggs, locating in the former place when the railroad came through there. In April, 1902, he removed from that place, having sold his property there except a one-fourth interest in the Wasco Milling Company's mill, at that point. Then he came to this valley and built his present residence and is now giving his attention to raising fruit. In politics, Mr. Clark votes for Republican leaders but still adheres to Prohibitionist principles. He has one brother, Walter, and two half brothers, Fred and Edward Mack.

On September 6, 1883, Mr. Clark married Miss Ada Berrian, who was born in Boltonville, Wisconsin, on October 21, 1866. The wedding occurred in The Dalles. Mrs. Clark's father, James A. Berrian, was born in New York, Binghampton, and died May, 1883, at Columbus, Washington. He comes from an old and prominent family and was a pioneer on the coast in 1849. He married Miss Imilda Wendell, a native of New York and now dwelling in Hood River. Mrs. Clark has three brothers, James W., George, and Howard, and one sister, Lulu, wife of Edward Hill. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Clark, Nellie Bliss, Willie, Gladys, and Florence, aged nineteen, fifteen, thirteen, eight, and four, respectively. Our subject and his estimable wife are members of the Methodist church and faithful workers in the cause. They take a great interest in this work as well as educational matters and strive for the upbuilding of the community and the betterment of all.

HENRY J. HIBBARD, one of the prominent men of Wasco county, is now living a retired life at Hood River. He has been very active in laboring for the benefit of the country and was for a time one of the most skillful and successful fruit raisers of the section. He was born in Vermont, on July 19, 1846. His father, Joseph B. Hibbard, was a native of Vermont as were also his parents and their parents so far as is known were of English descent. The Hibbard family have been leading people for many generations and were well known in business circles, at the bench and in other professional lines. Especially in the medical profession were they prominent in Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island. The mother of our subject, Olive H. (Pratt) Hibbard, was also born in Vermont. The Pratt family is well known as one of the colonial families of patriotism and spirit. They were especially prominent in manufacturing lines, having some very large establishments in Connecticut, and also throughout New England. When Henry J. was four years of age, his parents came to Wisconsin which was then a pioneer country. He did freighting and various work after arriving at manhood's estate and in 1877, as stated above, came west. He located in Klickitat county, Washington, and gave his attention to stock and grain raising and took up government land. In 1891, he closed out the stock business and came to Oregon, settling in Hood River. Here he purchased forty acres of first class fruit land, four miles out from town and planted an orchard. He displayed marked skill and care in this labor and when he sold the property in 1902, it was considered one of the best orchards in the entire valley. The place was in every respect, a model. After that, Mr. Hibbard purchased land in Hood River and erected a residence where he dwells at the present time. In political matters, we find Mr. Hibbard a strong Republican and he has participated in campaigns for years. He attends most of the conventions and is a prominent figure there. In 1902, he was elected commissioner of Wasco county and is giving excellent satisfaction in that important office.

On November 1, 1866, in Wisconsin, Mr. Hibbard married Miss Emma Axtell, a native of Maine and descended from an old and prominent family. Her mother, Nancy Judkins, was also a native of Maine as were her ancestors for many generations. The father of Mrs. Hibbard was Thomas Axtell, born in Massachusetts and an agriculturist. Mr. Hibbard has no brothers or sisters, living and his wife has one brother Alvin, retired at Fairview, Oregon, and two sisters, Ellen, the widow of Peter Damon at Sumas, Washington and Mary, widow of Judson Owen, in Dodge Center, Minnesota. Mr. and Mrs. Hibbard have one child, Edwin T., a carpenter of Hood River.

Our subject is a member of the A. F. & A. M., of the I. O. O. F., and the Encampment, while he and his wife both belong to the O. E. S. and the Rebekahs. Mr. Hibbard assisted in organizing the I. O. O. F. lodge here and is a director and charter member of the same and was the first noble grand. He has frequently been delegate to the grand lodge and is prominent in political circles.

Edwin T. Hibbard has married and has three children. Florence M., Mary L., and Fred H., aged seven, five and two years, respectively.

FREDERICK CLAUSEN, who resides about ten miles east from Dufur on one of the finest estates in this part of Wasco county, was born on February 1, 1858, in Denmark. His father, Nico-lai Clausen, was born in the same place and married Karen Dinsen, a native of Denmark, and there remained until his death. His widow is still living in that country. Our subject was well educated in his native country and in 1874, came to the United States and finally landed in Sacramento county, California, where he labored for seven years. Then he came to Oregon and in April, 1878, filed on the homestead where he now lives. He also took a timber culture claim and began the good work of improving and making a choice farm. From that time, which was a quarter of a century ago until the present, he has continued steadily in the labors of building up and improving his farm and in stock raising. From time to time, he has bought land adjoining until he now owns one thousand six hundred and ten acres, half of which is under cultivation. From that in cultivation, he raises most bounteous crops of wheat every year and is one of the heaviest wheat producers in this part of the country. He also raises much stock, wintering generally about one hundred and twenty head of cattle and one third as many horses. He has some fine thoroughbred animals, among which is a choice Hereford bull, which is registered. About a year ago, Mr. Clausen erected a fine nine room modern residence, complete in every detail and one of the best places in the county. It is supplied with pure spring water which is forced all over the house by a windmill, has all the conveniences known to modern architecture and is a most comfortable place. Other improvements commensurate therewith are on the farm and the entire estate bears marks of a thrifty and wise proprietor.

On August 31, 1881, in Sacramento, California, Mr. Clausen married Christine Peterson, a native of Sweden and an emigrant to the United States in the same year that our subject came. Mrs. Clausen had one sister, Mrs. Carrie Liken. Mr. Clausen has three brothers, Erik, James and Jorgen. To Mr. and Mrs. Clausen, eight children have been born, Arthur Nicolai, deceased; James, aged twenty-one; Otto, aged sixteen; Arnold, aged fourteen; Cora, aged nineteen; Edna, aged seventeen; Emmie, aged ten; and Clara, aged eight. They are all living at home at present. James is taking a course in the Portland Business College and will graduate in the winter of 1904-1905.

On October 17, 1902, at The Dalles, Oregon, after a year's illness, Mrs. Clausen was called to cross the river of death. She was a good Christian woman, had been a faithful wife and a kind mother and had assisted very materially to accumulate the fortune which Mr. Clausen now owns. It was with great grief that she was at this time taken from her home and family. She had many friends and was for years a devout member of the Lutheran church.

Mr. Clausen is a member of the A. F. & A. M. and the W. W. He is an active Republican, is usually a delegate to the county conventions, has been a school director for nineteen years and is central committeeman of his precinct. He was one of the very first settlers in this vicinity where he now resides and has done very much to open up and build up the country.

Mr. Clausen and his wife had a very unique wedding journey, which was commenced the day after their wedding, with a team and continued overland through northern California and Oregon to The Dalles. They had a very pleasant trip and many sweet memories are attached to it.

Mr. Clausen is one of the highly respected men of the county and is looked up to and advised with because of his wisdom, integrity and sound judgment.

WILLIAM L. BRADSHAW, judge of the Seventh Judicial District of Oregon, residing at The Dalles, was born in Putnam county, Missouri, September 28, 1858. His parents, Edward C., and Elizabeth (Lindsey) Bradshaw, were natives of Kentucky and Mississippi, respectively. The family of Bradshaws is of English ancestry, and many generations of them were prominent in Kentucky as farmers, planters and in professional circles. The mother, a descendant of an old and distinguished southern family, crossed the plains with her husband so early as 1864, when William Bradshaw, our subject, was only six years of age. The family arrived at Boise City, Idaho, in October of the same year, and the following summer came to The Dalles. Here they disposed of their oxen and embarked on a steamer for Portland, locating in Lafayette, Yamhill county. Edward C. Bradshaw opened an office and there he continued in the practice of law until 1886, when he removed to The Dalles. The mother of our subject died the year before. At The Dalles the father associated himself in the practice of law with Colonel N. H. Gates, until 1888, when death suddenly called him while in his office. Politically Edward C. Bradshaw was always active, taking a lively and patriotic interest in the campaigning issues of the Democratic party. He represented Yamhill county in the senate and house of representatives, was an eloquent speaker and a persistent and indefatigable worker in the interests of his party. He was a man of great force of character, broad minded, progressive and influential, and his sudden death was a sad blow to his son, to whom he was a comrade as well as a father.

The foundation of our subject's education was laid in the public schools of Yamhill county. He attended the State Agricultural College at Corvallis from 1878 until 1879, going thence to St. Louis where he entered the law department of the Washington University, from which he was graduated with honors in 1881. Returning immediately to Lafayette, he formed a law partnership with his father, and practiced until 1886. He removed to The Dalles in 1889, where he associated himself with J. L. Story, the partnership continuing successfully until 1891. On the death of Judge J. H. Bird, our subject was appointed by Governor Pennoyer to fill out the unexpired term as judge of the district. To this office he was elected in 1892, on the Democratic ticket, his Republican opponent being George Watkins, at present residing in Spokane, Washington. He received a majority of two hundred and in 1898 was reelected by eight hundred majority.

October 9, 1883, Judge Bradshaw was united in marriage, at Lafayette, to Sarah E. Littlefield, born in Chicago, daughter of Horace R. Littlefield, a physician and native of Illinois, and now practicing in Portland. Mrs. Bradshaw died at The Dalles April 19, 1900. The second marriage of our subject took place at Portland, June 25, 1902, when he was united to Agnes Cooke, born at Lafayette, the daughter of Amos and Mary Fanny (Scott) Cooke, sister of Harvey W. Scott, editor of the Portland Oregonian.

Judge Bradshaw has one child, Robert C., aged fourteen years, living at home. Judge Bradshaw has one sister, Harvey E., widow of Westley B. Carey, living at Lafayette. Fraternally Judge Bradshaw is a member of Friendship Lodge, No. 9, K. of P., is past and grand C., and at the last session of the grand lodge he was elected supreme representative. He is, also, a member of the Rathbone Sisters, the B. P. O. E., the W. O. W., Royal Artisans and the Commercial Club, of which he was the second president. Judge Bradshaw enjoys wide popularity, and numbers hosts of friends regardless of social or political lines. This was especially evidenced in June, 1904, by his re-election with a majority of twelve hundred and eighty-five.

BERNARD E. SELLECK is one of the younger agriculturists of Wasco county and has gained a good success in his chosen calling. He resides about six miles east from Boyd, where, in partnership with his father, he owns one half section of land.

His birth occurred in Pulaski, Oswego county, New York, on May 28, 1876, and his parents are Menzo C. and Nettie (Parker) Selleck, who are mentioned elsewhere in this volume. Our subject has practically spent his life in this portion of Oregon for when he was five years of age his parents came here and took a preemption, one mile south of the present town of Moro, in Wasco county. Our subject's uncle had selected the present site of Moro as a town site but was three days too late to get it at the time the land was opened. After a year's residence on the pre-emption, the family moved to The Dalles, where for nine years, the father was employed in the O. R. & N. shops as a carpenter. During that time, Bernard E. was busily engaged in gaining a good education from the schools in The Dalles and when that was completed, he entered the office of the Times-Mountaineer and under the instruction of John Mitchell, spent one year in learning the printing business. After that, he was eighteen months as a typo on the Wasco Sun. About that time, the family moved to the place where they now reside and Mr. Selleck came here and joined his father in stock raising and farming. They have half of the estate producing grain, have good improvements, a nice orchard and are doing well. The soil is especially adapted for fruit and Mr. Selleck expects to plant large orchards in the near future. Mr. Selleck also owns a fine threshing outfit and does work each year throughout the neighborhood. He is an enterprising, energetic and industrious young man and has won the esteem and respect of all who know him.

In political matters, he is a Republican but never seeks office. He is a member of the Methodist church and also of the order of jolly bachelors. Mr. Selleck has three brothers and three sisters: Royal, at the agricultural college in Corvallis; James A., a clerk for Mr. Butler at Boyd; Howard V., Marcia M., Myrtle B., and Ruby R., who are at home.

FRANK G. CHURCH resides three miles from town on Belmont street, where he owns a choice fruit farm and a beautiful residence. Everything about his premises shows thrift, good taste, and neatness, and his is one of the choice and happy homes of the valley. Mr. Church has a bright and interesting family and they are all popular people in society and in church work.

Frank G. Church was born in Lacrosse, Wisconsin, on June 10, 1858, the son of Archibald L. and Susan (Cheney) Church, natives of Pennsylvania. The father followed carpentering and died at Grand Forks, North Dakota, in 1897, September 26. His ancestors were of English, Scotch and Welsh extraction and were prominent people in colonial days and since. The mother's grandfather, who was a noble Christian worker, was one of the organizers of the First Baptist church in Wisconsin, and preached without pay. The Cheney family is prominent not only in Wisconsin, but also on the Atlantic coast. There are many professional men among them and statesmen as well as commercial operators and bankers. Farther east, they are engaged in manufacturing, and are people of ability and enterprise. Our subject was educated principally in Michigan, whither the family had moved when he was ten years old and when fifteen, he started to assume the responsibilities of life for himself, first following working for wages a few years. When eighteen he went to Iowa and four years later went to Wisconsin again, engaging in a flour mill, and in a store. Later we see him in Minnesota where he resided for twenty years, seventeen of which were spent on the farm and the balance in mercantile pursuits. He lived just across the line in Minnesota from Grand Forks and was employed in a store in that city. In 1900, Mr. Church came to the Hood River valley and bought twenty acres where he now resides. He has the estate well planted to berries and fruits and is one of the prosperous fruit raisers of this section. The place is called the Ideal Fruit Farm, and is certainly a choice spot.

On January 5, 1881, Mr. Church married Miss Sarah S. Sproat, the daughter of William C. and Ann (Hoover) Sproat, natives of Vermont and New York, respectively, and both descended from prominent New England families. Mr. Church has one brother, Daniel, while his wife has two brothers, Charles and Boyd, and one sister, Mrs. Jessie Gleason. Mr. Church is a member of the A. O. U. W., while he and his wife belong to the Methodist church, being associated with the Belmont class, of which Mr. Church is a trustee. Two children have come to gladden the home of Mr. and Mrs. Church, Alice and Ethel, both at home and the latter organist at the Belmont church, and a music teacher.

THOMAS BISHOP has one of the choice farms of the Hood River valley and although not as large as some is exceptionally well tilled and from it Mr. Bishop produced apples and potatoes which took the prize at The Dalles fair. He lives about four miles southwest from Hood River near the Christian church in the Barrett school district and is a director of the same.

Thomas Bishop was born in Guelph, Ontario, on October 6, 1847, the son of Thomas and Sarah A. (Burns) Bishop, natives of England and Dublin, respectively. Their marriage occurred in Manchester and the mother died in Guelph in 1866. The father came to Canada in 1841 and died in 1881 on his farm near Guelph. Our subject was educated in the district schools and grew up on a farm which he rented when twenty-two, for ten years. Then he came to Umatilla county, Oregon, it being 1882, and located ten miles out from Pendleton where he purchased a half section. For eleven years he was numbered among the progressive wheat growers in that country and in 1893 he came to Hood River and purchased eighty acres near where he now lives. He sold his place in 1901 and bought ten acres which he has improved in good shape and it is his home now. Nine acres of this land are producing fruit and vegetables while on the other acre is a most beautiful fir grove and a number of choice springs. The soil is equal to any other place in the valley and Mr. Bishop's thrift and industry have made the place both a valuable producer and beautiful.

On June 18, 1871, at Fergus, Ontario, Mr. Bishop married Miss Jane A. Kerr, born near Montreal, Canada. Her father, Robert Kerr, was born in Ireland and died in Ontario in 1884. Mr. Bishop has no brothers nor sisters but his wife has those, named as follows, George, Robert, Marguerite, Till, Matilda and Elizabeth. Five children have been born to our subject and his wife; Sarah A., wife of Christopher Simpson in Portland, Oregon; Maggie J., wife of Edgar Miller, near Moro, Oregon; Thomas G., at home; Laura B., a student in the business college at Portland; and Lloyd, at home. Mr. Bishop and his wife are both members of the Christian church and assisted in the organization of the same. He is now one of the trustees. Politically, Mr. Bishop is a Republican and while not especially active in the campaigns, he has always taken a deep interest in educational matters and has served on many occasions as director. He has also been road supervisor for a long time and was director of the Water Supply Company in Hood River valley, being a stockholder in that company. He is a good substantial man and is known as a thrifty and stanch citizen.

MENZO C. SELLECK. Many pioneers have toiled in the territory now occupied by Wasco county for many years to make it the prosperous section that it is today. Perhaps the most important ones of this large number are the farmers and among them we are constrained to mention the subject of this sketch, who resides about six miles east from Boyd where, in partnership with his son, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work, he has a nice farm. He has shown those stanch qualities possessed by the pioneer, has achieved results in the building up of the county affairs and the work that he has done speaks for itself. He first came to this country in about 1882 and settled on a preemption in Sherman county. A year later, he abandoned that and entered the employ of the O. R. & N., where he was occupied in building bridges, stations and so forth one year, then entered the shops at The Dalles, remaining nine years. Later, he settled on a place which is now the family home and since then has given his entire attention to general farming.

Menzo C. Selleck was born in Richland, New York, on December 17, 1848, the son of Hinman and Lucy J. (Philbrick) Selleck, natives of New York and New Hampshire, respectively. The father's parents came from England and the mother descended from an old New England family. Our subject was raised and educated in New York and there remained until 1878, when he journeyed west to Iowa. For three years he followed his trade, that of carpenter, there, which he had learned in New York, and then came on to Oregon as stated above.

On July 4, ———, at Carthage, New York, Mr. Selleck married Miss Nettie I. Parker, who was born near North Adams, Massachusetts. Her parents were natives of the same place. Mr. Selleck has the following brothers and sisters: Charles H., in Wright county, Iowa; Edgar A., at Willapa, Washington; Wilfred F., in Wright county, Iowa; Ellen A., wife of Charles Parkis, in Rome, New York; Frances and Emma, deceased; and Gertrude, deceased, the wife of John Grant.

Mr. Selleck's children are mentioned in the sketch with his son. He and his wife are members of the Methodist church and have been for many years. He is a school director, supports the principles of the Republican party and is a progressive and up-to-date citizen.

SAMUEL COCHRAN is a stanch and patriotic citizen of Wasco county where he has wrought for some time, and is now retired, enjoying the fruits of his former labor. He resides about three miles south from town on the Mt. Hood road, where he has an estate of seven acres, which is devoted largely to hay.

Samuel Cochran was born in Iowa, on May 17, 1846, the son of Artemus and Mary (Whitmore) Cochran, natives of Ohio. The father's people were pioneers of that country and the mother's ancestors came from Pennsylvania Dutch stock. Our subject was reared and educated in Iowa, his youthful days being spent on the farm with his father. On November 29, 1866, he married Miss Louisa J. Ruckman, a native of Iowa and the daughter of William and Mary (Miller) Ruckman, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Ohio. The father was of Dutch ancestrage and was born in 1804. The mother came from Scotch and Irish extraction. After marriage Mr. Cochran bought a farm and dwelt in his native place until 1872, when he sold out and assayed the journey to Union county, Oregon. Arriving there in good time, he selected state land and purchased seven hundred acres, which he tilled until 1900, when he sold all but three hundred and forty acres of that estate and moved to the Hood River valley. Here he purchased the place mentioned above and since that time has continued here in quiet retirement. The Union county estate is rented and produces a fine income annually.

Mr. Cochran has three brothers, William J., Rufus, and Milton D., and one sister, Rachel F. Johnson. He also has the following named brothers and sisters deceased: Charles, Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Collins, Mrs. Rebecca Ellen Kah, and Mrs. Lucy Catherine Rae. Mrs. Cochran has three brothers, William H., George W., and Thomas M., and one sister, Elizabeth Connelly, and two brothers deceased, John N. and Robert D. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cochran: Mary M., the wife of Charles L. Copple, whose farm adjoins that of our subject; Charles E., a prominent attorney in Union county and a graduate of the Ann Arbor University; and George T., a graduate of Leland Stanford University, and in the employ of the government in Manila, being in the forestry bureau. Mr. Cochran is an elder of the Christian church while he and his wife are faithful members of this denomination, and have labored for the advancement of the faith for many years. They are very genial and affable people and are worthy of the esteem in which they are held by all.

BOYD N. SPROAT, one of the prominent horticulturists of Wasco county, resides about five miles south from Hood River, where he has an orchard of thirty-three acres, of the choicest varieties of fruit. He has forty acres in the farm, but devotes the balance to general crops. He and his brother, who has a farm adjoining, raise fruit which has frequently taken the premium at the fairs.

Boyd N. Sproat was born in Racine county, Wisconsin, on August 10, 1867, the son of William C. and Phoebe A. (Hoover) Sproat, mentioned elsewhere in this work. He was raised in Minnesota, principally, whither the family moved when he was eleven. His life was spent on the farm and in the district schools until grown to manhood, then he studied in the North Dakota University. After that he engaged in farming and dairying, and also handled thoroughbred Jerseys and raised many fine specimens. He was town supervisor and school clerk for many years. His father was the first school clerk in his district. On October 8, 1890, Mr. Sproat married Miss Agnes C. Cameron, at Grand Forks, North Dakota. She was born in Lanark county, Ontario, the daughter of James and Margaret (Geary) Cameron, natives of Canada, and descended from Scotch and Irish ancestors, respectively. Mr. Sproat's brothers and sisters are mentioned elsewhere in this work. His wife has three brothers, James, George A., and Richard E., and four sisters, Elizabeth Love, Mary McCallum, Theresa Slater, and Annie McCullough. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Sproat are William L., aged eleven, Edna, aged five, and Norman, aged four months. Politically, Mr. Sproat is a Republican, but he is not a politician in the common sense of the word, although he is keenly alive to the interests of his party and the welfare of the community. He owns a timber claim in Crook county and has other property. His farm produces about fifteen hundred boxes of fancy apples per year, besides a great quantity of seconds, and when all is in bearing, it will produce tons more of the choicest fruit. Our subject's father was a Mason for fifty years and held all the chairs of his lodge.

HENRY O. SIEVERKROPP, who resides south from Hood River, in the Pine Grove district, is one of the leading horticulturists of this well known fruit region. He has a farm of eighty acres, which his labor has improved in fine shape. He took the place as a homestead and with his wife went to work to make a first-class fruit farm out of it. However, owing to lack of capital, they were forced to labor most arduously and he was away from home earning money for the improvements, much of the time in early years. Finally, by dint of economy and wise management, they succeeded in getting a portion of the land to producing and since then they have been adding more each year until now they have sixteen acres planted to apple orchard and seven acres are bearing. The farm is located in one of the most beautiful spots of the valley and is a choice and excellent place. Recently Mr. Sieverkropp has erected a large modern dwelling and the same is tastily set and amid beautiful surroundings, makes one of the finest rural abodes of this entire valley.

Henry O. Sieverkropp was born in Germany, about five miles out from Kiel, in Schleswig, on August 16, 1853. His parents, Claus and Christina (Jasper) Sieverkropp, were both natives of that section and are now deceased. The father was a shoemaker, and died when Henry was three years old. In the public schools of the Fatherland, our subject studied and also in his youth learned to do good hard work. He continued there until 1886 when he came to the United States, and via the Northern Pacific to Portland. He wrought on a dairy farm for a time then came to what is now Bingham and worked for C. Hise, for whom he had worked twelve years in Germany. One year after that he took the land where he lives now and here he has resided since.

On November 9, 1879, while in Germany, Mr. Sieverkropp married Miss Christina Anderson, a native of Sweden and the daughter of Andrew S. and Christina (Nillson) Peterson, farmers in Sweden. Mrs. Sieverkropp had gone to Germany to work in a large dairy where they employed twelve young women, and there she wrought for nine years before her marriage. She has labored faithfully with her husband in the improvement of their home and the building of the same and it is pleasant to see them now enjoying the fruits of this toil. Our subject has two brothers, Johann and Henry, while Mrs. Sieverkropp has one brother, August. Seven children have been born to this household: Henry, at home; Herman, a school boy; Sophie, in Hood River; Susie, Amanda, HulDAH and Emma, all at home. Before coming to this country Mr. Sieverkropp had the name Heinrich, but preferring the English he spells it now, Henry. He and his wife are members of the Lutheran church and are good, thrifty people and stand well in this community. Mr. Sieverkropp was three years in the German army.

VENZ BAUER, a pleasant, genial gentleman, and one of Wasco county's foremost farmers and stockmen, resides in the vicinity of Boyd, where he has a choice and large estate. He was born in Austria, on June 19, 1873, the son of Jacob and Johanna (Schandal) Bauer, both natives of Austria, also. The father died at the home of our subject on March 13, 1896, and the mother still lives with him. Mr. Bauer came to the United States in 1889, after having secured a good education in his native country. He came direct through to Wasco county to join his brother, Antone, who had been here for several years. He was unable to discourse in English at all, and faced the problem to master an intricate tongue in a new land and make for himself a home and name. He has succeeded admirably. He handles the English well, has so conducted himself that he has won the admiration and respect of all good people who know him, while in financial matters, the characteristic thrift of his family, and wisdom in handling means, have been so well exemplified in him that he is possessed of a fine property, sufficient to make him one of the wealthy men of the county and to provide for his needs and of those dependent on him for all their lives. All this has been accumulated by his careful industry and he stands at the head of a valuable estate, which is managed in every detail with a care and sagacity that could but win the success which crowns his efforts. When Mr. Bauer landed here he was a lad of sixteen and he at once went to work for his brother, and then later wrought for other parties until he had means sufficient to justify him in taking a homestead. This he did and improved the same and began the good work of making a home. He purchased adjoining pieces until he now has seven hundred and twenty acres of good land, four hundred of which he cultivates and upon which he raises bounteous crops of wheat. He winters from fifty to sixty head of cattle, has a nice lot of choice Percheron and Clydesdale horses, and raises many Poland China hogs. He has a registered boar which is a choice animal. Good improvements are in evidence and all this is the result of the careful industry of the lad who came here with neither means nor friends. He purchased, among other pieces, the farm his brother had when he came. He has also bought and sold some land. His brother is now in Nebraska.

Mr. Bauer became aware of the fact that to have a first-class home he needed a helpmeet and accordingly he sought one, a charming young lady, who was born in the vicinity of Glencoe, Oregon, Miss Annie Neabeack. The date of her birth was September 25, 1880, and her wedding occurred at The Dalles on January 19, 1898. Her father, William Neabeack, was born in Germany and left an orphan when nine years of age. He then came to the United States with an uncle, a sea captain, who was to raise the child. But as the sea did not suit the lad, he ran away and was reared by benevolent people with whom he became acquainted. He dwelt in many places of the United States, including Arizona, California, Oregon and so forth. He finally married Miss Emma Haddicks, who was born in the Willamette valley. Her parents were early pioneers there and came thither across the plains with ox teams. Her father is deceased, but her mother, who would be the grandmother of Mrs. Bauer, dwells in Portland. Mrs. Bauer has four brothers, Edward, William, Benjamin H., and George W., and one sister, Mrs. Effie Craft. To Mr. and Mrs. Bauer one child has been born, Fred, on June 24, 1901. He is a bright and very attractive child and the happy home circle of Mr. Bauer is complete with the dear old grandmother, a refined lady of excellent virtues, his thrifty, and kind wife, and then the father who has demonstrated his ability and love in securing and providing for his dear ones. It is a happy, pleasant Oregon home and from such as that come the men and the principles of true freedom.

THOMAS W. S. SLUSHER, deceased. In giving a memorial of the distinguished gentleman whose name appears above, we are aware that he was a man of ability and unswerving integrity and held a leading place in Wasco county where he was so well known. His birth occurred in Washington county, Pennsylvania, the post-office being Scenery Hill. The date of this event was 1847, and his death occurred at The Dalles in this county, on April 2, 1890. His parents were Christopher and Pamela (Reese) Slusher, natives of Pennsylvania and descended from Dutch and Irish ancestors, respectively. When still a lad of thirteen, Thomas Slusher enlisted in Company F, Twenty-second Pennsylvania Cavalry, and was in active service until the close of the war. He was a noncommissioned officer and did gallant service with display of remarkable faithfulness. Following the war he attended college and then, upon graduating, took up the teacher's work. He followed this in the Willamette valley, having come west, and in Wasco county. Then he took a homestead, which is a part of the present Slusher estate. He gave his attention to farming and stockraising and so well did he succeed in these ventures that when he died he left an estate of eight hundred and fifty acres embracing one of the finest and most fertile tracts of bottom land on Fifteenmile creek. He also had much other property which left his family in excellent shape, besides which Mrs. Slusher had in her own personal right a large farm. In 1872, Mr. Slusher was elected county surveyor and in 1876, he was reelected to the same position. During Cleveland's administration, Mr. Slusher was appointed receiver of the United States land office in The Dalles, and he proved to be a most efficient and faithful officer. Fraternally, he was a member of the G. A. R. and was popular in those circles, as he was in all his relations.

On October 28, 1878, Mr. Slusher married Miss Arabelle H. Dufur, who was born in Iola, Wisconsin, on July 13, 1856. Her parents, Andrew J. and Lois (Burnham) Dufur, are mentioned elsewhere in this work. To this union the following named children were born: Thomas R., at home; Eva L., the wife of C. N. Clark; Harvey D., Roy S., Ruby A., Grover C., Aleda P., who died when two years of age; and an infant unnamed. Mr. Slusher had three brothers, William, James and Simeon, the last two deceased; two sisters, Ray Hazlett, and Elizabeth Tom-bough; and one half sister, Mary Cox. Mr. Slusher died as he had lived, a brave and conscientious man, buoyed and sustained by an unflinching hope which lighted his last journey over the river. Another has said of him, "He was a brave soldier, good citizen, faithful public officer, and kind husband and father." Laid to rest amid a great concourse of mourning friends who had ministered as far as human could do in the last trying ordeal, the remains of the noble man rest awaiting that great day's animation for the world to come.

Mr. Slusher was a man who would attract attention among men, being handsome, athletic and the picture of health and good spirits, and he won friends from all classes. He left a very interesting family. The children all have excellent musical talent and for years were in the band organization and are accomplished on various instruments.

WILLIAM H. STAATS, who was born in Champoeg, Marion county, Oregon, now dwells near Dufur, Oregon, where he is handling an estate of one and one-half sections of fine wheat land. He and his wife own also one and one-half sections besides this, located near Victor, all told, making three sections of wheat land, all in Wasco county.

Our subject's father, John G. Staats, was born in Scotland, in 1832, and came with his parents to Paris, Canada, when still a boy, receiving there his education. About 1857, he migrated to Marion county, Oregon territory, and engaged in the mercantile business in a small place known as St. Paul. He continued there until 1870, when he removed thence with his family to the vicinity of Dufur, Wasco county. He did general farming, but paid most attention to raising stock. In this he continued uninterruptedly until his death, February 19, 1889. In 1866, he had married Mary A. Toupin, a native of Portland, Oregon, who died on the farm in Wasco county. Her parents had come to Oregon in early days and were among the sturdy pioneers who assisted to open up this fertile and resourceful country. Mr. John G. Staats was well known as was, also, his wife, both being substantial and highly respected people.

William H. received his early education in the schools of his adopted county and when grown to manhood, followed the occupations of general farming and stock-raising as his father had done before him. He has made a splendid success in his labors and has a choice and valuable holding of property in the county at this time.

In political matters, Mr. Staats is a Republican, and although not a politician, in the sense of the word as often used, he is very active in the campaigns of his party and takes the interest that becomes every good and loyal citizen of this country. He is often at the conventions and has served at the congressional convention of the state. In fraternal matters, Mr. Staats is popular and is affiliated with the A. O. U. W., W. W., United Artisans, the Foresters, and the Redmen. In religious persuasion he is an adherent of the Presbyterian faith and has always liberally supported church matters. Mr. Staats is a great lover of music, and was a charter member of the Dufur band.

On February 14, 1900, Mr. Staats married Mrs. Arabella H. Slusher, who is mentioned particularly in the sketch of Thomas Slusher, deceased. Mr. Staats has two brothers living, John W. and James W., one in government employ, and one employed with the railroad. He also has a sister, single, also one sister and one brother deceased.

Mr. and Mrs. Staats are popular people, have many friends and are esteemed leading people of the county.

DANIEL O. DAVIS, a hospitable and genial man, is one of Wasco county's leading citizens, and resides about one mile southeast from Wrentham. He owns a fine estate there and has shown skill and sagacity in the culture of the same as in all his career. He was born in Dutchess county, New York, on January 28, 1848, the son of Daniel O. and Hannah J. (Rogers) Davis, also natives of New York. The father died when this son was ten years old. The mother's father was in the Revolution and was for many years a boot and shoe merchant in Wassaic, New York. Our subject's paternal grandfather also was a patriot in the struggle for freedom of the colonies. The Davis family are largely mechanics and builders. Daniel was reared and educated in New York and when fourteen enlisted in Company E, One Hundred and Fifth New York Infantry, under Captain Abe Moore and Colonel Thomas. He participated in the battles of Thoroughfare's Gap, Second Bull Run, Cedar Mountain and on the way to Antietam he was taken sick and languished in the hospital for three months. Being then honorably discharged, he went home and at that time his weight with boots and overcoat was ninety-six pounds. On August 10, 1863, he enlisted in the Twenty-first New York Cavalry, Company G, under Captain J. B. Root, and Colonel Wm. B. Tibbits. He was in the Shenandoah valley and in West Virginia till the close of the war. Besides many skirmishes, he fought in the battle of Winchester. After the war his regiment was sent to Dakota and he was at Fort Collins some time and then was mustered out at Denver, Colorado. For eleven years after that he farmed and teamed there, then came to Baker county, Oregon, in 1877, and a year later settled in Union county. In 1885, he came hither and filed a homestead and since then he has acquired land by purchase until he has eight hundred and eighty acres, six hundred of which are tillable. He has considerable stock and does general farming. He is one of the successful and substantial citizens of this county.

At Fort Collins, on October 27, 1872, Mr. Davis married Miss Helen C. Remington, a native of Livingston county, New York. Her father, John E. Remington, was born in Troy, New York, was a well known artist, went to Pikes Peak in 1859, and at Dixon, Illinois, enlisted in the Seventy-first Illinois Volunteers. He was at once appointed assistant quartermaster with the rank of captain, the date being October 13, 1863. On March 13, 1864, he was made lieutenant colonel. He was mustered in September 22, 1862, and received his honorable discharge on March 13, 1866. On March 13, 1865, he was given the rank of major. He was closely associated with the leading men and one of his commissions bears the signature of Abraham Lincoln. After the war he engaged in farming in Illinois, in 1871, went to Fort Collins and was there postmaster for four years and in 1877, came on to Oregon with our subject. Here he took land and farmed until his death on October 7, 1900, being then aged eighty-four. He had married Electa S. Morse, a native of Connecticut and descended from the well known Morse family. She died here on November 24, 1891, aged seventy-three. The paternal great-grandfather of Mrs. Davis was a captain in the Revolution. Mr. and Mrs. Davis are members of the Congregational church and liberal supporters of the faith. To this household seven children have been born: Edward O., at home; Cora C., the wife of Charles Fagan, a farmer near The Dalles; Leon L., a farmer near The Dalles; Lulu B., the wife of Fred Chapman, in Valley county, Montana; Grace I., the wife of Edgar A. Johnson, of Portland; Wilfred E., a student in a business college in Portland; and Nellie G., at home. Charles Remington, first cousin to Mrs. Davis, was one of the first two men killed by the fire on Ft. Sumter. His brother, Edward, piloted Burnside's expedition. Mr. and Mrs. Davis are highly esteemed people and have done much to build up Wasco county and to forward all enterprises for the good of the people.

On January 6, 1905, at the family residence, Mrs. Davis was called hence by the angel of death. She was a noble woman and greatly beloved because of her kindness and good works.

MATTHEW A. THORBURN is a native son of Wasco county and a citizen of excellent standing here today. He was born at Kingsley, on April 29, 1879, the son of Matthew and Margaret (Fay) Thorburn. The father was born in Scotland and for many years lived in Australia and New Zealand, whither he went by himself when young. He was educated in the school of experience and followed farming and mining for many years in New Zealand and Australia. In 1873, he found his way to the Golden State, and for some time mined there, then he came to Oregon, settling in Wasco county where he has been since. He is a very popular man, well respected and influential. The mother was born in Roscommon, Ireland, and is living on the old home place in this county. It was 1876, the centennial year, when they first settled on Tygh ridge. They secured land in small quantities at first but have added by purchase since until they have now sixteen hundred acres of excellent land adapted to wheat raising and pasture. They are prosperous and substantial people.

Matthew A. was educated in St. James college in Vancouver, and then graduated from Mt. Angel college in 1897. After that he spent some time in Armstrong's business college in Portland, completing a course there. After that, Mr. Thorburn returned home and since that time he has given his attention to farming and stock raising. The first year after his studies were completed, he spent on the farm with his father, then he purchased a quarter section and since has added enough to make it a complete section, and here he has bestowed his labors. He tills about half of the section and is rewarded with bounteous crops. Mr. Thorburn is a model farmer and owing to his industry is being prospered. His land adjoins his father's estate, and his sister also owns four hundred and eighty acres contiguous. Mr. Thorburn has one sister, Catherine, who graduated from St. Mary's college at The Dalles. Mr. Thorburn is a member of the Maccabees, and is a Republican, but not especially active in politics.

On August 28, 1904, Mr. Thorburn married Miss Frances M. Easton, at the M. E. church in Dufur. Mrs. Thorburn was born in Wasco county and was reared here, and has hosts of warm friends. Her parents were John and Elizabeth (Limmeroth) Easton, pioneers of this county. The father is deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Thorburn are young people of good standing and have the good will and admiration of a large circle of friends as they start on matrimonial journey.

OLIVER M. BOURLAND was born in Illinois, on February 27, 1858, the son of Ebenezer and Elizabeth (Carnahan) Bourland. The father was born in Indiana, and came from German ancestry. He died in Illinois, in 1902. The mother was born in Kentucky and now lives in Illinois. Oliver was educated in the public school of Illinois and was reared on a farm. He was trained by a skillful and thrifty father who made a fine success of stock breeding and the art of agriculture. Until twenty-four he remained with his father and then, it being 1882, he determined to come west, and selected Oregon as the objective point. He reached the Willamette valley in due time and there spent some months in various employments. Then he came to this county and for a time wrought for wages on the farms. Then he rented, and later he took a homestead, to which he added a preemption and a timber culture. Desiring more land, he purchased until his estate is of the generous proportions of eight hundred acres, a large proportion of which is tillable. He reaped this year over four hundred acres of grain, mostly wheat, and his entire estate shows the marks of a skillful and wise farmer and business man. In addition to grain raising, he raises much stock, and he possesses some of the finest specimens in the county. He owns a fine registered Poland China boar, and has about one hundred other hogs. Of cattle, he has twenty choice Shorthorn animals and some other grades. Among this herd is a thoroughbred, registered, Shorthorn bull, a splendid animal. Mr. Bourland also has twenty-five or more well bred horses, all Percheron and Clydesdale. In all the animals on the place is exemplified the skill and care of Mr. Bourland, for he believes and puts into practice the principle that it is just as easy to raise a good animal as a poor one. He knows the business, is a careful and sagacious man and has won the success he enjoys by virtue of his own worth and ability.

At The Dalles, Mr. Bourland married Miss Mary Hanna, a native of the Willamette valley. She was called hence by death on October 4, 1894, after an illness of eight days, wherein she suffered from diphtheria. She was a noble woman and had won the hearts of all who knew her. Mr. Bourland was greatly stricken and his children mourn a beloved mother who dwells now only in sweet memories in their midst. The children of the family are Ebenezer F., George L., Jasper B., Jud F., and Lillie J. Mr. Bourland has two brothers living, James E. and Francis A., in Illinois, and one dead, William W., who met his death during the Civil war. He also has three sisters, Hulda, the widow of G. Mitchell, Mrs. Phoebe Watson, and Mrs. Rachel Hardy. In politics, Mr. Bourland is independent. He is a man of means and is one of the leading men of this part of the county.

ROBERT E. HARBISON, proprietor of a fine eighty acre fruit and hay ranch, known as Meadow Farm and located some five miles south from Hood River, is one of the leading citizens of the valley. He was born in Warren county, Iowa, on September 30, 1861, the son of Matthew H. and Mary L. (Weir) Harbison, natives of South Carolina. His parents' ancestors were of Scotch-Irish lineage, who came from north Ireland to the colonies prior to the Revolution and were staunch American patriots. Our subject's father was born on May 18, 1833, and his wife was born on August 3, 1833. When they were two years old the two families moved to Indiana, and at Bloomington, in that state, they were married on September 28, 1854. They soon moved to Iowa and when the war broke out the father enlisted in Company C., Thirty-fourth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, on August 13, 1862, under Colonel Clark, and Captain Dan Lyons, and died in service, on January 20, 1863. He is buried in an unknown grave in the national cemetery near Memphis. The mother, still a widow, resides at Tangent, Oregon, with a son. Our subject was raised principally in La Crosse county, Wisconsin, and received a good education from the graded and high schools. When twenty-two he went to California and did various work for two years, then came to the Big Bend country, Washington, where, in 1885, he and his brother, J. S., and Charles Davis, started the town of Almira, then called Davisine. A year later he came thence to Hood River, where his mother bought a quarter section on the east side of the valley. Later she sold one hundred and twenty acres and deeded the remaining forty to our subject and his brother, John S. They erected a saw and grist mill in 1889 and operated the same until 1901 when the brother sold to Mr. Harbison, and he continued the operation of the mill until February, 1903, then sold out to Wilson Fike. Immediately afterward Mr. Harbison purchased the eighty where he now lives, which was a part of what his mother had sold. Mr. Harbison has thirty acres of apple orchard, mostly young trees just beginning to bear, and he has frequently taken prizes at the fairs. He has the famous banana apples, of which there are very few in the state. He has an elegant thirty acre meadow which produces about four tons of hay to the acre annually, it being irrigated from Neal creek.

On January 1, 1887, at Hood River, Mr. Harbison married Miss Lucy Rand, a native of La Crosse county, Wisconsin, and the daughter of Martin V. and Elizabeth (Feak) Rand, natives of Virginia and New York, respectively. The father enlisted in Company E, Second Wisconsin Infantry and served four years in the Civil war, and is now retired, living in University Park, Portland. Mr. Harbison has two brothers, John S., of Tangent, Oregon, and Luther J. at Vacaville, California. Mrs. Harbison has the following brothers and sisters: Jason, Bert, Harvey, Minnie Clelland and Lulu Horning, all of Portland. To Mr. and Mrs. Harbison four children have been born, Blanche, Hester, Ruth and Mary.

Politically, Mr. Harbison is a staunch Republican, although not very active. He and his wife belong to the Congregational church, and Mrs. Harbison is a member of the Women's Relief Corps. They are highly esteemed people and Mr. Harbison is looked up to as one of the enterprising and successful farmers and fruit raisers of the valley.

Every genuine American loves to read accounts of patriotism and brave acts in defense of country. Among other incidents occurring in the Harbison family of earlier generations, we mention the following, which is taken from Elizabeth E. Ellet's "Women of Revolution," now out of print. William Strong, relative on the mother's side to our subject, was a staunch patriot in the time of the Revolution and did all in his power to forward the cause of the struggling colonists. On June 11, 1780, on his own farm, in South Carolina, he was faced by a detachment of British, led by one Huck, and refusing to renounce his loyalty to the colonists and the cause they all loved, he was shot in cold blood.

FRANCIS M. JACKSON, a well known and highly respected horticulturist and farmer of the Hood River valley, resides about seven miles south from the town of Hood River, and was born in Athens, Tennessee, on December 13, 1836. His parents, John B. and Dorcas (Cox) Jackson, were pioneers in Tennessee. The father was born in North Carolina, as were also his parents, and when sixteen he went alone to Kentucky, where he married and whence he returned later to Tennessee. He was a man of refinement and education, being especially skilled in mathematics and music. He was professor in Monticello academy, Kentucky, and later taught music. He finally published a musical work that netted him a nice profit. He was clerk of McMinn county, Tennessee, for many years and died in Morristown, that state, in 1858. His wife died in the same town in 1853. She was descended from an old southern family. Our subject lived in Morristown from the age of six to seventeen and received an academic education there. Then he traveled with ox teams to Missouri, and in the spring of 1856 continued his journey on to California, where he wrought for two years and six months at mining. Owing to his father's death he then returned to the east and remained on the old place for some time and bought a farm and some slaves. Owing to rumors of war, Mr. Jackson did not return to California as he originally intended to do, and in June, 1861, enlisted in the Fourth Battalion of Tennessee Cavalry, his command being known as Peck's Light Dragoons. He had served only two months as private when he was promoted to a lieutenantcy. Previous to enlistment, he had assisted to organize another company, but as there was not a probability of their being allowed to go to the front, they were disbanded. His regiment was mostly in Kentucky and upper Tennessee, and he served as first lieutenant until the Wild Cat fight, General Nelson federal commander and General Zollicoffer confederate. The captain of Lieutenant Jackson's company resigned and he was unanimously elected to the position by acclamation. He was in Fisher Creek battle, near his father's old home, in which conflict General Zollicoffer lost his life; our subject's regiment was defeated and fell back into Tennessee. Captain Jackson was in two fights near Vicksburg, but did not participate in the siege. He was captured in the Black River battle and suffered eighteen months at the war prison in Johnson's island near Sandusky, Ohio. Being exchanged, he visited at his old home and then returned to his regiment and was acting colonel until the close of the war. His commission was on its way for a colonelcy when the war closed. Captain Jackson fought hard and long for the cause he thought to be right and after the war returned to his old home only to find the war feeling so strong that his life was in danger. His finances were ruined by the war and what little he could recover he promptly used to liquidate debts he owed for slaves bought on credit. When his debts were all paid, he had little left and so started life anew. For the last two years in his town, Morristown, he was city recorder and was nominated for mayor when he had decided to some west again. He came to The Dalles via San Francisco and Portland, and soon after arriving took the place where he resides at this time. Since then, the Captain has bestowed his labors here with a good measure of success. He is skilled in horticulture and also does some general farming. Captain Jackson is a man of integrity and honor and his keen sense of justice and uprightness are known to all by virtue of a worthy and commendable life.

On June 8, 1859, at Morristown, Mr. Jackson married Miss Elizabeth L. Thurman, the daughter of William M. and Mary (Bibb) Thurman. The mother of Mary Bibb was Elizabeth Lewis, related to Captain Lewis of Lewis and Clark fame. Mrs. Jackson was a member of the well known Thurman family, one of whom was candidate for vice president with Cleveland. Her mother's mother was a member of the Sutherland family, prominent in the south, of Scotch extraction, members of which served in the Revolution, among which was Mrs. Jackson's grandfather. Our subject has two brothers, David C., a captain in the confederate army, for many years postmaster at Summitville, Tennessee, and now farming; George W., a preacher in Denton county, Texas. Also, he has one sister, Elizabeth S., wife of S. M. Sawyers, a civil engineer of DeSoto, Kansas. Mrs. Jackson had one brother, Preston C., an attorney in Bonham, Texas. She had four sisters: Martha C., who dwells with our subject; Mary J., widow of J. B. Jones, of Fannin county, Texas; Lucy V., single, in Texas; and Josephine, wife of Mr. Wood, in Fannin county, Texas. Captain Jackson has five children living: Carrie L., wife of John H. Gerdes, proprietor of Gerdes house in Hood River; William F., a farmer near Moro, this state; John B., living with his father and owner of the adjoining farm; David M., with his father; and Francis R., living on a homestead near his father's home.

It is of interest in this connection to state that our subject was a member of the escort of Jefferson Davis up to the time of the capture. Mr. Davis left the escort the day before the capture to visit his family. Our subject is a Democrat in politics and for twenty-nine years he has been director of the district school where he lives.

He was the prime mover in the organization of the Pine Grove district and has shown commendable interest in the building up of the country. He has twice been nominated for county commissioner, and, although running far ahead of his ticket, still suffered defeat.

ISAAC N. SARGENT, a retired farmer and merchant, living in a beautiful one story cottage on Liberty street, is one of the venerable pioneers of the northwest and stands to-day, high in the admiration and esteem of every person who knows him. He was born in 1817, on September 25, at Chester, Vermont. His father, Isaac Sargent, was also a native of Vermont and married Miss Sallie Pratt, who came from a prominent colonial family and was a native of Vermont. She died in Wisconsin about ten years after her husband who passed away in Vermont, on June 12, 1834 at the old homestead. William Sargent sailed from Northampton, England with his family to Charleston, Massachusetts, in 1638 and since then, the Sargent family has been prominent in business at the bench and bar and in professional life. They are well known throughout New England and elsewhere and are amongst the oldest families in the United States. Four of the William Sargent descendants fought in the Revolution. Samuel Sargent was a member of Captain Seth Washburn's Company of Minute men and his wife, in 1875, melted the weights of the clock and moulded them into bullets for her husband's use in the army. Such acts and many others that could be mentioned, demonstrate the patriotism and spirit of this influential and prominent family. Our subject possesses a history of the Sargent family which dates back many centuries in England, before William Sargent came to the Colonies. A later edition of the same has been compiled by Aaron Sargent, who is a prominent attorney in New York. Our subject has great reason to take pride in his ancestors and their achievements, which indeed has been a great stimulus to mold the success he has reached in a long and useful career.

Isaac N. Sargent was educated in the private schools of his native place and the academy and upon his father's death, went to work in the store, continuing the same until he was of age. In 1838, he went to Wisconsin and there taught school and did farming until 1862, when he came to Oregon with horse teams. Being pleased with The Dalles and the outlook of this country, he settled here, and in The Dalles and eastern Oregon, has been ever since. After farming for some time in this vicinity, he moved to Grant county and filed on a homestead. Four years later, he came thence to Mitchell, Crook county and engaged in the mercantile business for eight years, then sold out and moved to The Dalles, since which time he has been largely retired, living upon the income his industry and wisdom provided. In addition to the home place, he owns other residence property in The Dalles and is one of the substantial men of the country.

On August 4, 1838, at Lowell, Massachusetts, Mr. Sargent married Miss Hannah H. Brown who was born in Springfield, Vermont, on August 19, 1817, the daughter of George and Anna (Bemis) Brown, natives of Vermont. Both are old colonial families and are well known in New England circles. Mr. Sargent has no living brothers or sisters but his wife has one sister, Martha, widow of William Honey in Omaha, Nebraska. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Sargent: Frederick A., a farmer on Five Mile Creek near The Dalles; Chester C., a farmer in the vicinity of The Dalles; Frank, a mining man at Baker City; Fanny, wife of Frank Hunsaker, now deceased; and Hattie, the wife of Edward Wilson, of Portland. They have also raised one adopted daughter, Katherine, who was their grand daughter.

Mrs. Sargent is a member of the Methodist church. Mr. Sargent is a staunch Republican and held these principles long before the Republican party was organized. Mr. and Mrs. Sargent have traveled together in their wedded life for sixty-six years, a most remarkable and pleasant fact. Although both are nearly four score and ten years, still they are active and hearty, with all their faculties unimpaired and are excellent citizens of The Dalles. It is pleasant indeed to be enabled to chronicle the fact that this aged and highly respected couple, who have been pioneers in various sections, are now enabled to enjoy the fruits of their labor in this populous country, where they assisted to open the wilds and bring in civilization.

Since the above was written, the reaper, death, visited Mr. Sargent's home and took hence his beloved and faithful wife. Like the ripened grain, she was ready for the sickle, and having completed life's duties well, she has stepped forward to the rewards awaiting the faithful. The day of departure was December 8, 1904.

PEREZ A. COX lives about five miles south from Hood River in the Odell district, where he has a choice and well improved farm. He was born in Illinois, on October 17, 1854, the son of Abner and Nancy (Barker) Cox, natives of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, respectively. The father was of Dutch extraction and the mother came from an old colonial family prominent in the Revolutionary War. She died when our subject was twenty-eight years of age and the father aged eighty-eight lives with Mr. Cox at the present time. While Mr. Cox was small, the family moved to Iowa and in Wright county he received his education and was reared. When twenty-one, he started out in life for himself and did various kinds of work for a time and then went to Kansas and took up a homestead. For twelve years, he devoted himself to its improvement and cultivation and in 1889, came thence to Hood River. He bought forty acres and remained on the same until 1904, when he traded it for the place where he now lives. Twenty acres of this have been sold and the balance, Mr. Cox is making into a very choice fruit farm. He has recently erected a story and a half cottage, a large barn and outbuildings. A special air of thrift and neatness is evident everywhere and the place is one of the most tasty and valuable in this part of the valley. He has put out seven acres to apples and expects to handle considerable more ground to this profitable fruit. Mr. Cox is still a single man. He has two brothers, Seaman and Judson, both farmers, the former in Hood River and the latter in Kansas.

Politically, our subject is independent, yet he is always active in local affairs and in the campaigns. He is well posted on the questions of the day and is an energetic man.

ELLSWORTH A. HAYNES, who is better known as "Smith" Haynes (the reason for the bestowal of this sobriquet we are not told), is an industrious and leading farmer and stockman of Wasco county. His residence is located on the fertile soil about ten miles east from Boyd, where he has a fine large estate. He was born in Rock Island county, Illinois, on January 9, 1862, the son of Joseph Haynes, who is more especially mentioned elsewhere in this work. When this son was a small boy, the family went to Missouri and there and in Kansas he attended the district schools, completing his education in these important institutions. About two years after his father had come west, or in 1882, our subject was stricken with the western fever and the only hope of recovery was a trip to the Pacific slope. This remedy was speedily administered, and the result is that Wasco county has another of the hustling men of the east a permanent resident of her fertile domain. The same year he filed on a homestead where he now resides and since then he has made this his headquarters. He was soon taken with the great sheep industry of the west and learned sheep shearing. He has wrought at this for twenty years in all parts of the west and is today one of the most expert at the business. He handles readily from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five animals in a day, relieving them of their valuable coats with a dexterity and agility that is marvelous in the eyes of those not sophisticated in this art. Mr. Haynes has made a record of one hundred and fifty-six sheep in one day. Even in the eyes of those accustomed to shearing, this is a wonderful physical feat, and truly it is one which should take its place among the most difficult physical accomplishments that humans have achieved. Mr. Haynes has about one section of land and cultivates to the cereals about three hundred acres. He has excellent crops and in addition to this handles considerable stock. He winters usually about sixty head of cattle, thirty horses and seventy hogs. He has some fine animals and among his hogs he owns one boar, thoroughbred Poland China, of registered stock. Mr. Haynes makes a splendid success of his enterprises and is one of the prosperous men of the county today.

On October 16, 1886, at his father's house, on the ranch, Mr. Haynes married Miss Emily M. Craft, the daughter of Jacob Craft, who is mentioned in this work elsewhere. To this union five children have been born, Albert W., Omer K., Pearl, Ruby, and Thomas. Mr. Haynes is a member of the I. O. O. F., the Encampment, and the M. W. A. He is a good strong Republican and is often at the conventions, while he serves as road supervisor and school director. He and his wife are highly esteemed people, they both come from prominent families and have hosts of friends.

WILLIAM R. HAYNES. Wasco county is not wanting in progressive and intelligent farmers and among that number, well up in the roll, we are constrained to mention the gentleman whose name heads this article. He is a man of ability and integrity and has displayed this in a many years' residence here. A detailed account of his career will be interesting to the citizens of this county and we append the same with pleasure.

William R. Haynes was born in Michigan, near Jackson, on December 26, 1853, the son of Joseph Haynes, of whom we have already written. When this boy was two years of age, the family went to Rock Island, Illinois, and there in the First ward schools, William received his education. When sixteen, he went with his father and the balance of the family to Garnet, Kansas, and there he engaged in teaming. Later he rented four acres of garden land near town and to teaming, and farming this he gave his time. One winter he spent in hunting buffalo and many a fine animal has he taken. When the family removed to Nevada, Missouri, he rented land with his father and in that Missouri town, he met the lady who afterward became his wife. In 1879, he came with his father to the Pacific coast and he took railroad land on Centre ridge. This he abandoned a year later and sold his improvements to his father. Then he went to California and spent one year in logging among the giant redwood forests of the Golden State. Then he returned to Kansas and there married the lady who had captured his heart before he left Nevada, Missouri. The wedding occurred at the home of the bride's father, Jacob Craft, who is mentioned in this work. The lady was Mary K. Craft, who was born in Newport, Kentucky, on March 7, 1860. Then, accompanied by his father-in-law and others, Mr. Haynes made the trip overland to Oregon, which was a unique wedding journey and one which possessed many charms of its own. He filed a homestead on land where he now lives and since then he has purchased seven forties from his father, and a quarter section from his brother. Altogether he has six hundred and eighty acres of good land. He raises wheat, barley and other crops and devotes much attention to handling stock. Mr. Haynes believes in the right theory that it is as easy to raise a good animal as a poor one, and the returns are much better, so he has choice breeds of all kinds of stock that he handles. He owns a registered three year old Hereford bull, Patience, No. 124099 which is a choice animal, sired by Premiere Dam Arminta Second, and raised by the well known breeder, O. Harris of Harris, Missouri. With this animal he has also many other well bred ones and his herd is about sixty. He also owns Lafayette, the well known Clyde-Percheron stallion and twenty other horses. Besides this he has two hundred hogs, well bred, and a choice Poland China registered boar. He owns the Hereford animal in partnership with his brother, Ellsworth. Mr. Haynes is a skilled man in stock breeding and has some of the best animals to be found in this part of the country. He is prosperous and a leading man of the county.

To Mr. and Mrs. Haynes the following named children have been born: Lee, aged twenty; Floyd, aged eighteen; Hallie, aged fourteen; Paul J., two months old; Rqsanna, sixteen; Gladys, thirteen, and Edith J., two years old. In politics, Mr. Haynes is independent and always takes an intelligent interest in the affairs of the county and state. He is school director and has been off and on, for many years. He and his wife are well known and popular people and win many friends by their many excellent qualities.

THEODORE J. SEUFERT, of the firm of Seufert Brothers, is one of the leading business men in The Dalles. He has been closely identified with commercial interests here for a good many years and has shown himself to be a man of ability and integrity and has so wisely managed his business enterprises that he has won a remarkable success in the same. He was born in Queen's county, New York, on January 3, 1859. His father, John Seufert, was a native of Germany and came to the United States when nineteen years old locating first in New York city, where he followed his trade of tailoring for many years. Then he moved to Long Island and operated a summer resort hotel and did farming until his death in 1870. Our subject was educated in the public schools of New York city then employed in a gents furnishing and dry goods business. In 1878, he came to San Francisco and learned the butcher trade and in 1882, came to The Dalles to join his brother, Frank A., who had come west previous to our subject's journey. They went into partnership in The Dalles in the meat business but after one year they found it unprofitable and engaged in buying fruit from local raisers to ship to Montana, Idaho and other eastern points. They shipped the first carload of fruit ever sent out of the state over the Northern Pacific and probably the first ever shipped over that road. Soon after that, they began to purchase salmon and can them. In 1885, they leased the Whitcomb fishery and the next year subleased a part of the plant for canning to parties in Portland for ten years and furnished them fish for canning. In 1896, the Seufert brothers purchased the whole establishment and since then have conducted it themselves. They have a capacity of fifteen hundred cases daily and in the season employ one hundred and twenty-five people. The business has been a success from the time they first began it and is one of the large enterprises of the coast.

On June 20, 1886, at Kingsley, Mr. Seufert married Miss Mary A. McGrail, a native of Philadelphia. Her father was accidentally killed when she was small. The mother, Sarah (Brookhouse) McGrail, a native of Ireland, then married Patrick J. Gorman and they now live on Ninth street in The Dalles. Our subject has one brother, his partner and four sisters, Louisa A.

Wenner, Mary Walter, Katie Hoffman, and Theresa A. Kudicker. Mrs. Seufert has two brothers, John and Patrick J. and one half brother, Richard J. Gorman. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Seufert, J. Roger, Theodore J., Jr., Leland and Mildred M.

Mr. Seufert is a member of the K. P. and the Elks.

FRANK R. STRATTON, a genial and popular young man of Wasco county, is, also, one of its leading farmers and business men. He is in charge of three to four thousand acres of land, part situated on the Des Chutes, and part on the fertile upland five miles south from Dufur. On the former ranch he cultivates five hundred acres, and at the latter place he handles one thousand. The estates are the property of Hon. M. A. Moody, one of Wasco county's heaviest land owners. The Des Chutes ranch is a fine peach producing place and the orchard there shipped twelve hundred boxes of fruit last year. It is a valuable place and in the hands of Mr. Stratton, has been made one of the most productive and profitable ranches in this part of the county. When Mr. Stratton took charge of these two farms, they were not in a thrifty condition, but were run down and not paying well. He has brought to bear, not only energy and enterprise, but a wealth of sagacity and skill that have secured the happy results that now they are two of the finest farms in the county. They are both paying well and show a master hand in their conduct. Mr. Stratton is a thorough man and allows no detail to escape his attention. He has had the best of training in farming, and consequently the management of two such large properties is exactly in line with his ability and liking. The excellent order, the thrift evident, and the annual returns of good dividends all combine to manifest the ability and up-to-date ways of Mr. Stratton. He is popular and liked by all and stands one of the leading young men of this part of the county. Frequently he is at the county conventions and strongly supports his party, the Republican.

Frank R. Stratton was born in Queens county, New Brunswick, on February 8, 1869, the son of Samuel and Rebecca (Parkhill) Stratton. The father was born in New Brunswick, and followed farming. His ancestors were Scotch-Irish people. The mother was a native of Ireland and owns county Kerry as her native place. Our subject was reared and educated mostly in his native land, then completed his training here on the Pacific coast, having come to Pacific county, Washington with his parents about 1880.

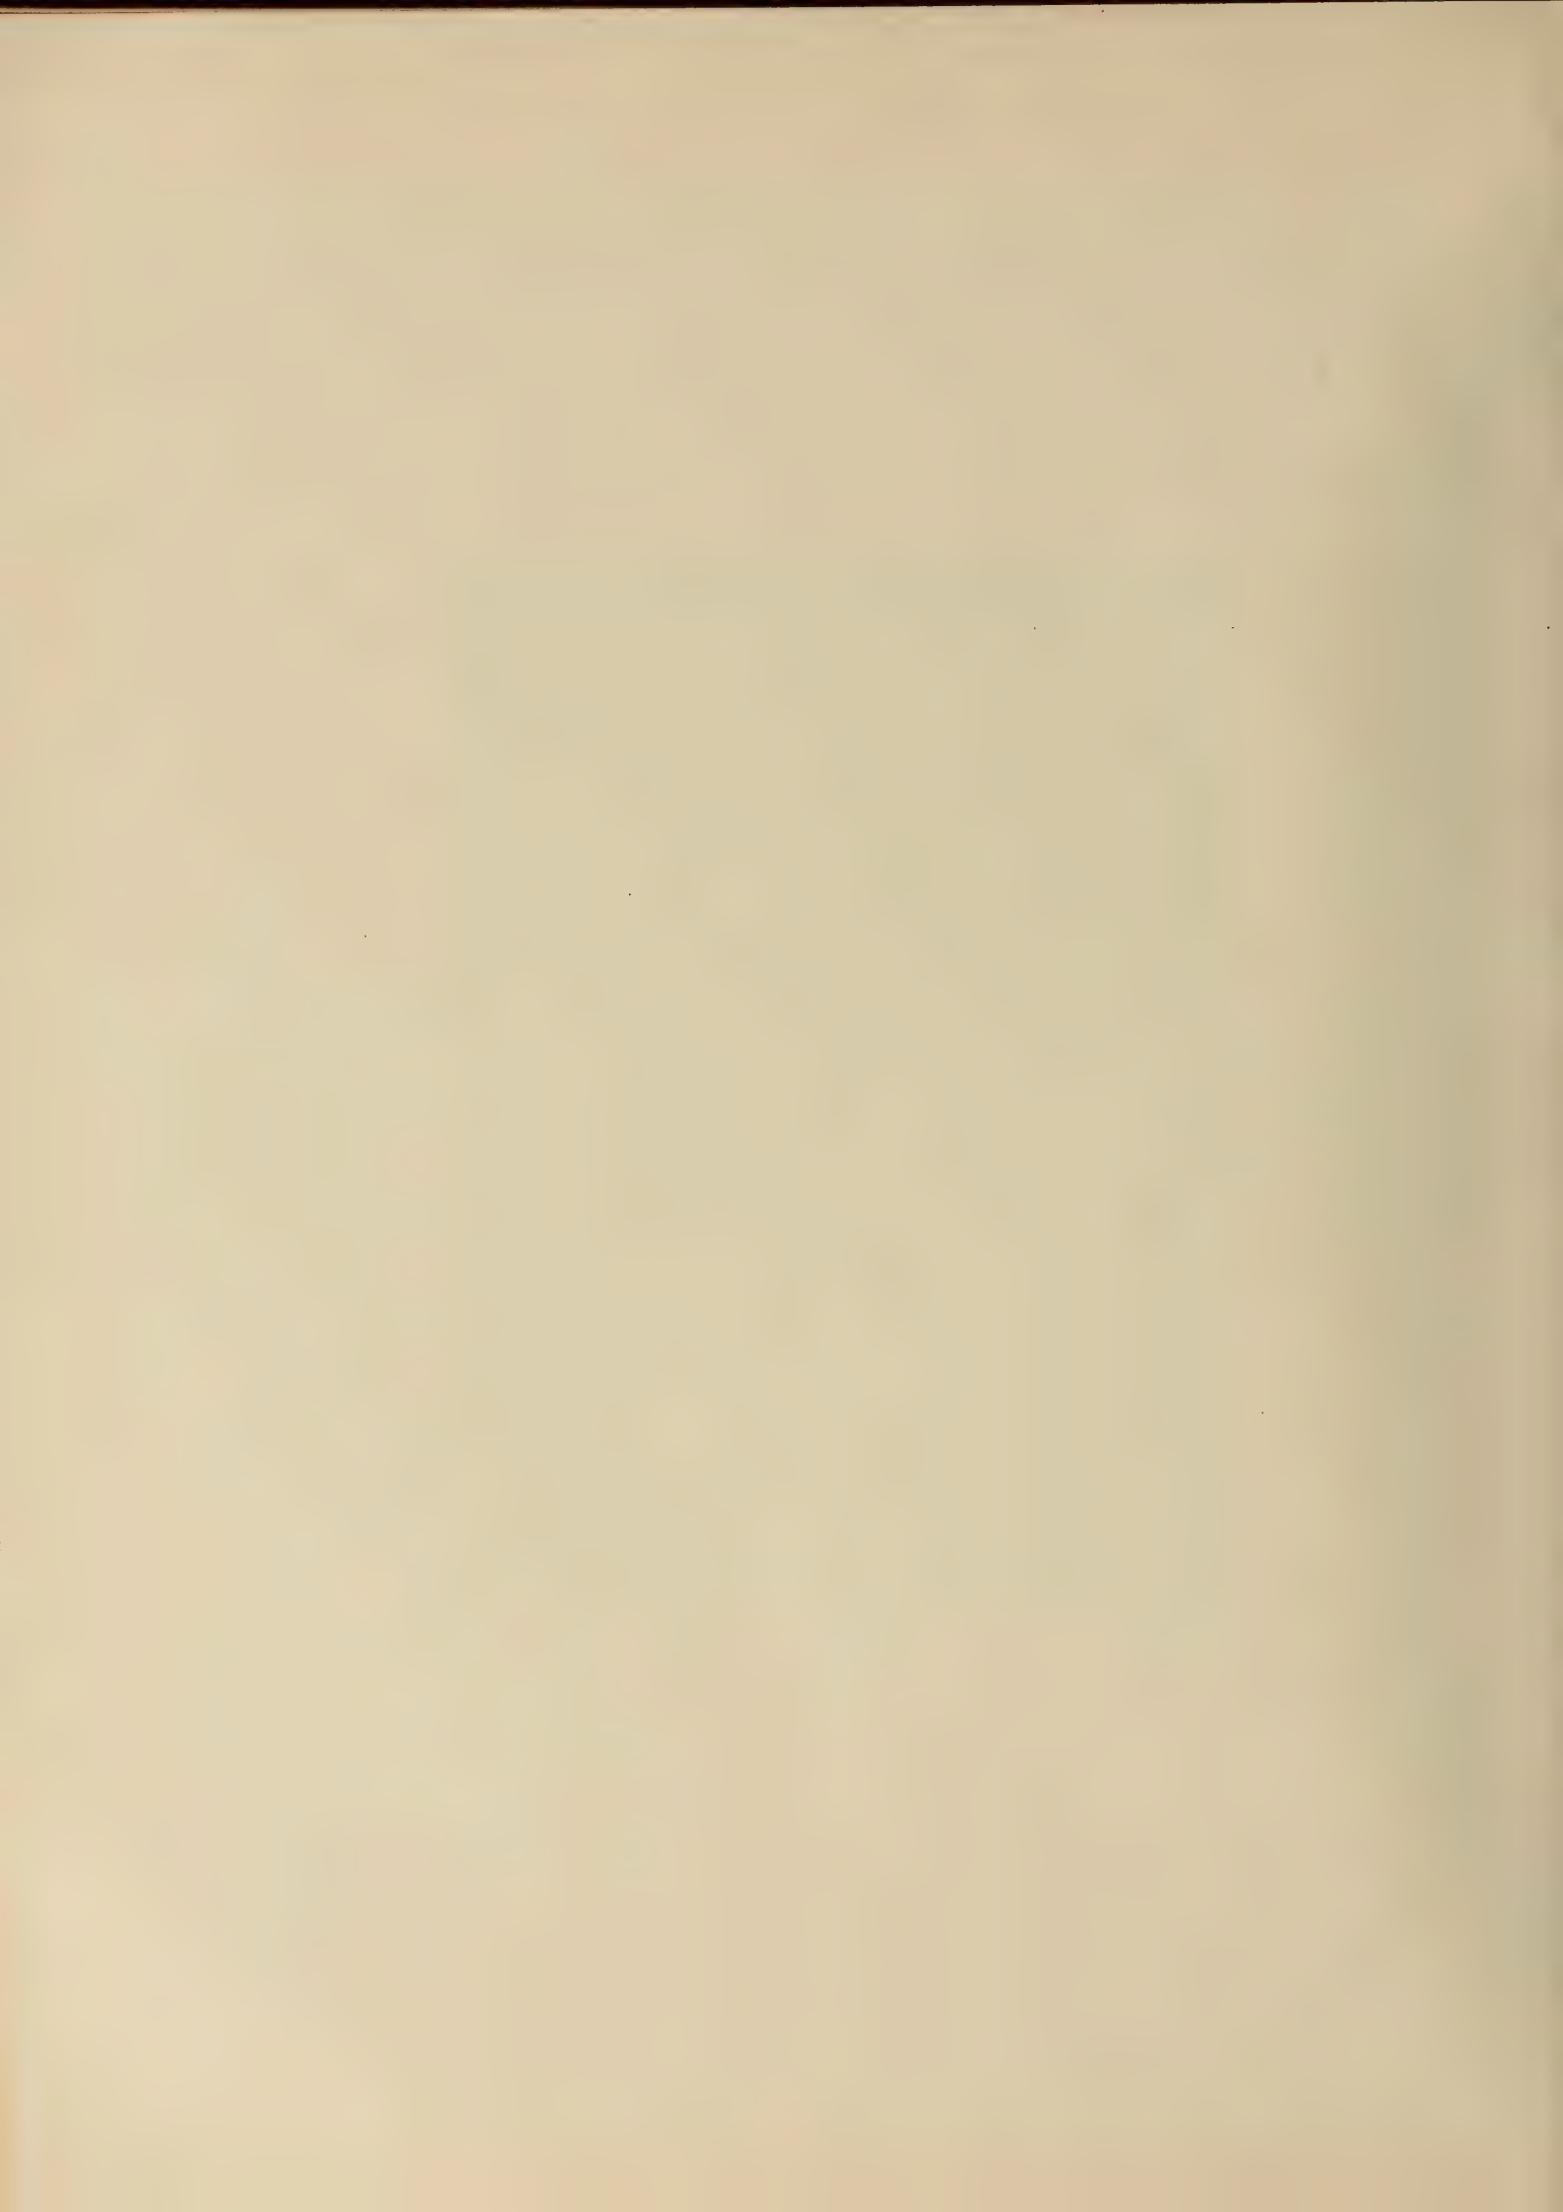

His father bought land in the Willapa valley and for several summers operated a summer hotel resort. He and his wife are now dwelling in that valley with their son, J. Thomas. Our subject followed various callings in Pacific county, then bought thirty-two acres of bottom land which he tilled two or three years. Then he sold it and migrated to Wasco county and wrought on the farms for several years, after which he took charge of the estates mentioned and since that time has been successfully conducting them. His brothers and sisters are J. Thomas and Evermond, loggers in Willapa valley; Stephen L., a farmer there; Corressa A., wife of John Gilbert, a preacher in the Methodist church in Clarke county, Washington; Lovicia, the wife of John Morgan, a logger in Pacific county; Evedna, wife of Mr. Finch, in Dawson, Alaska; and Mrs. Amelia Sperrill, in Seattle. Mr. Stratton is a member of the I. O. O. F., and the Encampment, and is a highly respected citizen.

F. LEROY GRIMES, of the firm of Parkins, Grimes & Company, who have a large and beautiful book and music store at 314 E. Second street, The Dalles, was born on Fifteenmile Creek, eight miles out from Dufur, on October 24, 1881. His parents are mentioned in another portion of this work. Being thus a native son of Wasco county, Mr. Grimes is doubly entitled to representation in any work that purports to speak of the leading men of the country. His early educational training was received at The Dalles graded schools and then he completed the same at Pacific University at Forest Grove, Oregon. In 1900, he completed his studies then returned home to take up the cattle business. After a few months in the same, however, he found it not congenial to his tastes, consequently, he disposed of his property to his father and accepted a position as bookkeeper with J. H. Smith & Company, hardware merchants of Grass Valley, Sherman county, Oregon. For nine months he labored in this capacity then resigned his position to take up the business that he is now following. He entered into partnership with Herby D. Parkins and from that time until the present they have been attending strictly to the building up of a fine trade. They have a choice stock of all the late books, artworks and literature, carrying all kinds of musical supplies and handle all the leading brands of pianos, organs and other musical instruments. Owing to their ability, their push and their integrity, they have secured both the confidence of the people and a large patronage and are making their store one of the best in Oregon. They are both respected business men and are highly esteemed in this county.

Frank R. Stratton

Mr. Grimes has never seen fit to retire from the quiet joys of bachelorhood, although a very popular young man.

Fraternally, he is affiliated with the K. P. and the I. O. O. F. In politics, he is a strong Republican but not particularly active. He is a product of Wasco county in which the county may well take pride, and bids fair to become a leading business man of the country.

ELMER E. FERGUSON, M. D., one of Oregon's leading physicians, is handling a large practice in The Dalles in connection with Dr. Reuter, who is also mentioned in this work. He was born in Missouri, on December 3, 1869, the son of James M. and Mary M. (Marquis) Ferguson, natives of Missouri and Indiana, respectively. The father's ancestors came of strong Scotch blood and were among the earliest settlers in Jamestown, Virginia. They have been a prominent and leading family in America since the days of colonial times. The parents now dwell in Pendleton, Oregon. The mother's father was a preacher of the United Brethren denomination and died in Indiana. Our subject studied in the graded schools in Missouri until 1878, when he came west with the family and completed the high school course in Pendleton. After that he graduated from the commercial college and the same year matriculated in the Willamette University. After completing his course there he entered the Rush Medical College in Chicago and graduated with distinction in 1897. Then he returned home and after a visit spent considerable time in traveling to different portions of the globe. He was as far north as the Arctic circle and finally went to New York and took an extended post graduate course in the Polyclinic of New York city. He returned to Oregon and established himself in practice in The Dalles. Here, in 1900, Dr. Ferguson married Dr. Belle Rinehart and together they continued in practice. Their wedding occurred on February 24, 1900, and the following fall they began the erection of a hospital, which was completed in the spring. They operated it together one year and then Dr. Reuter was taken into partnership. He was an old room and classmate of Dr. Ferguson and they had studied together for years. Since his coming here he has been actively engaged in practice with our subject and they are considered physicians of great ability and skill. The hospital mentioned is one of the best equipped institutions in the west. It is built according to the latest approved plans and having been recently erected has had the advantage of every point known to medical science in the entire world. The appliances are the best and most perfect made and The Dalles is to be congratulated in securing a modern institution like this.

Dr. Ferguson has one brother, William S., and three sisters, Ida Peringer, Laura Lieuallen, and Mrs. May Adams. One child has been born to Dr. and Mrs. Ferguson, Ruth, on November 12, 1901. Dr. Ferguson is a member of the I. O. O. F., of the Elks, of the W. W., of the M. W. A., and of the K. O. T. M.

JOHN A. REUTER, M. D., who, with Dr. Ferguson mentioned in another portion of this work, is handling the hospital in The Dalles, is a skillful surgeon and a physician of marked ability. He has had the finest training to be found in the civilized world and this added to a native ability of generous endowment, makes Dr. Reuter one of the men sought after over a large scope of country, and especially so as he stands high with his colleagues. He was born in Kaukauna, Wisconsin, on January 2, 1876, the son of Alexander L. and Christina Reuter, natives of Germany. The father came to this country with his parents when three years of age. They settled near Milwaukee, Wisconsin and the father followed farming and mason work. Alexander was well educated and soon became of prominence in the commercial and manufacturing world, and later was a prominent banker. He died in 1893, at Jacksonville, Oregon. The mother was brought by her parents to this country when an infant of two years. They settled near the Reuters in Wisconsin and she grew up and was educated there. John A. came with his parents to Jacksonville, Oregon, in 1884. There the father took up the real estate business and this son was placed in the best schools. After studying in the grades, he went to Saint Marys in Oakland, California, and later was a student in the Willamette University. From that institution he went direct to the well known Rush Medical College, in Chicago, and received his degree in 1897. Returning to Oregon, he was interne in the St. Vincent hospital in Portland for one year and then came to the eastern part of the state and took charge of the hospital for the Snake river railroad, where they were employing four thousand men, for one year. After that service was completed with distinction, Dr. Reuter went to Europe and spent eighteen months in the leading medical institutions at London, Vienna and Berlin. Then he established himself in practice in Portland and a year later joined his old classmate, Dr. Ferguson at The Dalles, where they have been associated for the time since and are handling a large practice, besides operating one of the most complete hospitals on the coast. Dr. Reuter is a member of the Elks, of the Red Men, of the A. O. U. W., and of the United Artisans. He is known far and near as one of the most skillful surgeons in the northwest and has certainly demonstrated his ability in many delicate and trying cases.

CLAYTON M. GRIMES, a prominent stock raiser of eastern Oregon, who resides at The Dalles, was born in Scio, Lane county, Oregon, on May 24, 1849. His parents reside at North Yakima, Washington. The district schools of his native country and eastern Oregon furnished the educational training of our subject and at the age of seventeen, he began to ride the range. For a while he worked for Colonel Nye then was in the employ of other prominent stockmen until twenty-six years of age, when he engaged in the stock business for himself at Grass Valley. From that time until the present, he has continued in this important enterprise and has achieved a marked success in the same. In addition to various other interests throughout the country, he owns an eleven hundred acre stock ranch in Malheur county, Oregon. He is a worthy and substantial citizen and has labored wisely and assiduously both in his private enterprises and for the general welfare of the country.

At The Dalles, in 1880, Mr. Grimes married Miss Susan E. Shearer, a native of Colorado. She is an adopted daughter of Joseph H. Shearer of Shearer Bridge, Sherman county. Her own father is A. W. Turner, who lives in Malheur county, Oregon. Her mother died when she was an infant. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Grimes, F. Leroy, of the firm of Parkins and Grimes, mentioned elsewhere in this volume; Pearl, a music teacher at home. Mr. Grimes has one brother, Clamon, mining at Dawson City, and four sisters, Cornelia, Amelia, Clara and Nettie. Mrs. Grimes has one brother, John Turner, a butcher in Malheur county. Mr. Grimes belongs to the K. P. and is a good staunch Republican.

GUSTAV E. BARTELL, a mechanic of excellent ability, is one of The Dalles' leading business men, and has demonstrated his worth and integrity here for years. He is owner and operator of a large shop where he handles an extended trade as blacksmith, wagon maker, and painter. He employs three men all the time and more in the busy seasons. Mr. Bartell has his shop fitted for all kinds of work and is a master in handling tools and directing intricate jobs of all kinds. He has gained a fine reputation as a builder of first class stage coaches and his vehicles are used all over this western country. He takes great pride in his work and operates on the motto that what is worth doing is worth well doing. No job ever leaves his shops that is not completed in first class shape and in the best style of the art.

Gustav E. Bartell was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on June 29, 1875. His father, Gustav P. Bartell, was born in Germany, came to the United States in 1874 and followed harness making and saddlery until his death in The Dalles, on January 14, 1894. He had married Miss Julianna Loux, a native of Germany, also, and now living in The Dalles. In 1888, the family came to Oregon and settled in Pendleton, where two years were spent. Then came the move to The Dalles, and here our subject has remained since. He graduated from the high school here in 1895 and then completed his trade, which he had been learning during the vacations for three years previous. He wrought for George T. Thompson and also for L. L. Lane. In 1899, Mr. Bartell purchased the shops and business of St. Arnold and Schoren, and since that time has conducted the business, adding to it as the patronage increased, until he has one of the best equipped shops in this part of the state. He does all kinds of wagon and carriage building and blacksmithing and vehicle painting. Mr. Bartell is a genial and social man and has many friends. He lives with his mother and two brothers. Conner; Minnie, a milliner in The Dalles; and Martha, a teacher in Wasco county. Mr. Bartell is a member of the K. P. and past C. C. He is captain of Company D, Third Oregon National Guards. He organized this company from the members of the defunct Company G, during the Spanish war and has been captain for five years. His zeal and labors have accomplished much for the organization and he is well posted in military tactics. His brother, Max, enlisted in Company L, Second Oregon Volunteers at the first call and was in the twenty-eight engagements of his regiment in the Philippines. Our subject's regiment was the first to enter Manila and he participated in the event. He was sergeant and served for seventeen months. Our subject deserves great credit for the zeal and spirit displayed in the organization of his company and for the manner in which he has enthused the minds of all to keep it in good shape to the present.

The mother, Alzina (Dimick) Bonney, was a native of Ohio and came across the plains with her father and stepmother in 1847, settlement being made near Woodburn, Oregon. Her father died there in 1863. Her mother had died when she was two weeks old and her step mother died in 1860. Our subject's grandfather died in 1868, having been a physician of the old school. The father and mother of our subject died July 22, 1904, and April 2, 1897, respectively. The district schools furnished his education until he entered the Willamette University whence he graduated in 1871. Then he taught at Buena Vista and other points until March 1, 1875, when he bought a flock of six hundred sheep and filed on a government claim where he now resides in Tygh valley. He has purchased railroad land and other until he has an estate of fifteen hundred acres, half of which is tillable. He irrigates one hundred and sixty acres. This is especially rich bottom land and produces from five to six tons of alfalfa per acre annually. Mr. Bonney continued in sheep raising for twenty-five years and as the range began gradually to be used up, he sold his sheep and began the above business. He has seventy-five fine dairy cows and expects soon to handle one hundred. He has some of the finest stock in the state, among which may be mentioned, one bull, Linour, which took first prize at The Dalles fair and one cow, Moma B., which also took first prize. DR. BELLE (RINEHART) FERGUSON needs no introduction to the people of Wasco county or the surrounding country, for her professional services and her high standing as a lady of refinement and culture have won for her hosts of admirers from every quarter and she is rightly considered one of the leading physicians of central Oregon. Her birth occurred in Kansas and when still an infant she was brought by her parents, Daniel J. and Arvazena (Spillman) Cooper, who are mentioned in another portion of this work, to The Dalles. After completing a thorough public and high school education, Miss Cooper entered St. Helens Hall, in Portland and pursued literary studies farther. Then she matriculated at the state university medical department and graduated at Portland in 1897. For two years subsequent to that event, we find Dr. Rinehart practicing in The Dalles, and then seeing the vast fields of erudition to be had, and well knowing the need of especial skill and knowledge in the all important profession of medicine, we find the doctor in the famous Polyclinic institution in New York where she took a thorough post graduate course. Returning to The Dalles, she was married to Dr. Ferguson, of whom mention is made in another place of this work.

Formerly, Miss Cooper married Dr. Willard E. Rinehart, who was born near Albany, Oregon. He was a member of the well known Rinehart family of Oregon, representatives of which are in various portions of the state. The doctor was for some time professor of anatomy in the Willamette University, Oregon. He was a skilled and leading physician, having been graduated from the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, and the Bellevue Medical College of New York city. The marriage of Dr. Rinehart and Miss Cooper occurred in The Dalles, in 1881, and to them four children were born, named as follows: Willard S., in the United States naval service; J. Carl and H. Earl, twins, the former a graduate of the Agricultural College at Corvallis, and the latter now studying; and Phillip C., at college in Corvallis.

Mrs. Rinehart commenced the study of medicine under the direction of her former husband and then completed as mentioned above. Dr. Rinehart died in 1893.

Mrs. Dr. Ferguson is connected with her husband and Dr. Reuter in the management of the fine hospital which they have erected in The Dalles, a cut of which appears elsewhere in this work.

DAVID C. WILSON is a well known farmer residing on Center Ridge. He was born in Adams county, Illinois, on December 15, 1844. His parents, David and Amanda (Hiler) Wilson, were natives of Bourbon county, Kentucky and died in 1869 and 1895, respectively. The father's parents were born in Virginia and pioneered to Kentucky. David C. was reared principally in Illinois, and there, too, received his education, the district schools supplying that important fortification for the battles of life. He remained under the parental roof until the year of his majority and then he began working out for the nearby farmers, and also for his father. Then, in 1868, he went to Nevada, Missouri, and in 1870, returned thence to the home place in Illinois and purchased a portion of the old homestead. After cultivating that some time, he went to Texas, then returned to Nevada and in 1888, came thence to Oregon. He wrought at the carpenter trade in The Dalles, which he had learned in earlier years and made his home in that city until 1900, when he came to his present place and filed a homestead. Since that time, he has devoted himself to farming and is one of the men whose labors have been bestowed with an industry and energy that bring good results.

On April 28, 1869, Mr. Wilson married Miss Susan A., daughter of Samuel and Sarah (Wilson) Hinkson, natives of Kentucky. The mother was a distant relative of Mr. Wilson. Mrs. Wilson was born in Lewis county, Missouri. She has two sisters, Mrs. Elmira Wilson, and Mrs. Martha Wilson. Mr. Wilson has four brothers, James H., John A., Daniel, and Joseph, and three sisters, Mrs. Delilah H. Yates, Mrs. Fanny Cummings, and Mrs. Margaret Horney. To Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, twelve children have been born, named as follows: Elmer O., Thomas, Floyd, near their father and dwelling on farms; Everett and Charles, at home; Alice A., wife of Ebon Butser, a farmer near Nansene; Effie, the wife of Bert H. Haynes, mentioned in this work; Hattie, the wife of David Reardan, in The Dalles; Rosie, Minnie, and Nellie, single; and Ethel Pearl, the twin sister of Everett; she died at The Dalles when fourteen. Mrs. Wilson owns land in addition to the quarter section which her husband owns. They are good substantial people and have labored long and well to build up the country.

VIRGIL WINCHELL has the distinction of having been born in the Hood River valley. This event occurred on August 31, 1865 on his father's homestead, a part of which he rents and resides upon at the present time, and which lies a short distance from the town of Hood River. The father, Jerome W., was a native of Calais, Maine and came from an old colonial family of prominence. Governor Winchell of Massachusetts and other leading men were members of this family. Jerome W. Winchell married Julia Neal, who was born while her parents were crossing the plains. Her father, Peter Neal, was a prominent settler of the east side of the Hood River valley. Our subject's father came to Oregon in 1857, via the isthmus and was married at The Dalles in 1860 and came to the Hood River valley one year later, where he took up land and resided six years. Owing to his illness, he returned to The Dalles and there died in 1870. His widow returned to the farm with her four children and there lived until 1888, the year of her death. In 1873, she was married to John Divers. Our subject has made his home here all of the time and on April 2, 1887 at Hood River was married to Maggie Knapp, a native of California, whose parents, George and (Vealy) Knapp, were natives of New York and Michigan, respectively. The father was a wealthy railroad contractor and the mother died when Mrs. Winchell was eleven years of age. Mr. Winchell had one brother, Markham, who died in 1899; five half brothers, Divers, James, Perry, John and Newton; two full sisters, Josephine Ditmer and Arabella Hoffman; and three half sisters, Dollie English, Mary Sellinger and Julia Estes. Mrs. Winchell has one brother, Clarence, and one sister, Minnie Sorenson. Mr. and Mrs. Winchell are the parents of seven children, Arline, Edith, George, Grace, Joseph W., Maude, and Lena.

Fraternally, Mr. Winchell is allied with the W. W., the United Artisans and the Foresters. He is a stanch Democrat and takes a keen interest in the campaign. He has served for many years on the school board and is a zealous advocate of better educational facilities. He and his wife are both members of the Union church and are substantial people.

ALBERT I. MASON, a leading horticulturist of the Hood River valley, lives about four miles south from town. He has a good place and has bestowed much labor in improving the same. His birth occurred on April 26, 1860, and his parents are Jerome B. and Harriett (Rumbaugh) Mason, natives of Ohio and Pennsylvania, respectively. Both are now living. Our subject was educated in the public and normal schools of Missouri and began teaching soon after his graduation. Later, he went to Kansas and filed on a preemption upon which he proved up then returned to Missouri and taught school one winter in his home district. The next year, he went to Kansas and filed on a piece of land for the relinquishment of which he paid seven hundred dollars. After commuting on the same, he went to work as a carpenter in building depots for the Rock Island railroad. This trade he had learned in his younger days. Later, we see him in Kansas City laboring at the same trade. Then he left his family with relatives in the east and came to Portland, landing in that metropolis with two dollars. He followed the carpenter trade until 1893, when he passed the civil service examination for a letter carrier. In that capacity, he worked in the Portland office for nine years. In 1896, he purchased eighty acres in the Hood River country which was covered with heavy pine timber, paying nine dollars and twenty-five cents per acre. His family resided here and he remained in the Portland office for six years longer. Mrs. Mason took charge of the improvements of the farm while her husband was away and wisely expended the money in getting a nice orchard started and had a three years orchard growing when he arrived. They now have five hundred bearing trees and sixteen acres that will soon be bearing. Owing to a fraudulent nurseryman who sold him trees different from the kind he ordered, Mr. Mason has been set back some in the fruit industry and was compelled to cut down a great many acres and graft them to the proper varieties otherwise he would have a great many more trees bearing. They expect to plant about seventeen acres more to apples which will make one of the largest orchards in the valley.

Mr. Mason has one brother, Thomas O., and one half brother, James Swindler, and two half sisters, Maude Meyers and Lula Swindley.

At Nescatunga, Kansas, on September 9, 1889, Mr. Mason married Miss Ollie Magill, a native of Tennessee and the daughter of John W. and Jennie L. (Taylor) Magill, also natives of Tennessee. Her father died in Indian Territory, in June, 1892, and the mother is living at Oklahoma City. Mrs. Mason has one brother, William F., and three sisters, Mrs. Dora Foster, Miss Orva, and Mrs. Allie Russell. The last was born on April 6, 1873 and died in Indian Territory in 1898. Mr. Mason is serving his second term as president of the Hood River Apple Growers' union, having been the only incumbent of that office. He was one of the organizers of the union and has labored zealously for its prosperity.

Mr. and Mrs. Mason have two children, Thomas Floyd, born on the farm, on August 27, 1900, and Hattie Joy, born September 13, 1891, at Portland. Mr. Mason is a member of the Letter Carrier's Mutual Benefit Association of Portland and was president of that branch when he left the service. Formerly, Mrs. Mason followed dressmaking and was in that capacity when she met Mr. Mason. Our subject's father was in the Civil War, Company D, Second Missouri Cavalry, and came west with the G. A. R. excursion last fall. Mrs. Mason's father enlisted in Company K, First Tennessee Infantry and later was promoted to the office of captain, the former captain being forced to resign owing to the mutiny of the company. Mr. Mason enlisted for three years which continued for nine months longer after his term of enlistment and was mustered out during the battle of Atlanta. He was in very active service during all the time.

EBER R. BRADLEY, a stirring business man of Hood River, owns and operates a first class job printing office. He is an expert in his business and turns out excellent work. He was born in the vicinity of Coburg, Northumberland county, Ontario, on March 18, 1862, and when thirteen went with his parents to Sault Ste.

Marie, where he remained until twenty-two. His parents, George W. and Julia M. (Carter) Bradley, were natives of Canada. The maternal grandfather was born in Ireland and his wife was a native of England. He died in Canada, on August 19, 1886 and the widow passed away in Tacoma, in 1898. Our subject entered the printing office when fourteen and learned the trade thoroughly. Later he spent two years on a farm, then sold the property and went to Nebraska, where he took a homestead. Later he sold this and established the Litchfield Monitor, an independent Republican organ, which he operated with a job office for seven years. Then he sold out and went to Texas, where he launched the Deepwater Enterprise, which suspended after a year in the field. Then Mr. Bradley raised cotton and finally went to the printing business again in Houston. It was October, 1899, that he sold out and came to Hood River, where he leased the Sun, which was discontinued a few months later. Since then, Mr. Bradley has given his attention to the job printing business, and is doing well. He handled the stationery business with this but sold the same recently to George I. Slocum.

On May 24, 1882, at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, Mr. Bradley married Miss Sarah A. Lamo, who was born in Woodstock, Ontario, in 1865, September 27. Her parents and brothers and sisters are mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mr. Bradley has one brother, George Willis, and five sisters, Mrs. Esther M. Hubbert, Mrs. Sally M. Christner, Mrs. Samantha A. Stephenson, Mrs. Rebecca S. Perry, and Mrs. Martha L. Irvine. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bradley, Pearl E., on November 30, 1889, and Eldon R., on April 20, 1892. Mr. Bradley is a member of the I. O. O. F., the K. P., the A. O. U. W., the M. W. He is a member of the Hood River Commercial Club, and during his life has held various offices as postmaster, justice of the peace, city councilman and others. He is a popular young man and has many friends, who esteem him for his worth and his integrity.

POLK BUTLER is to be classed as one of the builders of Wasco county for he has labored here steadily for a quarter of a century and has so bestowed his industry and conducted himself that he has won a good holding of property and the esteem of his fellows.

Polk Butler was born in Indiana, on September 25, 1845, the son of Isaac and Ann L. (Jones) Butler, the former a native of Virginia, descended from old colonial settlers, and the latter born in Ohio. The father died in Warren county, Illinois, in 1875. The mother lives in Illinois, aged ninety-five. In his native place our subject was reared and educated, attending the district schools a part of each year and the remainder of the time being spent on the farm with his father. When eighteen, he went with the balance of the family to Illinois and in Monmouth of that state he married Miss Dell Coy. She was born in Indiana, the daughter of Hiram and Phoebe (Mindenhall) Coy, natives of North and South Carolina, respectively. The father died when Mrs. Butler was six years of age. Her mother later married Mr. Shelby and now is a widow living in California. Mrs. Butler's parents were among the early pioneers of Indiana, and her mother and Mrs. Shelby were pioneers to Oregon. In 1879, Mr. Butler came to Oregon and sought out a homestead, where he now lives. The place lies about one and one half miles southeast from Nansene. To the original homestead Mr. Butler has added by purchase until he has an estate of four hundred and eighty acres, two hundred of which he is cultivating to grain at this time. In 1861, he enlisted in Company K, Twenty-fourth Ohio Infantry, and served until June, 1865, when he was honorably discharged at Washington, D. C. For eight months he was detailed to handle stock in the quartermaster's department. He was under almost constant fire for the years of his service, and honorably did the part of the brave defender of the nation's flag. He participated in the battles of Green Brier, Cheat Mountain, Murfreesboro, Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, all of the engagements before Corinth, and in all of those participated in by the Army of the Cumberland. He was at Missionary Ridge, Lookout Mountain and many others, with skirmishes too numerous to mention. In many of these, Mr. Cuning was in imminent danger and once his clothing was riddled with bullets but he never suffered a wound and was active from the time of his enlistment to the day he was mustered out. After the Rebellion was put down, he returned to milling in Ohio, and in 1869 moved to Missouri where he lived for twenty-five years and followed milling. He was postmaster for four years at Mt. Moriah, Harrison county, Missouri, and owned a mill for six years. During the whole twenty-five years of his residence in Missouri, he was school director and prominent in politics and educational matters. GEORGE PERKINS, a well known and industrious agriculturist of Mount Hood, was born in Gloucestershire, England, on December 14, 1841. His parents were John and Sarah (Gibbs) Perkins, natives of the same place and now deceased. Until 1882, our subject labored in his native land and then went direct from England to New Zealand and after one year in that country, came to San Francisco, whence he made his way to Oregon and settled in the Antelope valley for one year. After that, he resided in the Hood River country and remained there a short time, near where the town of Hood River is now located. After that, he spent a little while at Mosier, then he came to the place where we now find him. The land was in dispute between the government and the railroad and he settled on a quarter section which reverted to the government and upon which he proved up. Mr. Perkins took out his citizenship papers at The Dalles one year after arriving here.

He has bestowed his labors upon the farm since settlement and has now a good portion under cultivation and owns eighty acres, having sold eighty. He is a man of good standing in the community, industrious and enterprising and has many friends.

On March 1, 1895, at Mount Hood, Mr. Perkins married Mrs. Ann Demmic, a sister of the well known pioneer, David R. Cooper. By her former marriage, Mrs. Perkins has the following named children, Joseph, George, John, Zibe, James and Belle, the wife of Charles Schmidt. Mrs. Perkins was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, on March 3, 1839. She came to Oregon in May, 1860 and remained in the Umpqua valley until June, 1862, when she came thence to The Dalles. WILLIAM H. TAYLOR, one of the earliest pioneers to Oregon, and now one of the largest orchardists in Wasco county, residing about one mile south of The Dalles, was born in Knox county, Illinois, on September 11, 1844. His parents, James and Elizabeth (Smelser) Taylor, came from prominent families, the father's of New England birth and the mother's natives of the southern part of the United States. The paternal grandfather of our subject was a wagon boy in the Revolution and died aged ninety-seven. Our subject's parents were pioneers in Illinois, Indiana and Oregon. The father died on March 14, 1888, and the mother on March 27, 1889, both in Baker county, Oregon. They crossed the plains in 1852 with their children and, although the trip was hard, they were fortunate not to lose any life by Indians. Still some stock was stolen and some died. They started with four yoke of oxen and two horses and arrived at The Dalles with three oxen. One was traded for a trip down the Columbia and they finally reached the Willamette with one pair of oxen. Settlement was made in Linn county, and in 1883 they came to Umatilla county where our subject had preceded them three years. William H. had very little opportunity to gain an education, being compelled to work on the farm then having to walk three miles each way to school. They came to Umatilla county and raised stock for eight years in that portion which is known as Morrow county. In 1878, he came to the place where he now resides and together with his children, owns nine hundred acres of choice land. He has an orchard of forty acres, mostly prunes, and produces many thousands of boxes of fruit. He also raises melons and other vegetables. The place is a valuable one, excellently improved, while his residence is a large two story white house, situated in a beautiful lawn with good shade trees and ornamental shrubbery. An air of thrift and neatness pervades the entire premises and Mr. Taylor is known as one of the leading men of this part of the country.

On December 20, 1865, in Linn county, Mr. Taylor married Miss Mary E. Wigle, a native of Illinois. Her parents, John and Katherine (Hunsaker) Wigle, crossed the plains to Oregon in 1852. They were of German descent, and Mrs. Wigle died in Wasco county. Mrs. Taylor died on June 10, 1900.

On October 16, 1901, in Linn county, Mr. Taylor married Nancy E. Kizer, born in Linn county and the daughter of Marion and Mary (Wigle) Kizer. Alice had married Perry Morgan, and had two children, Velma A., living with our subject, and Cecil C., deceased.

Mr. Taylor is an active Democrat, an enterprising man and one of the best orchardists in Wasco county.

Since the above was written, Mr. Taylor has erected a fine house at 822 Elm street, The Dalles, where he resides with his family. One child, Byron K., in addition to those mentioned, was born to him and his wife on May 7, 1904.

ARTHUR A. MARVEL, who resides at Boyd, is one of the wealthy and solid men of Wasco county, and has for the years of his residence here manifested great industry and sagacity in the conduct of his business. He has won the success that these qualities deserve, and has also esconced himself in the good will and esteem of every one who knows him. The birth of Mr. Marvel occurred in Dewitt county, Illinois, on September 8, 1870, and his parents were George W. and Samantha (Lever) Marvel, natives of Indiana. The father's father was born in Maryland, descended from an old colonial family. He now lives in Gilliam county. The mother of our subject died when he was seven years of age. In Pottawatomie county, Kansas, Arthur was reared principally, and there received his education. The family had come thither when he was three years of age. In 1887 they all came overland to Gilliam county and there Arthur wrought until 1898, when he went to Morrow county, in this state, and there purchased a thousand acres where the town of Douglas now stands. He sold some lots for the town, then farmed the balance of the land until 1902, when he sold the entire property and purchased a section of land which he recently sold. Of this he placed over two hundred acres in cultivation, and improved it in excellent shape. He was thrifty as a farmer and cared for all details of the estate with the same untiring care that is displayed in the larger matters of the business. After selling his farm Mr. Marvel purchased the mill at Boyd, where he now resides.

At Heppner, on October 31, 1900, Mr. Marvel married Miss Millie D. Wilson, a native of Clackamas county, Oregon. Her father, George W. Later he mined in the Rogue river country and then settled in the Willamette valley. After that he came to Wasco county and in 1879 was living in the Tygh valley where our subject was born. After holding land there by squatter's right for several years, he came to the place now owned by our subject and remained until his death. He had married Mary A. Foster, who came to Oregon with her parents in 1849, crossing the plains with ox teams also. The first settlement of the Fosters was in the Rogue river valley. After Mr. Butler's death, his widow homesteaded the land where they lived and also bought more. She handled the estate until her death, which occurred on July 16, 1901. Our subject purchased from the heirs three hundred and forty acres of the estate and since then has given his attention to the cultivation and improvement of the same. On October 9, 1889, at The Dalles, Mr. Cates married Miss Alice DeHuff, a native of Portland. Her parents, Peter and Mary F. (Stryker) DeHuff, reside in The Dalles and were born in York, Pennsylvania, and Kenosha, Wisconsin, respectively. The father is engaged on the O. R. & N. as a mechanic. Our subject has one brother, William A., and two sisters, Sarah E. Frizzell, and Susan C. Wilson. Mrs. Cates has two sisters, Mary F. McCornack and Katrina Morris. To Mr. and Mrs. Cates three children have been born, Harold DeH., Ruth, and Albert L. Mr. Cates is a member of the K. P., the A. F. & A. M., the R. A. M., the W. O. W., and the Elks. He and his wife belong to the Circle of the W. W. Mr. Cates has passed through the chairs of the K. P. Lodge, and has been prominent in organizing different lodges. He is a popular fraternal man and well known. His wife was the first guardian neighbor of the W. W. Circle, No. 232. Politically, Mr. Cates is an active and well informed Democrat of much influence and well liked throughout the county. He is secretary and stockholder of the Cascade Locks Water Company. Mrs. Cates belongs to the Episcopal church and is an active worker.

MARTIN JAKSHA has achieved in Wasco county a success in which any man might take great pride. Many things happened to defeat him and would have overcome a less resolute and determined man. The obstacles in his pathway only developed in him a corresponding determination to overcome them and make himself master of the situation. A public spirited, generous man, industrious and upright, he has won his way through from a position in which he possessed no property until he is now one of the well-to-do citizens of Wasco county.

Mr. Jaksha was born in Austria, on October 17, 1848, the son of John and Anna (Golovich) Jaksha, natives of the same country, where also they remained until their death. In 1878, we find our subject in Chicago. After a few days in that metropolis he came on to Joliet, Illinois, and worked out for six months. His next move was to Iowa, and, after working on a farm for some time there, he landed in Portland, in 1879. He worked for one month in the city and then six months in Washington county, and in the spring of 1880 came to Wasco county with scarcely enough money to file on a homestead. His place is situated near the free bridge road ten miles out from The Dalles. He at once started to work to improve the homestead and make of it a choice farm. Although his progress was very slow still he has succeeded admirably and now has an estate of over five hundred acres, four hundred acres of which are choice tillable soil. This year sees two hundred and seventy acres of this estate bearing excellent crops of wheat, and the improvements on the farm show Mr. Jaksha's taste and sagacity. In addition to all this, he purchased a fine farm which cost him two thousand five hundred dollars and presented it to his step-daughter.

On January 31, 1884, at The Dalles, Mr. Jaksha married Mrs. Albina Pashek, who was born in Bohemia. She has five brothers and two sisters, Carl, Frank, Wentzel, John, Anton, Mrs. Anna Divokey, and Mrs. Mary Schuster. Mr. Jaksha has two brothers, John and Peter, and two sisters, Mrs. Anna Pasich and Apolona. To Mr. and Mrs. Jaksha two children have been born, Andrew, a student at Mount Angel, and Joseph, at home. By her first marriage in Bohemia, Mrs. Jaksha has one daughter, Anna, the wife of George Jacobson. She is the daughter to whom Mr. Jaksha presented the farm. In addition to this, he purchased the right of a homestead adjoining that farm and she and Mr. Jacobson reside there at this time.

Mr. Jaksha has been prominent in political matters and has held various offices. He and his wife are both members of the Roman Catholic church. In addition to the property mentioned, he owns two lots in The Dalles. Mr. Jaksha was not favored with a good opportunity to secure an education, but owing to his inquiring mind and a determination to master all obstacles, he can read and write and speak the English language fluently, and in addition thereto, can read and write four other languages. This indicates the manner of man Mr. Jaksha is, and he is to be greatly commended upon his achievements.

GEORGE A. HARTH has made a record in Wasco county that speaks very plainly of his ability and sagacity. A brief epitome of his life can but prove interesting and with pleasure we append the same.

George A. Harth was born in Wisconsin on September 7, 1848, the son of Frederick and Teresse (Best) Harth, natives of Germany. The father came to the United States, settling in Milwaukee, then a small village, in 1834, then took a homestead in the heavy timber twenty-three miles from that town and spent twenty years in clearing up the land and improving it. Later, he sold and moved to Trempealeau county, Wisconsin, and bought government land where he remained until his death in 1887, being then aged seventy-seven. He was a very active and enthusiastic Republican, was prominent and influential in early days in Wisconsin, held various offices and was an excellent man. His wife came with him from Germany, where they were married, and died in 1889, aged seventy-two. Her parents came from a very prominent family and are related to the famous brewer, Best. Our subject remained with his parents until twenty-six, having received, in the meantime, a good public education. Then he went to Dakota and took land and remained until 1891.

On December 25, 1875, at Sioux Falls, South Dakota, Mr. Harth married Miss Phebe J. Sims, who was born in Iowa. Her father was born in New York and married Miss Sarah Josslyn. The Sims family is a very prominent and influential one in all professions and commercial life. The noted Dr. Marion Sims is one of this family. The Josslyns were promoters of a very large land grant in the early days of the colonies and many of them were in the Revolution. Many of Mrs. Harth's immediate ancestors were among the brave minute men in those days of trouble. Mr. Harth has three brothers, Philip, John W., and Fred, and the following named sisters: Mrs. Effie Uhl, Mrs. Christian Uhl, Mrs. Kate Boulting, Mrs. Rachel Jacobus, Mrs. Mary Adams, and Mrs. Rosie Neely. Mrs. Harth has two brothers, Thomas L. and Charles A., and one sister, Mrs. Adeline Park. Four children have been born to our subject and his wife: Charles A., a stockman at Canyon City; Rosie, Mabel and George, at home.

Mrs. Harth is a member of the Evangelical church. In politics, Mr. Harth is independent, well informed and active. In 1891, Mr. Harth was forced out of Dakota by the drouth and came to Multnomah county, Oregon. Three years later, he landed in Wasco county with eighty-five dollars and four horses, that being the only property that he owned. He was befriended by Mr. J. A. Gulliford, who rented him land, and since that time he has prospered exceedingly. Mr. Gulliford, by the way, has taken great pleasure in assisting many men in the same position in which Mr. Harth found himself, and owing to these kind and manly deeds many a man has come from a place of poverty to competence. Mr. Harth has bought land at different times until now he has nine hundred acres, all tillable soil, one half section of which is said to be as fine as is found in northern Oregon. He is a man of thrift and industry and his estate shows it. When all the improvements, that he is contemplating, are made, he will have one of the finest places to be found in the west, and Mr. Harth is to be congratulated upon the brilliant success he has achieved.

GEORGE W. RICE is practically a product of Oregon, having crossed the plains with his parents when only a year old. He was born in Iowa, on January 7, 1850, the son of Horace and Eliza J. (Bolton) Rice, who are mentioned specifically in another portion of the volume.

The journey across the plains was fraught with great suffering and trial, but our subject was too young to remember these incidents, and his earliest recollections are of the Web-foot state and with it his fortune has been linked since. When the weary immigrants arrived in the Willamette valley they were all recuperated and found work and our subject was reared and educated until about thirteen, the old donation claim in Lane county being the home place. Then he came east of the mountain with his father and in this section completed the education he had begun in the west. He labored under the direction of a skillful father, one of the most prominent men of the county, and was well trained in the art of farming and stock raising. Until he was twenty-seven, he remained with his father and then he took a homestead for himself, about three miles southeast from his present home. This was the scene of his labors and successes until 1902, when he sold it and purchased the old home place from his father,—the place where so much of his life had been spent and around which so many pleasant memories cluster. Here Mr. Rice is established and is manifesting the same sagacity that made his father successful. It will be remembered that this estate is the one where the first orchard of any size was raised in this county, where the elder Rice demonstrated that the up land will produce the best of grain, and with it are thus connected some of the most important items of Wasco history. It consists of one thousand acres, six hundred of which are tillable. Mr. Rice cultivates this year about four hundred acres, and the entire estate shows his care and thrift.

At The Dalles, in 1880, Mr. Rice married Miss Ella Southern, the sister of Charles H. Southern, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work. She was born in Delaware county, Iowa, on July 3, 1863. To this marriage one child has been born, Naomi, who first saw the light on February 15, 1901, in The Dalles. Mr. Rice is a Republican, but not especially active although he is often at the conventions. He is a man of stability and influence as his father before him, and stands well in the community. His wife is a well known lady and comes from an excellent family. They are popular and good people and have done much to assist in making Wasco county prosperous as it is today.

ENOCH E. ANDERSON has achieved a good success in Wasco county and is to be numbered among its prosperous and enterprising agriculturists at this day. He was born in Sweden, on January 3, 1866, the son of Carl E. and Katrina (Broman) Anderson, both natives of Sweden. The father was a graduate of a prominent Stockholm college and devoted his life to preaching the gospel in the Lutheran church. He was a powerful preacher and held some of the best churches in the kingdom. For some years he also preached in Christiana. His home place adjoined a village and there our subject studied as well as in other places where the family lived during the father's life work. The elder Anderson was a great worker for education and used to give much of the fruit of his farm for presents to the young for incentive to better study. He died in Sweden in 1894. The mother still lives there. She was a faithful helpmeet to her husband in his work and for years was an active Sunday school worker and teacher. About 1884, Enoch E. came to the United States and for two years wrought in Nebraska. Then he spent six years in California in railroad work, and after that came to Coos bay, Oregon, and there and in various other places west of the mountains, he wrought for a number of years, and finally came to this county. He worked for one year for Mr. Callaghan and then he took a homestead which he later sold. In 1901, Mr. Anderson bought the place where he now resides, and since that time he has continued here in the cultivation and improvement of it. The estate consists of four hundred acres, three-fourths of which are tillable. It is one of the best medium sized farms in the county and is being brought to a high state of cultivation by the care and skill of Mr. Anderson.

At The Dalles, in 1891, Mr. Anderson married Miss Julia Ryan. She was born in California, and her parents, Thomas F. and Catherine (Morrissey) Ryan, who are natives of Ireland, are mentioned elsewhere in this volume. Mr. Anderson has one brother, Carl, and two sisters, Lydia Johnson and Elizabeth Lundquist. To our subject and his wife five children have been born, Carl, Gust P., Kate, Lucille, and Selma. Mr. Anderson is a member of the W. W., and in politics is a strong Republican. He is a member of the Lutheran church and his wife belongs to the Roman Catholic church. They are good substantial people and have made a good record.

MARSHALL HILL, who resides about one mile south from The Dalles, is one of the earliest pioneers of Oregon and has passed a thrilling and eventful career. He is one of the highly esteemed men of Wasco county and is respected by all. His birth occurred in Knoxville, Tennessee, on April 17, 1836, being the son of Claiborne and Polly (Cates) Hill, both natives of eastern Tennessee. The father's ancestors were natives of Virginia and of English extraction, while the mother's people were a prominent southern family. Our subject came to Iowa with his parents in 1839, where the father bought a large quantity of land from the government. Being a sickly man, he depended on his sons to handle the extensive farm, and our subject learned to handle the plow when a lad of twelve years. The schooling was three months in the winter, and as the opportunity was limited, young Hill was forced to rely largely on his own personal research for his training. In 1852, the father sold his Iowa land and purchased two hundred cattle and twenty horses and mules and came west to Oregon. Upon arriving here he had fifty cattle, three horses and two mules. They settled near Brownsville, and the father died in 1855. Marshall enlisted in Captain Blakeley's company to fight in the Rogue river war and served until peace was restored. Following that he joined his uncle in care of his cattle at Suisun, California, and remained until the stock was destroyed in a flood. Then they both went to mining on the Colo river in Arizona. They organized a company with Judge Watson and other prominent Californians as stockholders, and went to developing the claims. All was progressing smoothly until the Apache Indians attacked them and they fled for their lives. They hurried across Death valley and only by the friendly occurrence of a terrible simoon were they saved from the murderous savages. Several of their party were killed by the storm. Mr. Hill and his uncle were not to be thwarted and later, as they had done before, they dealt telling blows to the savages and many an one bit the dust in mortal combat with these successful Indian fighters. Mr. Hill eventually made his way back to Oregon, and then to Idaho, near Silver City, and finally he came to the vicinity of The Dalles, where he has been since. His time has been devoted to stock raising and he has succeeded well in a financial point of view. Mr. Hill has done much excellent labor for the church to which he belongs as well as for the cause in general, and he is known far and near as an enthusiastic worker in this line, as well as in political matters, being a zealous Prohibitionist.

At Albany, Oregon, on March 29, 1868, Mr. Hill married Miss P. Belinda Thomas, who was born in Illinois, the daughter of Argalous and Julia Thomas, natives of New York. To Mr. and Mrs. Hill the following named children have been born: Edwin M., operating a blacksmith shop in Dufur; Roy, with his parents; Melissa, a member of the faculty of the McMinnville college; Julia, a teacher of experience; and Bertha, wife of J. B. Sprite, a Baptist minister at Harrington, Washington. Mr. and Mrs. Hill are zealous and faithful members of the Baptist church in The Dalles and are great workers in the cause of the gospel and prohibition. Mr. Hill is vice-president of the Prohibition League of The Dalles.

Mr. Hill was one of the most fearless Indian fighters on the frontier, and was in many engagements in various places. He was in charge of the scouts under General Crook, in Idaho, in 1867.

HON. THOMAS H. JOHNSTON, of the mercantile firm of "Johnstons," Dufur, Oregon, was born at Centreville, New Brunswick, Canada, on November 30, 1852.

Sketches of his parents appear elsewhere in this work. Until 1876 our subject was reared and educated in Canada, in that year going to California where he settled in Sonoma county, remaining three years. He then came to The Dalles, Oregon, and for one year was employed as purser on the river steamers. Mr. Johnston then engaged in the fruit, fish and vegetable business and a year subsequently was in the employment of Wingate & Company. With that firm he remained two years, going thence to Dufur, where he purchased the general merchandise business of C. A. Williams, in company with his brother, George, as a partner. In the fall of 1904, our subject, with his brother, George, and his brother John, and W. A. Johnston of The Dalles, organized a company, incorporating under the laws of the state, the name being "Johnstons," with a capital of $50,000. They have erected a handsome, two story edifice of brick, eighty by ninety-four feet, with electric elevator, the only one in the town, and electric lights, with other modern conveniences. They carry on an extensive business and are one of the leading establishments in this part of the state. Mr. Johnston has for years worked assiduously to secure a railroad to Dufur from the main line, and has at last gained the proper concessions. He is also interested in the Wasco Warehouse & Milling Company, Johnstons Stock & Land Company, Johnstons Bank, and is the real promoter of the Great Southern Railroad, being also director of it.

Our subject has four brothers and five sisters, viz.: George W. and John C., partners; J. December 6, 1882, at The Dalles, Mr. Johnston was married to Laura E. Krause, born at The Dalles, the daughter of George and Emma (Murhard) Krause, both natives of Germany. In 1853 her father came to the United States, settling first in California. In 1862 he came to The Dalles, and for years he was engaged in the wholesale and general merchandise business. He erected the first brewery in The Dalles. He died in 1876. The mother, who was married in Germany, accompanied her husband to Oregon, where she passed from earth in 1897. Mrs. Johnston has one brother, George, a farmer and fruit raiser, residing near The Dalles; and two sisters, Ida, wife of David Creighton, farmer and fruit raiser, near The Dalles; and Caroline, widow of Benjamin Kortzen, late of Portland, Oregon. Mr. and Mrs. Johnston have two children, Amy L., aged twenty, a student in Portland Academy, and Edna V., aged twelve years, living at home with her parents.

The fraternal affiliations of our subject are with the K. of P., of which he is Past C. C., and member of the grand lodge; B. P. O. E., and A. O. U. W., being past noble grand. He is a Republican and was elected state senator from the Twenty-first senatorial district of Oregon in 1900. He has been chairman of the county central committee and is a member of the Republican state central committee, and always active in campaigns, taking a patriotic interest in all political issues.

He is a man who has continued steadily along in the work of farming and has done his share to build up the county.

MILES P. ISENBERG is one of the well known men of Wasco county. He was born on September 1, 1843, in Huntington county, Pennsylvania. His father, William, was a native of the same place and was born in 1797, and his parents came from Maryland, in 1761. They were natives of Germany who were brought to America when children, by their parents. The name was originally Von Isenberg, and they are one of the old German families which dates back for many centuries. Arnold Von Isenberg was archbishop of Treves during the time of King Rudolph of the fourteenth century. He had charge of the fictitious holy coat of Christ, and the family still hold important positions in the German government. Prince Karl Isenberg is today a member of the Prussian house of lords. Robert Barr, in his historical novel, Tekla, gives a history of Arnold Von Isenberg and his times. They were a race of warriors, priests, preachers and patriots. In this country, the Isenbergs have been prominent in every American struggle and on October 11, 1861, our subject enlisted in Company E, Fifth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and first saw action in Drainsville, fighting under McClellan. He was in the battles under that general and was wounded in the battle of Catlett Station, by a saber cut on the arm. In August, 1865, Mr. Isenberg was mustered out of service, having participated in nearly all the battles of the Army of the Potomac. After the war, he prospected for some years and in 1876, went to Iowa, later to Nebraska, then to Kansas, where he lived fourteen years. He was twice sheriff of Rooks county, Kansas, and then was appointed special agent for the general land office. Afterward he came to Hood River, in that office, and, liking the country, resigned his position and bought property here. He was later appointed supervisor of the Cascade Forest Reserve with division headquarters at Hood River. He owns a farm on Belmont place and raises strawberries and apples.

On October 9, 1866, at Alexander, Pennsylvania, Mr. Isenberg married Miss Tillie A. Jones, who was born in Franklin Forge, Pennsylvania. Her parents, Isaac and Tillie A. (McMurtre) Jones were natives of Pennsylvania. Mr. Isenberg has the following named brothers and sisters: Three pairs of twins, who died in infancy; Benjamin, Rebecca, Sarah, Alfred K., Susannah, Rosanna, Marie, Louisa, and Marshall. Arnold, contractor and builder at Hood River; Bess, a teacher in the Hood River valley; William, now in the employ of William Steward, of Hood River; Howard, principal of the schools at Cascade Locks; Marshall H., at home; Walter A., a merchant in Hood River; Ellie E., Elmer W., Pearl I. and Lena L., at home.

Mr. Isenberg is a member of the G. A. R., and has been very prominent in these circles, holding many important official positions. He is a strong Republican and a man of ability and influence. He has, at this writing, just completed a term as sergeant-at-arms of the twenty-third session of the Oregon legislature, having the record of being a very efficient officer.

FRANK CHANDLER is a very active and progressive business man as will be noticed in perusing a review of his life. He is one of the wealthy and leading land owners of Wasco county and resides at Hood River. He was born in Iowa, on September 23, 1850. His father, David M. Chandler, was born at St. Catherines, Canada, whither his parents moved from New York, where they were born. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was a wagonmaker by trade. He had several hundred acres of land in Canada and also was engaged in flour milling and various other enterprises. During the rebellion there he was colonel of the militia on the side of the British, later he joined the rebels. He was taken prisoner by the government officers and sentenced to be hanged, drawn and quartered. Owing to Masonic influence, his sentence was afterward commuted to banishment to Van Diemen's land. Through the influence of a brother Mason, who was a captain of a vessel, he was taken thence and afterwards brought to the United States and lived the balance of his days in Jackson county, Iowa. His name was Samuel C. Chandler. Our subject's father was fourteen years of age then and was put in prison, but the government later decided he was too young to have criminally participated in the rebellion and was released and ordered out of the country. With his mother and the rest of the children, eleven, they all came to Iowa where the father joined them. There he was reared and educated and lived. His brother, Samuel C., was for many years professor of Geology in Columbia College and presented the famous Chandler collection to that institution. He was a prominent writer on geological and theological questions. Our subject's father died in 1884. He had married Eliza Goodenough, a native of New York and from a very prominent colonial family. The Chandler family as well as the Goodenough family were all very prominent people during colonial days and participated in all the wars connected with the colonies and the United States. Some of the ancestors came to this country on the Mayflower. The mother of our subject died when he was three years of age and then he was raised by his step-mother and received a good education from the district schools, the academy and the business college. After that, he worked on his uncle's farm then took a position as steamboat agent in Lyons, Iowa, and two years later, kept books in various places then went on the road as traveling salesman for Durands and Company, wholesale grocers of Chicago. Later, we find him in a general merchandise business in western Iowa, whence he moved to Bancroft, Nebraska and sold out. After that, he was in the drug business in Omaha and finally sold to M. B. Howell and went on the road for D. M. Steel, a wholesale grocer of Omaha. Finally, at 2 p. m. one October day, he resigned his position for this house and at 6 p. m., on the same day took the train for Oregon. He was engaged with Wadhams & Company of Portland then located a farm in the Hood River valley and a year later resigned the same and went on the road again for Liggitt and Meyers a large tobacco house. He was division manager later, for the Wetmore Tobacco Company, handling Montana, Wyoming, New Mexico, Washington, Arizona and Colorado. Finally, in 1902, Mr. Chandler retired from the road and settled down in Hood River and purchased a fine home on the hill. He sold his farm for eleven thousand dollars and had in the meantime, purchased four hundred acres more of very fine fruit and grain land. One hundred acres are in cultivation and the balance is all tillable. He has three separate farms and has a bearing orchard of over twenty-five acres. He personally supervises the places he owns and is a very active and energetic man.

On April 13, 1880, at Jefferson, Iowa, Mr. Chandler married Mrs. Mary E., the daughter of Arza T. Lyons. She was born in Whithall, New York, and her father was a native of the same state. The family was a prominent American one and the father at the time of his death in 1905 was a large paint manufacturer. Mr. Chandler has one brother living, Delos B. Mrs. Chandler has one sister, Eliza Davis. To Mr. and Mrs. Chandler, one child has been born, William O. Our subject is a member of the A. F. & A. M., and a good substantial Republican.

WILLIAM S. CRAPPER, whose father founded Crapper district, is one of the industrious farmers of the Hood River valley and lives about six miles south from town. He was born in Clayton county, Iowa, on January 24, 1865, the son of Dorsey S. and Elizabeth (Cottrell) Crapper. The father was born in Kentucky, and his father was a native of Scotland and a ship owner. Our subject's great-grandfather was a patriot in the Revolution and served four years in the field and three chained to the deck of a prison ship. He was a companion to Daniel Boone and with that worthy man fought the Indians. He died in Indiana aged one hundred and seven. Our subject's grandfather was drowned at sea, and many of the family were killed by Indians in Kentucky. Our subject's mother was born in Michigan and her people are prominent railroad men. Her mother was of Irish extraction. Her father was a prominent railroad builder. She died at the home of this son, October 31, 1897, and her husband died in Portland, on March 11, 1903. Our subject was with his father in Webster City, Iowa, where the latter operated a drug store. He was a pioneer of the town, and a prominent man there. His education was secured from the public schools and he tried to enlist in the Civil war but was rejected on account of poor teeth. In 1877, the family came west overland and after five years of residence in Portland came to Hood River, landing here in March, 1884. They took land and our subject now owns eighty acres of his father's original homestead. He devotes his land to general crops and is a substantial resident and leading citizen.

On September 4, 1890, in the house where he now lives, Mr. Crapper married Miss Rosa M. York, and Mr. Crapper's sister, Mrs. McCurdy was married at the same time. The parents of Mrs. Crapper, Frank and Johana (Writer) York, are natives of Switzerland and Germany, respectively, and now live in Bellingham Bay, Washington. Mrs. Crapper was born in Iowa and has two brothers, Henry A. and Frank N., and one sister, Flora Hennis. Mr. Crapper has two sisters, Belle McCurdy and Nettie Hackett. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Crapper, Nettie B., Viola, and Mildred, aged twelve, nine, and four, respectively.

By way of reminiscence we note that in the winter of 1856-7 our subject's father started with his family and equipage from Spirit Lake, Iowa, to Hamilton county, but were caught in a blizzard and lost all stock except one horse. Finally they got in only to find the people mourning their death, and one man stoutly maintaining he had buried them. The next spring they went back to pick up their stuff and found nearly all the old neighbors murdered by the Indians. Mr. Crapper is a pioneer and comes from a race of stanch pioneers and they have all done much to open up various sections from the colonial days to the present.

JOHN I. MILLER, one of the good and substantial citizens of the Hood River valley, dwells on the west side about seven miles up from the town. He has a choice place and is engaged in horticulture and general farming. Last year his shipment of berries was eight hundred crates, while also he has a great many apples. He was born in Illinois, on November 6, 1856, the son of William M. and Susan E. (Stephens) Miller, natives of Indiana. The father died in Missouri, and the mother in Sherman county. The father settled in southeastern Kansas in 1866, and there our subject was educated and in Missouri, and when arrived at manhood's estate, he farmed until 1886 when the entire family came to Oregon and settled in Sherman county. They farmed there on the government land they took until 1895, when Mr. Miller traded that property for the place where he now resides and since then he has made this his home. He is a man of thrift and industry and has made a fine showing here in the last eight years.

At Mt. Vernon, Missouri, on October 21, 1881, Mr. Miller married Miss Hannah Badger, a native of Indiana, and the daughter of George and Margaret (Mars) Badger. The father was born in Indiana on August 7, 1821, and died January 12, 1888. The mother was born in Pennsylvania, May 24, 1821, and died September 15, 1877. Mrs. Miller has the following named brothers and sisters; Daniel, born May 25, 1847; Philip, born May 27, 1849, and died January 17, 1874; Margaret, born September 18, 1851; Mary Catherine, born September 18, 1856; Ebenezer, born January 20, 1859; and George R., born February 16, 1862. Mr. Miller has two brothers, Abraham H. and Edgar B. and three sisters, Clara H. Roark, Alice S. Brock, and Ida M. Strong. Mrs. Miller has three brothers, Daniel, Eben and George R., and two sisters, Margaret Stephens, and Katherine Canady. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Miller, William A., Ephraim A., Ivan J. and Irma, twins, Virginia B., wife of Thomas A. Van Ausdal, and Maud M. Mr. Miller is a Republican, but not especially active in this realm. He is clerk of the school board and has been for many years in different places and is now serving his fourth term in the Crapper district.

JOSEPH PURSER resides about two miles out from Hood River, on Belmont street and is one of the leading and thrifty horticulturists of the valley. He was born in England on November 20, 1848, the son of Thomas and Martha (Wast) Purser, natives of England. The father was a brick maker and came to the United States with his family in 1851, settling in Danville, Illinois. He followed his trade until 1872, when he sold his property and came to Oregon. For two years he lived in Portland, then removed to Hood River where he died in 1861. The mother died here in 1897. Their marriage occurred in England, in May, 1841. The father was a very skillful brick maker and manufactured all the brick used in the capitol building at Springfield, Illinois. Our subject was raised and educated in Danville and labored with his father until they came to Oregon. He was employed for a couple of years in Portland, then came to Hood River and homesteaded eighty acres, where he has since lived. He is one of the early settlers here and has labored continuously for the building up of the country. His land is unexcelled in quality and owing to his nearness to town, he has advantageously sold all of it except eighteen and one half acres. He has six acres of strawberries and the balance to other fruit and general crops.

At Danville, Illinois, in 1871, the day of the Chicago fire, Mr. Purser married. He was a member of the Danville fire department and just after the ceremony as he was accompanying his bride down the street the fire alarm sounded and he hurried to headquarters just in time to be rushed away on the train to Chicago and did not see his wife again for four days.

In Portland, in 1874, Mrs. Purser died. A second marriage was contracted by Mr. Purser, the same being in 1880, when Ellen Swan, a native of England and the daughter of George and Mary Swan, became his wife. She came to the United States in 1869. Her parents lived at White Salmon. Mr. Purser has two brothers, David and John and two sisters, Mrs. Phoebe Foss and Mrs. Mary Noble. Mr. Purser is the father of six children; Nora, wife of R. A. Phelps in the valley; Hattie, wife of John Tyler, also in the valley; David J., Rena P., Winnie D. and Ira D., all at home.

Politically, our subject is independent. He has served as road supervisor here in the valley and made a record for himself in building the first gravel road in this section. It was an excellent piece of work and has stimulated good road building, one of the most important factors of a civilized country. In Illinois, Mr. Purser was road supervisor for seven years and he is skilled in the way of building good roads cheap. He has made a study of the matter and is one of the best posted men on roads in the county. He is very enthusiastic in the improvement of the country in every line and a progressive and good man.

JOHN M. ROTH is one of the wealthy and leading citizens of Wasco county. His farm of one thousand acres lies five miles east from Kingsley and has seven hundred acres under cultivation. In addition to this, he owns about five thousand acres of land near Rock Island, Chelan county, Washington. His home place is well improved and provided with all equipment needed on a first class Oregon grain farm.

John M. Roth was born in Germany, on May 18, 1838, the son of Johann M. and Sophia (Klaenfaller) Roth, both natives of the Fatherland. The father followed blacksmithing and farming, as did his ancestors and his death occurred in Germany on February 22, 1848. The mother died in Ohio. In 1856, his education having been completed in his native country, our subject came to the United States, settling in Wisconsin. There he labored for wages and rented land until 1861, in which year he enlisted in Company C, Eleventh Wisconsin Regulars, under Captain Perry and Colonel Harris. For three years he did faithful service and then on account of disability was honorably discharged. He was in active service all the time and saw much hard fighting in Arkansas and Missouri. Following the war he returned to Wisconsin and shortly went to Minnesota. In 1867, he went thence to Kansas, and in 1875, he came to Oregon. On June 8, of that year he arrived in Albany and on November 5, he located on land in Wasco county. Since that time he has been assiduously following the occupation of the agriculturist and stockman. He has accumulated considerable property and has wisely bestowed his labors all these years and is to be classed as one of the pioneers and substantial citizens.

While in Wisconsin, in August, 1864, Mr. Roth married Miss Margaret Unsel, a native of Germany and an immigrant to this country with her parents in her infancy. Eight children have been born to this union; Emma, wife of Horatio Fargher, a wool grower, mentioned elsewhere in this volume; Sophia, wife of Orwen Jones, a farmer near Nansene; John, living near our subject; Ella, at home; William and Victor, living on the estate near Rock Island; Carl, at home; and Lena, a school girl. Mr. Roth is a member of the order of Washington. Politically he is one of the active men of the county and is a strong Democrat. He was put in nomination for sheriff, but suffered defeat with his ticket. Mr. Roth has reared a very bright and interesting family, and they are good members of society and all being highly respected.

THOMAS C. FARGHER, a sturdy Manxman, and now one of Wasco county's citizens, is located about seven miles southeast from Dufur. At this point he owns an estate of sixteen hundred acres. In addition, he owns much other land in various parts of the county. He does an extensive business in sheep raising and is a prospered man in this enterprise. He handles about thirty-five hundred sheep. His flocks are ranged in various parts of the country and he also owns several rendezvous as headquarters for sheep raising. Mr. Fargher directs his business in person, and his skill is such that he has been blessed with continued success. He is a genial man, kindly disposed to all, and very optimistic in his views and beliefs. He thoroughly puts into practice the principles of enjoying today's sweets in today, and taking from each occasion its charms and pleasures when presented. No less is he careful to execute in the day the business and duties that belong to that day and the result is that he is a man of today, living, thinking, and doing in the present, not, however, without a keen foresight and prudence for the future.

Thomas C. Fargher was born in the Isle of Man, as would be gathered from the foregoing, and the date of that event was October 18, 1841. His parents and brothers are mentioned elsewhere in this volume therefore we will not give details of them here. Suffice it to say, our subject spent his boyhood days with his father on the farm. When sixteen he went to Manchester, England, and there for six years toiled at the carriage maker's trade. He became master of the art of skillfully handling wood and after five years in the business, he came to the conclusion that the colonies presented greater opportunities for him than the mother country, and so he went to Melbourne, Australia. He wrought there in his business until 1868, when he came to San Francisco and thence to Sacramento where he did carriage making for wages and then for himself until he sold his shop to his partner in 1874. After that, he was with his brother, Horatio, one winter on the Stickeen river in Alaska, and the following spring he came to Wasco county. Here he took land and for ten years operated with his brother in the sheep business. Then he went for himself and since then, he has continued one of the leading citizens of this county. He purchased his present home place in 1886. He has recently erected a handsome and comfortable residence and all the other improvements are commensurate therewith.

At Vancouver, on September 12, 1895, Mr. Fargher married Miss Ollie E., the daughter of Frank E. and Jane (Crate) Huott. The father was born in Canada and now dwells on Eight-mile creek. The mother is living there also. She was born in Walla Walla, the year of the Whitman massacre, 1847. Her father had come to the west for the Hudson's Bay Company and was in the territory now occupied by Wasco county when no white man lived here. He took a donation claim on what is known as Crate's point, where he expected the town of The Dalles to be. He remained on that place until his death, which occurred in The Dalles, in 1894. Mrs. Fargher has two brothers, Frank and Alfred, and three sisters, Mrs. Josephine Barter, Mrs. Mollie Bulger, and Mrs. Charles Zigler. To our subject and his wife, one son has been born, Thomas C., on February 14, 1897. Mr. Fargher is a Republican but never seeks office, although he takes an intelligent interest in the matters of politics and educational affairs. He is popular, and he and his estimable wife are among the substantial people of the county.

WILLIS A. HENDRIX has the distinction of having been born in the Web-Foot State, where also, he has passed the years of his life, mostly. He is a son of Oregon in which the state may take pride, being one of those substantial producers, who make the strength and the stability of any good country. He was born in Yamhill county, on May 8, 1861, and his parents, Abijah and Mary J. (Dickerson) Hendrix, were worthy pioneers to this state when it was a wilderness, and when they had to endure all the hardships known on the frontier and battle with the trying opposition found so plentiful in those days and conditions. The father came to Oregon in 1843, thus being one of the first few white men who planted the stars and strips in this now great and rich territory. He was a native of Georgia and came from an old and respected American family. The trip across the plains was made with ox teams and some trouble was experienced with the Indians. The mother came across the plains with her parents in 1845, being then sixteen years of age. The Indians attacked them and they had great trials. Their stock was stolen and some died and they finally reached The Dalles with a couple of cows, having suffered from Indians, from shortage of provisions, and from cholera. She was born in Virginia, and her mother was also a native of that state. Her father was born in Kentucky. Mrs. Hendrix is now living with the son, who is the immediate subject of this article. Her husband died on the old donation claim in Yamhill county where they spent so many days of pioneer life, and the date of that sad event was July 29, 1872. It is of interest to note that when Mrs. Hendrix's parents got to The Dalles in 1845, they were not able to get over the mountains, but lashed two canoes together and thus transported what they had left to Portland. Our subject was reared and educated in the native county and on November 9, 1876 landed in Wasco county, the balance of the family coming at that time, also. He has labored here since and he now has to show a fine farm of seven hundred and twenty acres, six hundred of which are tillable, and he cut this year four hundred and fifty acres of grain. The improvements are in good taste and plenty and Mr. Hendrix is considered one of the leading farmers of this section.

On December 8, 1883, at the house on the farm, Mr. Hendrix married Miss Amy F. Griffin, who was born in Lane county, Oregon, on September 1, 1861. Her father, Joseph Griffin, was one of the early pioneers to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox teams in 1852. He took a donation claim in Yamhill county and upon a trip to the east side of the mountains, his team backed off the grade and killed him on August 13, 1884. He had married Mary Mayhew, who crossed the plains with her parents in early days. Her wedding occurred in this territory and she died when Mrs. Hendrix was an infant, she being an only child. Mr. Hendrix has five brothers, Wilbur, his twin, Edward, Campbell, John, and James. To our subject and his wife three children have been born, Claud, Guy, and Harry, all at home. Mr. Hendrix is a member of the United Artisans, to which order his wife and sons Claud and Roy also belong. He is an active Republican and is frequently at the county conventions. To various offices he has given his time, but he is never reaching for the emoluments of office. Mr. Hendrix owns a cozy home in Dufur, where the family dwells about half of the time.

GEORGE R. CASTNER, who resides about four miles out from Hood River, just off Belmont street, is one of the most progressive and prosperous horticulturists of the Hood River valley. Last year was a banner year for him and his place netted him many dollars. The farm is known as Stony Fell and is one of the most productive and best handled places here. He has an elegant two story residence, barns, outbuildings, fences and everything to make it comfortable and valuable. Mr. Castner is one of the up-to-date men well informed and progressive. He was born in Milo, New York, on January 6, 1846. His father, George R. Castner, was a native of New Jersey, and died in Michigan in 1901, aged eighty-six. He had married Julia Baker, a native of Dutchess county, New York, of the old Baker family, prominent in America. She was of Dutch stock. The great-great-great-grandfather of our subject on his father's side, and two brothers, came from Germany in the seventeenth century and settled in New York and New Jersey. They became very prominent and members of the family have been identified with every American war. One of them was a carrier under Washington in the Revolution.

Our subject was raised and educated in New York until seventeen and then moved with his father to Michigan. In 1865, he enlisted in Company H, Twelfth Michigan Infantry, under Captain James H. Follets and Colonel Dwight C. May. He was discharged on account of illness and returned to Michigan, remaining on the farm until 1870. Then he married and moved to Jackson, Michigan, where he was brakeman and conductor on the Michigan Central Railroad, until 1880. In that year, he was promoted to the position of trainmaster and held the same until 1894, then he resigned his position and removed to Hood River, purchasing forty-two acres where he now lives. He gave his attention largely to the production of strawberries and apples and has one of the largest places in the state of Oregon.

On January 9, 1870, at Kirkland, Ohio, Mr. Castner married Miss Florence L. Gildersleeve, a native of that town. Her father, Samuel L. Gildersleeve, married Miss Burnette. They were both natives of New England. Mr. Castner has the following named brothers and sisters, James B., Charles W., John B., of the Fifth Michigan Cavalry, who died at Andersonville prison, Mary E. Longcor, Amanda M., deceased, Julia A., deceased, and one who died in infancy. Mrs. Castner has one brother, Wilbur F. and three sisters, Mary E. Galligan, Helen M. Traver and Carrie M. Ayer. To Mr. and Mrs. Castner two sons have been born, John B. and Charles; the former at home and the latter employed with the Davidson Fruit Company. Mr. Castner is an active Republican and chairman of the precinct committee. He and his wife are both devout members of the Congregational church and he has served as deacon for a great many years. Fraternaly he is affiliated with the A. F. & A. M. and R. A. M.

Mr. Castner comes from the same family as Captain Castner of the United States army who made such a wonderful record in enduring hardships and privations on the government expedition to Alaska some time since.

JOSEPH A. WILSON; a substantial and enterprising business man of Hood River, is at present the owner of a fruit warehouse and a waterpower plant. He was born in Indiana county, Pennsylvania, on October 17, 1854. His father was William Wilson, a native of the north of Ireland and of English parentage. His mother, Letitia (Mac-Dugh) Wilson, was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania. The father came to the United States in 1828 and died in Pennsylvania, in 1883. The mother's parents were from old Highland Scotch stock and descended from the Cameron clan. Joseph A. was reared and educated in Pennsylvania, and when thirty came to Oregon. He was graduated from the state normal school at Millersville, Lamerton county, Pennsylvania, and taught thereafter until he went to Oregon. The well known Brooks, the author of a series of mathematical text books, was principal of the normal and Mr. Wilson received exceptionally good instruction. He followed the lumber business and in the spring of 1884, took the journey west. He engaged on the government survey here after the winter of 1884, well remembered on account of its deep snow, which accumulated to the depth of five feet, and worked all the following summer on the survey. The next year he bought land and has followed farming and surveying considerably since.

Mr. Wilson's mother died in 1871 and his father passed away in 1883. On September 20, 1893, occurred the marriage of our subject and Gertrude M. Kinports, a native of Pennsylvania and the daughter of Porter and Margaret B. (Mahaffey) Kinports, natives of Pennsylvania. The father followed merchandising for fifty years and is now president of the First National Bank in Cherrytree, Pennsylvania, where the mother was born. They are highly respected people. The wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson occurred in Cherrytree and they have one son, Porter K., with his grandparents in Pennsylvania. Mr. Wilson has one brother, Thomas S. and one sister, Mary C. Mrs. Wilson died in Pennsylvania, on February 21, 1898. Mr. Wilson is independent in political matters and is free and untrammelled to view all issues and questions without party bias.

He is greatly interested in the fruit business and packed the fruit that took the grand prize for the state of Oregon and Wasco county at the World's Fair in St. Louis.

In the fall of 1904, Mr. Wilson built a million gallon reservoir on the hill above town and brought water in from the Indian creek. Water is piped to the city for power purposes. He is also interested in the formation of a milling company, being a stockholder. They have erected a fine flour mill plant with a daily output capacity of one hundred barrels.

THOMAS F. RYAN, deceased. When the clouds cover deep the familiar forms of our loved ones, and we hear their voices no more, memory loves to dwell in the past where cluster the things they did and said. It is very fitting to gratify this desire, and to aid in it we often times resort to the written page to outline there somewhat of the careers of those gone on before, where we shall all, soon enough, travel. It is our purpose to grant here, as much as may be from the information furnished, an epitome of the life of the esteemed gentleman whose name stands at the head of this article. He was a man of kindly ways and geniality and won the hearts of all. He passed a life in which he manifested true worth and integrity and had a deep appreciation of the stewardship entrusted to him. His death occurred on the ranch, where resides his widow at this time, six miles west from Dufur. The last illness of Mr. Ryan steadily became more and more serious until it was evident death had marked him for departure. All was done that mortals could do, but on December 17, 1891, he fell asleep and thus closed a life in which his record had been good, and in which true principles of uprightness and honesty had guided his ways.

The birth of Mr. Ryan occurred in Tipperary, Ireland, on May 1, 1826. He received in his younger days a fine education, and was always a student and great reader. Mr. Ryan had a decided gift in composition and wrote many fine poems, and we regret that we have none at hand for this article. Those acquainted with him were all familiar with this gift and many times it was displayed with marked effect.

On April 16, 1865, at Maryville, Uba county, California, Mr. Ryan married Miss Catherine A. Morrissey, who was born in Cork, Ireland, April 19, 1841. Her parents were Patrick and Catherine (O'Brien) Morrissey, the former born in Carrick and the latter in county Waterford, Ireland. The father was a dyer and presser by trade. Mr. Ryan enlisted in the Civil war and fought with distinction in that struggle.

HENSON McCOY, deceased. Among the most honored citizens of Wasco county is to be placed the gentleman whose name heads this memoir. He was born in Illinois, on November 17, 1833, and died in Wasco county, at Dufur, on October 27, 1898. His parents, James M. and Mary A. (Moore) McCoy, were natives of Kentucky. The father's people had been pioneers for several generations previous. They were frontiersmen in Virginia, Illinois, Kentucky and Missouri. He died in Texas. The mother's family also were pioneers for generations. Our subject was but four years of age when they came to Missouri, where he grew to manhood and married, and thence he, with his wife and father, went on to Texas, his mother having died in Missouri. In 1858 they made the trip across the plains with ox teams to California, subject and wife, and had a hard time, losing much of their stock. Although others were very sick, still they were not sick, themselves. Two years were spent in Los Angeles and there he lost eight hundred dollars in buying a bogus Spanish grant piece of land. With low funds they started north and finally landed in Yamhill county, Oregon. They bought and sold land, and rented some then returned to California, settling in Tulare county, where they purchased seven hundred acres of land. After eleven years of labor there they sold that property and came back to Oregon in 1878. Here Mr. McCoy bought school land, took a timber culture and so forth until he had an estate of five hundred and sixty acres a little way out from Boyd, where the widow resides at this time. Just before his death sold eighty to one son. Here he bestowed his labors until the time came for him to lay down the burdens of life. This he did with the same assurance of the faith which had buoyed him through a long Christian life. Formerly, he was a member of the Methodist church but in later years was with the Baptist denomination.

On January 29, 1853, in Linn county, Missouri, Mr. McCoy married Miss Clarissa Rusher, who was born in Chariton county, Missouri, on November 5, 1832. Her father, William Rusher, was born in Kentucky from an old Virginia family, which came in early colonial days. He married Mary A. Sportsman, a native of Kentucky. Her mother was born in Virginia and her father in Ireland, whence he was brought to the United States when seven, being an orphan. Mrs. McCoy's father died when she was four and her mother died in Los Angeles, having crossed the plains with them. Mr. McCoy had four half brothers, Benjamin F., Joseph, Francis M. and Abner, and one sister, Mrs. Mary A. Fogle. Mrs. McCoy has one half sister, Mrs. Ellen Neal, one sister, Mrs. Sarah A. Shakely, and one half brother, William L. Barnes. To Mr. and Mrs. McCoy, ten children were born: Thomas, a barber in Seattle; William, a physician in Salt Lake City; John, at Cripple Creek, Colorado; Joseph H., near by on a farm; Dennis R., with his mother; Mary A., the wife of John H. Sternweis, near by; Ellen, the wife of Abraham Mowery, in Portland; Sarah J., the wife of Isaac Fowler, a carpenter in Portland; Nancy, the wife of Herbert Powell, at Rockland, Washington; Zoodie B., the wife of Albert Connelly. Her death occurred at The Dalles, in 1892. Mr. McCoy was for forty years a member of the I. O. O. F., had passed all the chairs, was at the grand lodge many times, and took a prominent part in fraternal circles. He was a prominent man in the community, had always taken an active part in politics, public matters, and educational affairs, had held various offices and was greatly respected and beloved. He was a man of marked integrity, and his influence was always for good. He did much, both in person and by example, for the building up of the community in every way, and his death was a great loss. His widow resides on the farm, and is a devout Christian lady, whose life has been a light to many.

SERAPHINE NACE, who resides about three miles southeast from Kingsley, was born in Wisconsin, on February 17, 1866. His father, Joseph Nace, was born in Belgium, June 29, 1829, and died October 31, 1904, on his farm in Marion county, Oregon. He married Miss Florence Garraux, who was born in France. She is still living and is at the home in Marion county. She and her husband both were brought to Wisconsin when children, by their parents, who were pioneers of the Green Bay country. There they hewed out homes in the forest and there these children were married. The mother's father died there and her mother came on to the Willamette valley where she died. Our subject came to the valley with his parents in 1876 and there attended school until his education was completed. He continued on the farm with his father until 1887, then he worked for other farmers there until 1896. Then he came to Wasco county and here he filed on a homestead and then worked for A. A. Bonney. He gradually improved his land and has gathered a good stock of cattle and horses about him, also adding to his estate betimes until he has five hundred and twenty acres. He cultivates three hundred acres, and has forty fine cattle. At the head of the herd is a choice thoroughbred bull, three-fourths Hereford and one fourth Shorthorn. Of horses, he owns about forty, all good animals. Mr. Nace is a dealer in horses as well as a breeder and handles many head each year. He has been prosperous in his labors, owing to his energy, industry and skill, and is one of the good, substantial citizens of this part of the county. Mr. Nace has the following named brothers and sisters; Adolph, on a farm near by; Bernard, Joseph, Polyte, and Albert, in the Willamette valley; Carrie, the wife of John Fisher, in Salem; Reagin, married to Benjamin Brown, at Woodburn, Oregon; Cynda, the wife of John Stuart, in Marion county, farming; Mary, the wife of Ellis Stevens, in Marion county; and Maggie, the wife of Albert Klane, also in Marion county.

Thus far on life's journey, Mr. Nace has seen fit to travel as a bachelor, preferring the quiet enjoyments and freedom of that life to the cares and responsibilities of matrimonial existence.

ISAIAH J. BUTLER is one of Wasco county's good men and his labors here for many years testify that he is possessed of industry and has accomplished a great deal for the improvement and upbuilding of the country. He is a man of good principles and is guided by integrity. At the present time, Mr. Butler resides on his farm about two miles east from Kingsley. In addition to this he has some timber land. He does general farming and is a good substantial farmer.

Isaiah J. Butler was born in Wayne county, Ohio, on February 26, 1835. His parents are mentioned in the sketch of his brother's life, Polk Butler. In his native country, our subject was educated and reared and gave his attention to farming. He had traveled some before he turned his face to the west and finally located in Oregon, whither his brother, Daniel W., who is now in Coleville, California, had come in 1852. It was in the spring of 1877, that our subject landed here and in the fall of the same year, his brother, Polk Butler, came on. The three brothers established a saw mill and operated it for some time. But the enterprise proved disastrous and they lost nearly all the capital they possessed. Then they gave that up and our subject filed on a homestead of disputed railroad land which he later secured and where he lives now. The balance of his land he secured by preemption and by purchase.

In Illinois, Mr. Butler married Miss Emeline Riggs, who was born in Warren county, Illinois, and whose parents, David C. and Elizabeth (Smith) Riggs, were natives of Missouri. The father was one of an old southern family of distinction and the mother's ancestors were prominent colonial people. Mrs. Butler has the following named brothers and sisters, John, Reuben, Mahlon, Douglass, Mrs. Nancy Galbraith, Mrs. Angeline Henderson, Mary, deceased, and Mrs. Kate Wickery. To Mr. and Mrs. Butler two children have been born, D. Clyde, and Stella, who died July 30, 1904. At the first call for troops to defend the flag, our subject promptly enlisted in an Illinois regiment and served three months. In political matters he is independent. He is a man who has the esteem of all and he and his wife have traveled the pilgrim journey many years together and are faithful and good people.

HON. JOSEPH W. MORTON is a prominent and wealthy citizen of Wasco county, living three miles out from Hood River on the State road. He owns the Riverside farm which lies south of the Columbia and consists of four hundred acres. Three acres are planted to strawberries and the balance of the land produces other fruit and general crops. The place is valuable and one of the best in this part of the county. Mr. Morton has it well improved and manages the estate with a display of wisdom and thrift.

Joseph W. Morton was born in Henry county,

Iowa, the son of Charles R. and Caroline (Wallace) Morton, natives of Ohio. The mother's family is allied with the old Scotch Wallace family, well known in Scottish history. The father came from the Morton family which has been identified with America long before there was a United States. They came on the good ship, Ann, soon after the Mayflower landed, and are well known in various portions of this country. Levi P. Morton, at one time vice president, was a member of the family. The father died at Salem, in 1894. He crossed the plains in 1852 and returned east and came west again in 1875. Our subject was raised principally in Oregon. The family came here when he was ten years of age. After completing his studies in the district school, he graduated from the business college in Portland then remained with his father on the farm until he came to this place in 1889.

On February 14, 1886, at Hood River, Mr. Morton married Miss Annie M. Haynes, a native of Portland and the daughter of Charles H. and Elizabeth J. (Quick) Haynes. She died in June, 1889, at Portland. On May 1, 1902, at Hood River, Mr. Morton married Miss Pearl Groshong, a native of Kansas and the daughter of Peter and Malinda (Miller) Groshong, natives of Ohio. Mr. Morton has one brother, Elijah, and two sisters, Mrs. Carrie E. Haynes and Nellie G. Mrs. Morton has four brothers, Frank, Abraham B., Hood, and Joseph P., and four sisters, Mrs. Clara E. Jones, Mrs. Grace Elliott, Mrs. Jennie Hixon, and Mrs. Mary Gordon.

Politically, Mr. Morton is a very active Republican. He has been a delegate to many of the conventions and in 1898, was elected to represent this district in the state legislature. He was active and influential in that capacity and endorsed the bill, which afterward became a law, that provides for the especial care of trees and shrubbery in the state, and has done a great deal in keeping the state clean from various pests which are detrimental to horticultural interests. Mr. Morton is a member of the I. O. O. F., and a popular and influential man.

ALFRED TRUDELL, of the firm of Truedell & Deni, is a man of good standing in Wasco county, where he has labored for nearly twenty years in the related occupations of farming and stock raising. He is a man of ability in these lines, having gained a good success in his labors, and having, also, discharged the responsibilities of a patriotic citizen and a leading man in the community. In partnership with Mr. Deni, Mr.

Trudell owns seventeen hundred and ninety-five acres of land about six miles east from Kingsley. It was secured through the homestead right and by purchase from the railroad and is one of the large estates of the county. It is utilized both for pasture and for raising grain. This year, they cut five hundred acres of wheat and the same made a handsome return. The farm is supplied with all the improvements needed and is one which shows skill and thrift in the management. In addition to what is mentioned, Mr. Trudell handles a large number of cattle each year, wintering usually about eighty to one hundred head. They buy and sell stock and always have fat cattle on hand for the markets.

In the matters of the county and state, Mr. Trudell takes a lively interest and is always on the side of the Democratic ticket in national politics, while in other questions, he decides according to the merits of the question and the standing of the candidate, as he deems best for the interests of all. In school matters, he takes a keen interest and has given of his time to serve as director. Mr. Trudell is still in single blessedness and takes great pleasure in the freedom and quietness of the bachelor's life.

Alfred Trudell was born in Ontario, Canada, on August 17, 1867, near Stony Point. His parents are mentioned in the biography of his brother, which is in this volume. He was educated in the famous schools of Ontario and remained at the home place until 1887, in which year he came hither. Since then he has remained here a steady and enterprising young man.

JAMES C. BOGGS is a farmer and fruit raiser of the Hood River valley, residing about three miles south from Hood River. He was born in North Carolina, on March 3, 1849, the son of Joseph and Mary (Wyant) Boggs. The father was born in North Carolina and his parents were natives of Virginia, coming from old colonial families. Various members of the family were in the Revolutionary War, among which was our subject's grandfather. His great grandfather bought a Bible in South Carolina which is now owned by our subject and is probably over two hundred years old. There is no date on it. The family were all planters. The father died in Marion county, Illinois, in 1884. The mother of our subject was born in Pennsylvania and descended from a Dutch family. She now lives in Marion county, Illinois. There James C. completed his education and remained with his father until twenty-five years of age. Then he worked at various occupations until 1889, when he came to the Hood River valley and bought fifteen acres of fine fruit land. Since then he has sold seven acres and still handles the place, three acres to strawberries and the rest to various crops.

On December 10, 1874, in Marion county, Illinois, Mr. Boggs married Miss Martha McIntosh, a native of Marion county, Illinois. Her father, Tilton McIntosh, was born in Tennessee and married Lucy A. Mercer, a native of Illinois. He died soon after marriage and his widow then married Andrew Copple in Marion county, whose father, Simpson Copple, lives in the Hood River valley and is mentioned in this volume.

On June 10, 1888, in Marion county, Illinois, Mrs. Boggs was called away by death. She left a family of three children, the oldest Grace, ten years of age. Mr. Boggs took up the burdens of life bravely after the departure of his wife and has raised his family and made a good showing with his labors. He has now three children living: Grace, wife of Arthur Getchell in the Hood River valley; Rosie, keeping house for her father; and Harvey.

Mr. Boggs is a member of the Christian church of which also his wife was a devoted member for sixteen years. They have three children who died in infancy, Ivy, Scott and an infant unnamed.

DAVID CREIGHTON resides three miles south of The Dalles and for over forty years has continued in this same place. He has shown himself a man of most excellent qualities and in these long years has so conducted himself that he is the recipient of the good will and deep respect of all who have known him. His place is a valuable one and is wisely and beautifully improved. His residence is a commodious structure tasty and beautifully surrounded by pleasant grounds, while his entire farm is a model of good husbandry. His labors have been constant, and wisely bestowed and his prosperity is but the due reward for such industry and thrift.

David Creighton was born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, on January 8, 1835, the son of James and Maria (Hart) Creighton, natives of Ireland and Delaware, respectively. The father came with his parents when fifteen and settled in Pennsylvania. He became a marine engineer and followed river steamboating for many years. The mother died in Ohio, in 1858. When David was four years of age he was brought by his parents to the frontier of Ohio and there he was reared and educated. He was of studious habits and acquired a good education, even though on the frontier, and soon began the important work of teaching school. In 1855, his father and older brother came west to Oregon, via the isthmus and California. They settled in Clackamas county and took a donation claim. The mother remained with our subject until her death in 1858, when he came on to Oregon, arriving here in the spring of 1859. He immediately went to teaching school in Clackamas county. After that he went to the mining regions of Idaho and dug the golden sands on the Salmon river. In 1862, he came to The Dalles and bought the land where he now resides, and since then has been one of the leading and substantial men of the county. FREDERIC H. HILLGEN is one of the leading farmers of the Tygh ridge. He is a member of the family of Hillgens, all of whom have made excellent success in farming and stock raising in this county. The father is one of the heaviest land owners in Wasco county and is a man of remarkable ability in his chosen enterprise. Our subject dwells about nine miles south from Dufur, and owns a nice estate of five hundred and forty acres, half of which is under cultivation. The place shows marks of thrift and enterprise and its annual returns are very gratifying. The improvements on the farm are of the best and the residence is a two story, tasty and elegant building. Mr. Hillgen has labored since childhood in this county and on this place for about five or six years. He is well acquainted with Wasco county and many of its citizens and is himself numbered with the leading young men.

Frederic H. Hillgen was born in San Francisco, California, on February 14, 1872, the son of Henry and Louise (Hagan) Hillgen. The father came from Germany, where he was born and reared. Then he dwelt some time in California and later came on to Wasco county where he took a timber culture, a homestead, and a pre-emption on Tygh ridge. Since those days, he has been one of the leading farmers of the county and each year he has added more land by purchase until he has now between three and four thousand acres of fine wheat and grazing land. He resides in The Dalles and on the farm, and devotes himself to the oversight of his various properties. The mother of our subject was born in Canada.

When Frederic H. was four years of age, he came with the rest of the family to Wasco county, and here he was educated in the district schools and in the Wasco Independent Academy. Following the days of school books, he went to work on the farm and remained with his father until 1898, when he purchased railroad land and settled down to make a home for himself. In this he has succeeded admirably and has a choice place on the ridge. He is one of the most thrifty and careful farmers and receives good rewards for his labors.

On July 1, 1901, at The Dalles, Mr. Hillgen married Miss Agnes LeDuc. To this union two children have been born, Marcella, on September 12, 1902, and J. Hugh, November 8, 1904. Mr. Hillgen has five brothers, George, Arthur, Walter, Frank, and Cleveland, and three sisters, Virginia, at home, Nellie, the wife of Ferd Deitzel, and Alice, at home. In political matters, Mr. Hillgen is a Democrat, but is not a politician in the usual sense of that word, although he is well posted and active.

ROBERT RAND, owner and operator of the Wau-Guinn-Guinn hotel, one of the most beautiful summer resorts in Oregon, is well known in Wasco county and is a man of enterprise and ability. He was born in Jefferson county, Ohio, on August 28, 1836, the son of William and Margaret (Winters) Rand, natives of Vermont and Jefferson county, Ohio, respectively. They both came from prominent New England families. Reed, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was a relative of the Rands. Robert was reared in Virginia, whither the family had moved when he was small. He gained his education by hard labor, having to walk three miles to the district school, and working between times on the farm. When seventeen, he came with the family to Wisconsin and then he started for himself. Lumber work occupied him some and in 1859 he came to Amador county, California, where he mined for two years. He returned to Wisconsin via the isthmus, having come overland to the coast. He farmed five years in Wisconsin and then married and came west to Iowa. In 1884, the winter of the deep snow, Mr. Rand came hither, and bought fifty acres on the Mt. Hood road and other land later. Also he was in Hood River in the hotel business, having bought the Mt. Hood hotel in the fall of 1885. This he conducted eight years and sold it to Charles Bell. During this time he sold his Mt. Hood land and bought one hundred and sixty acres on the east side. He took up merchandising with his son, J. E., after selling the Mt. Hood hotel. After five years in business with the son they sold to A. S. Blowers & Son. In 1904, he erected his present hotel, and, considering his late start, had a very successful season the first year. The hotel is situated in full view of the falls, which take a leap of two hundred and fifty feet, and is where the scenery of Mt. Hood, the other mountains, and the broad Columbia are in full view, all of which combine to make it one of the most entrancing spots in the country. The building itself is commodious and well supplied with all modern conveniences including the latest sanitary plumbing, and is conducted on strictly up-to-date principles. The grounds are choice, having rustic seats, miniature lake, beautiful shade and flowers. Mr. Rand is a business man and understands the way to cater to the comfort of guests. He has a farm of thirty-five acres and oversees that in addition to his present business.

On September 16, 1857, Mr. Rand married Miss Cristiana Gillespie, a native of New York, and a daughter of John and Charlotte Gillespie, natives of Scotland and New York, respectively. Mr. Rand has three brothers, Martin, James B., and Thomas B., and one sister, Mrs. Lucy Boorman. To Mr. and Mrs. Rand five children have been born, J. Elmer, William F., Delbert E., Ernest C., and Mrs. Henrietta Rham. Mr. Rand is a member of the A. F. & A. M., having joined in 1866. He has a choice collection of Indian curios and is a student of these things. On January 29, 1899, at Hood River, Mrs. Rand was called away by death.

CHARLES CHANDLER is the owner of one of the choicest farms in Wasco county. It consists of two hundred acres of excellent land and is situated in the Hood River valley. He has recently sold about two hundred and eighty acres and still owns the amount mentioned. Excellent house, good barns, and all other improvements needed are in evidence and the thrift and good taste of Mr. Chandler make the place not only profitable, but a delightful rural abode. He was born in Maine, on April 28, 1856. His father, Jesse Chandler, was also born in Maine, as were his parents, and the family is an old and prominent one. Many members were in the Revolution and Moses Chandler was an officer in that war. Our subject's father was a farmer and died in Greenville, Texas, in 1888. He had married Mary Wright, who was born in Farmington, Maine, and descended from a leading family. When Charles was a year old, the family went to Wisconsin, and a year later they went to Kansas where the mother died in 1860. He lived eleven years in Kansas and gained his education from the common schools. He had a farm bought and paid for in Texas before twenty years old. It consisted of one hundred and twenty acres and there he remained until twenty-eight, when he sold and journeyed west to Oregon, selecting the Hood river valley as his objective point. He took a government claim, which he now dwells on, and since those days has given his undivided attention to general farming and fruit raising. About nine acres are devoted to apples, and the balance of the land to general crops.

At Greenville, Texas, on September 17, 1876, Mr. Chandler married Miss Arabella Fox, who was born in Holden, Missouri. Her death occurred in February, 1888. On February 2, 1892, Mr. Chandler married a second time, Mary B. Millner becoming his wife at this time, and the nuptials occurring in Steveson, Washington. Her parents are Alexander and Mary (Thrasher) Millner. Mr. Chandler has three children, Fred, Ruby, and Ollie M. The last named married Robert L. Neves and died at Hood River, on June 28, 1902. Our subject has always evinced an interest in political matters and is an upholder of Republican principles. He has served as school director for many years and always takes a great interest in every measure that is for improvement in any line or betterment of the conditions of the country.

JOSEPH DENI is one of the substantial men of Wasco county, the kind who do things and materially assist to build up the county and augment its wealth. He is an industrious man, well liked and always attentive to the business in hand. His labors here have been faithful, and it is interesting to note that when he came here he was without funds, but with a determination to win his way to wealth and prominence, he took hold with his hands, working on the farms for wages, and the result is that today he is one of the wealthy men of the community. Mr. Deni came to Wasco county in 1887, with Mr. Trudell, who is now his partner, and they both worked out on the farms. After a time at that, they had saved enough money to warrant them taking land and starting for themselves. This they did, securing homesteads where the estate is now located, about six miles east from Kingsley. With characteristic pluck and stability, Mr. Deni began the improvements on his homestead and little by little made the place valuable, besides laying by enough money to purchase more land. Step by step the two men have toiled along until their estate is now of the mammoth proportions of seventeen hundred and ninety-five acres. A portion of this is used for pasture and a part is laid under tribute to produce grain. This year they had five hundred acres of wheat and there is much more of the estate that can be broken up and tilled. Messrs. Trudell and Deni are enterprising and thrifty men and are making money in their labors. In addition to the farming, they handle a good many cattle and winter about eighty to one hundred.

Joseph Deni was born at Stony Point, Ontario, on September 3, 1864, the son of Peter and Jadik (Trudell) Deni. His father was born in Montreal and now is farming in Ontario. His mother was born at Stony Point, the aunt of his partner, on the father's side. She is still living in the old home place. Our subject was reared and educated at his home place and in 1887, as stated before, came west with his partner. Since then they have continued here together. Mr. Deni has five brothers, Frank, Daniel, Ernest, Alexander, and Ralph, all in Stony Point, except Ralph, who rents land in Wasco county. He also has three sisters, Cecilia, Adele, and Adeline. In politics, Mr. Deni is a Democrat and is always keenly interested in public matters and educational affairs.

P. H. MARTIN resides about six miles south from Hood River in the Crapper district, where he has a nice farm and gives attention to fruit raising largely. He was born in Missouri, in 1862, the son of William and Martha (McQuown) Martin, natives of Missouri and Virginia, respectively. The father resides near our subject and his father was born in Kentucky. The mother was descended from Irish ancestry. Henry was raised in Missouri and Iowa and received his education from the common schools. The family moved to Iowa in 1865 and returned to Missouri in 1856. In 1883, Mr. Martin came to Washington and there conducted Dr. Blalock's fruit ranch for seven years. After that, he was eighteen months at Yaquina Bay, Oregon, and then went to Prineville, where he was in the stock business for seven years. He sold out that and came to the Hood River valley in 1899. He finally purchased the place he now owns from Captain A. S. Blowers and has given his attention to its cultivation and improvement since. He has an eight acre orchard and handles some fruit besides other crops.

In 1895, at Prineville, Oregon, Mr. Martin married Miss Emma Lister, who was born in Crook county, Oregon. Previous to her coming to the Hood River valley, she had lived in Crook and Wasco counties, this state. Her father, Thomas Lister, was born in England and came to the United States when two years of age, in 1828. He enlisted in the Mexican War and crossed the plains in 1852 with ox teams, settling near Eugene. After that, he came east of the mountains and did stock raising at Prineville. His death occurred there in 1898. He was a very prominent man, especially in politics and was always identified with the Republican party but never sought office for himself. He married Miss Mary E. Jeter, a native of Kentucky and descended from an old southern family. Mr. Martin has one brother, K. Duncan and four sisters: Sue, wife of William L. Purdin; Celeste; Mary, wife of Fred W. Webber; and Inez V. Mrs. Martin has the following named brothers and sisters, Charles M., Joseph, Hugh J., Catherine, Florence E. Holbrook, Marie Pond, Anna F. Belknap, and Ida M. McEwen. Mr. Martin is a member of the A. O. U. W. and a good strong Republican. He and his wife belong to the Methodist church and she is steward in the same. They have two children, Helen D. and Mary L. LEON RONDEAU, a man of stability and enterprise, has demonstrated his ability to make a first class success in Wasco county, where he has been a leading farmer for many years. He resides about six miles east from Kingsley and is one of the best known and most popular men on the ridge. He has bought and sold considerable land, handling twelve or fifteen sections, and now owns eleven hundred and twenty acres of land including three-fourths of a section of timber land. This year he harvested five hundred acres of wheat, all first class, and in addition to that he handled, as he does each year, a steam thrasher. Mr. Rondeau has a choice farm, and it is provided with all the improvements that could be suggested for a first class Oregon wheat farm and everything indicates him a man of thrift and sagacity. He is a leader in the community and numbers his friends from every quarter.

Leon Rondeau was born in Montreal, Canada, on June 11, 1860, the son of Elzeard and Seraphine (Gilbeau) Rondeau, both natives of the place where our subject was born. In fact, the ancestors on both sides of the house were born in that vicinity for generations back, the first ones there being among the earliest settlers of the section. The father was a mechanic and later removed to Vermont. The mother died in that state. Our subject was twelve when the family made that move and until 1878, he worked in the factories of Vermont. Then he came with his father to Wasco county, coming via San Francisco. The father took a homestead near Kingsley and remained here until his death, which occurred in the house where our subject now lives. The last years of the father's life were spent in the home of his son. He was a man of many virtues and had many friends. Our subject lived here continuously since coming and has labored steadily with the result that he is now possessed of a very valuable property. For twelve successive years he sheared sheep and his record is one hundred and fifty-five in one day. This seems marvelous and is worthy of a position along side of some of the wonderful feats of the land. In fact, it far surpasses those which are made simply for pastime or for the sake of the record alone. Physical effort placed in a calling of commercial value like this is much more worthy than that simply for the name.

At McMinnville, Oregon, occurred the wedding of Mr. Rondeau and Miss Elizabeth Touzin, and the date was October 28, 1889. Mrs. Rondeau was born near Montreal, the daughter of Alexis and Amedile (Boucher) Touzin. The parents were both natives of Montreal and their ancestors for generations back were also born there. They were among the old and prominent French families there. Mr. Rondeau has the following named brothers and sisters, Reme, Joseph, Edward, Mrs. Delia Pattenaude, Mrs. Celia Williams and Mrs. Louisa Perrault. Mrs. Rondeau has one sister, Mrs. Cordelia Poulette. To Mr. and Mrs. Rondeau the following named children have been born: Alexis, a student in Rigaud College, in Canada; Cordelia, studying in a sisters college in Quebec; Alfred E. and Rosaline, both at home; Dona, deceased; and Justine. Mr. Rondeau is a member of the W. W.

and the Maccabees. He and his wife belong to the Roman Catholic church and are devout supporters of the faith. They are people of prominence in this part of the county and have won the admiration and good will of all.

He located a business building on the lot donated by Captain H. C. Coe and put in a stock of general merchandise. This was the beginning of the town. He handled the stock for five years and then sold out to John Middleton and soon after bought Roger's sawmill which he operated for seven years, then sold to the Oregon Lumber Company. While in the store, Mr. Parker had purchased the place where Mrs. Parker now resides and after disposing of his mill, he lived on the place. In 1893, he erected a beautiful residence, located in an ideal spot which commanded a view of the river, and since then that has been the family home. He is a blacksmith and wagon maker, making heavy coach work a specialty. He was born in Linn county, Oregon, July 24, 1861, the son of Andrew W. and Indiana (Smith) Lane, natives of Indiana. When he was eighteen years old our subject left Linn county and removed to Tygh valley, with his parents. They remained there but two years, going thence to Susanville, Lassen county, California. During his nine years' residence in that locality our subject attended the district schools, and learned his trade from his father. From Susanville he went to Seattle, and two years subsequently came to The Dalles where he opened a blacksmith shop at the corner of Third and Jefferson streets. Mr. Lane employs from four to eight men. He has built many stage coaches that have been satisfactorily in commission all over the state of Oregon. ANDREW W. LANE, now retired from active business, resides with his son, L. L. Lane, in The Dalles, Oregon. He was born in Fountain county, Indiana, on February 11, 1830. His father, David Lane, was a native of Virginia and his parents came from England. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was in the Revolutionary war and David Lane was in the War of 1812. David Lane's mother was of Scotch descent and died aged ninety-seven, her husband having died at the same age. The mother of our subject was born in Kentucky and her maiden name was Drusilla Swearingen. Her parents were natives of Virginia and Kentucky and came from German ancestry. Her father was a remarkably strong man and could carry two bushels of wheat into his grist mill at the age of one hundred. He died, aged one hundred and two. Our subject grew up on his father's farm in Indiana and when sixteen came with his parents to Missouri. Two years later, he returned to Indiana, where his mother died. Then he started out in life for himself, taking up the patent right business, having a fine ditching machine that he handled. For four years he traveled through the middle states with that, then farmed with his brother. Afterward, they decided to come west and in 1853 a train captained by our subject's brother wended its way from Benton county, Indiana to the Willamette valley. The journey was uneventful, save that our subject was detained in the Grande Ronde valley, Oregon ten days, by mountain fever. No hostilities of the Indians were experienced except on one occasion one drew his bow quickly to kill our subject, but he observing the action covered him with his revolver so much quicker that the Indian dropped hostilities and said "How do, How do." Recovering from his fever in the Grande Ronde valley, Mr. Lane started for the Willamette valley and the first house he came to, twenty miles east from Oregon City, was Foster's. Later, he passed on to Salem where he was confined eighty-four days by typhoid fever. Then he removed to Harrisburg, where he began wagon making with Mr. Macy, a pioneer blacksmith.

There, on January 10, 1858, Mr. Lane married Miss Indiana Smith, a native of Illinois. Her father, Abraham Smith, was born in Tennessee from agricultural stock and died when one hundred years of age. He married a second time when ninety-eight years of age and in 1852, had crossed the plains with ox teams. Mr. Lane and his wife lived in Harrisburg eighteen years, where he followed wagon making and did a good business. He never used his land rights but later moved to Springfield, Linn county and put up a wagon shop, where he could utilize water power. There his wife died on October 6, 1876. Soon thereafter, our subject's health failed and he was practically an invalid for twenty-five years. For nine years of his life he was in California and assisted by his three boys conducted a cooper shop. He also patented a windmill, which netted him considerable money. At various times, he had hemorrhage of the lungs but constantly fought off death until at the present time, in the riper years of his life, his health is splendid, practically no trace of his former sickness remaining. Mr. Lane is a natural mechanic and has invented many useful appliances. He is the thirteenth of a family of fourteen children.

Mr. Lane is a venerable and esteemed pioneer and it is with pleasure that we are permitted to give this epitome of his interesting career.

THOMAS A. WARD, deceased. The birth of Mr. Ward occurred in Wisconsin on October 17, 1846 and he died at The Dalles on April 6, 1903, aged fifty-seven years. His father before him had been one of the prominent men in Oregon and one of the most intrepid of pioneers. He was associated with him in various capacities and came to be one of the leading citizens of the state of Oregon. His death occurring in the prime of life, snatched away one beloved and esteemed and he was widely known and recognized as a leader. His father, John H. Ward, was born in New York state and went to Wisconsin in the early days and there followed mining. Afterwards he lived in Missouri then came on west to California and later to Virginia City, Nevada, and mined in both places. His family joined him in California after he had mined seven years. Five years later, they came to Oregon and about 1864 took land in the Cross Hollow country, the present site of Shaniko. The family home was there for many years and stock raising occupied them. They also kept hotel and our subject drove stage for many years. The Wards were among the first settlers and were the most prominent people in this part of the country. All over western Oregon they were well known and about 1874, the father sold out his property and removed to The Dalles. Some three years later, he was called away by death. He was a man of the most unswerving integrity and sterling worth. Our subject continued to drive stage until the winter of 1876, operating on the Canyon City line. In the following spring, he took a claim in Long Hollow and conducted a stopping station for the stage in addition to raising grain and stock. For nine years, he dwelt there and then sold the property and moved to The Dalles. Here he was engaged in the hotel business for a few months and then took up the livery business with Jim Eglin. Eglin sold later to Mrs. Ward's brother. In 1892 Mr. Ward was elected sheriff of Wasco county on the Democratic ticket and after serving for one term, he again engaged in the livery business. He continued in this until the time of his death, the firm being known as Ward and Robertson. After his demise, his son succeeded as his mother's agent and is conducting the business with Mr. Robertson at this time.

In political matters, Mr. Ward was a strong Democrat and held many important offices, as member of the city council, water commissioner, president of the fire department, and so forth.

In Grant county, in Spanish Gulch, on August 27, 1876, Mr. Ward married Miss Mary L. Kerns, who was born near Mt. Tabor. Her father, William Kerns, crossed the plains in 1852 and took land near Mt. Tabor. He died in 1878. He followed mining for many years and was killed at Spanish Gulch by a cave-in from a mine. He had married Miss Lois Allen, a native of Maine and a member of the old colonial Allen family. The marriage occurred in Indiana and Mrs. Kerns died in Oregon City, in 1894. Mr. Ward's mother is now eighty-eight years of age and lives with his widow. He had one brother, John, who was killed accidentally in traveling from Nevada to Oregon. He has two sisters, Mary J., the widow of Robert Milligan, and Bercia A., widow of William Saltzman. Mrs. Ward has two brothers, Wilbur G. and Elmer B., and one sister, Lulu Westervelt. Three children were born to our subject and his wife, T. Elmer, attending to the stable, Rex A., employed in the stable and Lulu L. at home.

Mr. Ward was a prominent member of fraternal circles, assisting in organizing Ridgeley Lodge, I. O. O. F., of Dufur, of which he was the first noble grand and also a representative to the grand lodge and encampment. He and his wife were members of the Rebekahs and the Women of Woodcraft. He belonged also to the W. W., being a charter member in The Dalles.

His life speaks for itself and he is cherished in the hearts and memories of those who knew him. Fearless and brave, yet guided by a keen sense of honor and a due appreciation of his stewardship, he conducted himself both in public and private so that his reputation was flawless and unsullied. In discharging the trying duties of sheriff of Wasco county, he was always known as humane yet strictly executing the wish of the law. His friends are numbered by legion in all parts of Oregon, and no man was more highly esteemed or widely known than Thomas A. Ward.

HORATIO A. FARGHER, a prominent and extensive stockman of Wasco county, resides in The Dalles. He was born on the Isle of Man, on November 14, 1849. His father, Thomas C. Fargher, a native of the same place, came from an old Manx family that dates back for many centuries. He came to the United States in 1870, returned to his native home, in 1888, and died six years later. The mother of our subject was Susan (Christian) Fargher, a native of the Isle of Man, where she died when Horatio was about thirteen years of age. After receiving his education in a private school, the subject of this article came to the United States in 1867, apprenticed on the ship, Cairnsmore. In 1868, he came on another trip and deciding that he had seen enough of sea faring life, severed his connection with the vessel at San Francisco, having been two years on the ocean. For a time, he wrought on the bay schooners then went to Alaska on the ship Czarovitch. Six months later, he signed articles on the ship Favorite, from San Francisco to Liverpool then visited his old home and in 1870, his father returned with him to the United States. After a short visit in Sacramento, they came to Portland and there our subject wrought on the river steamers for two years. Then he took a trip to Fort Wrangel, Alaska and after arduous traveling over ice and overcoming great difficulties and finding but little gold in the ground they thawed out, they returned to Puget sound. In 1875, Mr. Fargher came to Wasco county with his brother, Thomas C., Jr., and bought out a man's rights on railroad land three miles from Dufur. Later, he sold his interest in the farm to his brother and purchased his present estate which consists of twenty-six hundred acres. A portion of it is grain land and the balance is used for pasture. He handles a large quantity of stock and is one of the prosperous men of the community.

On February 7, 1889, at The Dalles, Mr. Fargher married Miss Emma Roth, born in Minnesota, on September 18, 1865, the daughter of John M. and Margaret (Unsel) Roth, natives of Germany, and mentioned elsewhere in this volume. Mr. Fargher has the following brothers and sisters, Arthur W., Thomas C., Jr., Frederick D., Walter A., Alexander, and Susannah. The last four mentioned are deceased. Our subject was educated in the district schools and in Monmouth college, spending two winters in the last named institution. Then he rented his father's farm for two years after which he bought two hundred and forty acres near Harrisburg which was his home for nine years. Then he came to Wasco county and filed on a homestead and pre-emption, which he still owns. Two years later, he took up cabinet work and followed the same until 1879, when he came to The Dalles and took charge of the furniture store for J. F. Rowers. In the year of 1884, he sold out and our subject and his brother purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land on the river below The Dalles. Part of it is devoted to pasture and eighty acres of it are especially adapted to fruit. He has a very large orchard and produces some of the most excellent fruit in the valley. The place is handled by his son and produces diversified crops.

GEORGE COOPER, one of Wasco county's popular and rising young men who has shown marked thrift and industry in his labors, which presage a bright future for him, resides about a mile south from The Dalles and has spent his entire life in this section.

He was born in The Dalles, on March 25, 1868. His father, Robert Cooper, was a native of Aberdeenshire, Scotland and came to Canada when nineteen years of age. After six years' residence there, he came to Douglas county, Oregon in 1860 and two years later, removed to The Dalles and engaged in teaming. In 1870, he filed on a homestead just south from The Dalles, where he now lives. He married a native Scotch girl who is still living with him. The high schools of The Dalles and a business college of Portland completed the education of our subject, then he took up commercial work for a short time. After that, he bought forty acres of land from the Marshall Hill estate and is devoting the same almost entirely to orchard. He also raises melons and other vegetables and has a very beautiful and valuable place.

On June 15, 1898, at The Dalles, Mr. Cooper married Miss Frances E. Rowe, who was born in that part of Wasco county which now forms Wheeler county. Her father, Joseph K. Rowe, was a native of Baltimore, Maryland, and his father, of England. He came to the United States with his parents when an infant, and served in the Civil War, confederate army, Fortieth Missouri Infantry, under Captain George B. Clark. During the latter part of the war, he was engaged in the repair shops and in 1866, came to Oregon. He settled in the John Day country, which was then almost uninhabited, and there remained until 1881, then moved to The Dalles and took a position in the Oregon Railroad and Navigation shops and later, went to Portland. In June, 1903, at St. Vincent hospital, Portland, he was called away by death. He was a member of the Congregational church, the A. F. & A. M. and a highly respected citizen. The mother of Mrs. Cooper was Martha V. (Dedman) Rowe, a native of Tennessee and descended from an old and prominent southern family. Her father had extensive machine shops and foundries at Camden, Arkansas when the Civil War broke out. They were confiscated by the confederate army and he was pressed into service. After the war, he secured three thousand dollars for his entire property for which he had been offered thirty thousand dollars previously. His death occurred in Idaho, on July 13, 1902 and he was a Mason of sixty-two years' standing. After the war, he settled in Texas, traveling later to Oregon. Mr. Cooper has one brother, John Cooper and three sisters, Ella Taylor, Annie, Katie and Lura. Mrs. Cooper has one brother, Walter C., and two sisters, Nona, wife of Henry Readell, in The Dalles, and Lulu C.

Mr. Cooper is a member of the I. O. O. F., the Artisans and the Methodist church. Mrs. Cooper is a member of the Congregational church. They have two children, Helen, born May 7, 1901 and Glen R., born October 3, 1903.

Mr. Cooper is a Republican, has attended the conventions but is not very active in this work although staunch.

in Pennsylvania, near the Ohio line, on May 9, 1829, the son of Abner and Zeruah (Griswold) Adams. The father is a close relative of the noted John and John Quincy Adams and the family is too well known in American history to need further comment. The Griswolds were old and prominent people and Mrs. Adams, the widow of our subject, has a property deed made to the Griswold family prior to the Revolution. Our subject was reared and educated in the eastern part of the United States and in 1853, with his wife and one child joined a train for Marion county, Oregon. In due time the horse and ox teams brought them safely through and then they took a donation claim near the present site of Jefferson. However, previous to that, they moved to town and later bought other land near by. Owing to the asthma of his wife, Mr. Adams removed to Grant county, Oregon, in 1871 and engaged in stock raising. He did very well and soon had large bands of cattle, sheep and horses. In 1880, he came to The Dalles and engaged as a wool buyer for the Oregon City mills. Later, he bought wheat. During his residence in The Dalles for nearly a quarter of a century, he was one of the leading figures in its improvement and progress. For nine years, he held the directorship of The Dalles public schools and was most prominent in bringing them to their present excellent condition. He was a moving spirit in securing the high school building and was tireless in his efforts in any line where he could bring improvement and betterment. In 1898, Mr. Adams retired from active business life and on March 27, 1903, came the summons of the death angel to depart from this scene. He was beloved by all and widely known throughout this state where he had made a reputation for himself as an honorable, noble and capable man.

On December 31, 1849, at Knoxville, Illinois whither the Adams family had moved when our subject was fifteen years of age, he married Miss Nancy C. Cox, who was born in Indiana, on January 24, 1831. Her parents, Benjamin B. and Elizabeth (Vangilder) Cox, were natives of Ohio and from German and Dutch extraction, respectively. They married in Ohio and came to Oregon with Mr. Adams and his family, bringing with them a family of two sons and three daughters. Mr. Cox died in 1878 at Camp Watson, Grant county. His wife had died at Oregon City, in 1853. Mr. Adams has no brothers or sisters living but his widow has one sister, Louisa, widow of Willis Osborn of Milton, Oregon. To Mr. and Mrs. Adams two children were born, M. D., mentioned elsewhere in this work and Elizabeth, the widow of C. M. Brown and now living with her mother. Her son, the

STEPHEN B. ADAMS, deceased. The history of Wasco county and in fact a large portion of Oregon, could not be thoroughly written without especial mention of Mr. Adams. He was born grandson of our subject, Harry E., is a young man of promise and well known as a carpenter and builder in The Dalles.

For many years, Mr. Adams was a member of the I. O. O. F. and was prime mover in the establishment of the Oddfellow cemetery at The Dalles. Politically, he was a Democrat but never active, preferring always to assist his friends to public positions than to take them for himself.

DANIEL L. ZACHARY, who resides about four miles south of The Dalles on Three Mile creek, is one of the venerable citizens and sturdy pioneers of Oregon. He gives his attention to farming and fruit raising, overseeing his place and is now largely retired from active life. His father, Alexander Zachary, was born in Arkansas and descended from a very prominent family. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was a patriot of the Revolution. Alexander Zachary died in Oregon in 1859. He came among the very first who made their way across the plains, his train arriving in 1843. Settlement was made just east from the present site of Portland. He was born in 1804. Alexander Zachary married Miss Sarah Luster, a native of Kentucky and from a prominent southern family. She died in Dayton, Washington, in 1894. Our subject was reared in Arkansas and attended the school there and in Oregon until 1853 when he started in life for himself. His first venture was stock raising in Linn county, where he took a half section as a donation claim. For fourteen years, he labored assiduously there, then came to Gilliam county, taking a homestead, preemption and timber culture claim. He was for sixteen years one of the leading stockmen of Gilliam county. It was 1897, when he came to his present location and purchased one hundred and twenty acres of land which is the home place. Ten acres of this are devoted to orchard which produces Italian prunes, grapes and so forth, and the balance to general farming.

On July 16, 1862, Mr. D. L. Zachary married Miss Martha Dinwiddie. The wedding occurred in Linn county and the bride was born in Indiana. Her father, David Dinwiddie, was born in Ohio and descended from the old and prominent Dinwiddie family, well known in colonial days, members of which held important offices as governor and so forth. Mr. Dinwiddie married Miss Elsie Hildreth, a native of Indiana in which state the marriage occurred. The Hildreth family was also connected with the inception of colonial history and were prominent for many generations. Mr. Dinwiddie brought his family to Oregon in 1853.

Mr. Zachary has no brothers living but three sisters, Katherine Davis, Jane Bowen and Nancy. Mrs. Zachary has two brothers Joseph and James and two sisters, Mary and Harriet. To Mr. and Mrs. Zachary the following children have been born: Elmer, a farmer in Linn county; Ellsworth, a farmer near Dayton, Washington; Albert, a stockman in the Yakima country; Ira with his father; Daniel, also at home; Elsie, wife of Wilfred Cecil, a farmer in Morrow county; Maggie, who died on July 16, 1903, aged fourteen years and five months; and Wills W.

Politically, Mr. Zachary is a staunch Democrat while in local affairs, he is active and well posted. His standing in the community is of the best while he and his wife are known far and near as hospitable people.

OWEN JONES, who is one of the leading farmers of the Tygh Ridge country, is a man of stability and industry, as is evidenced by the fact that when he came here he was not possessed of any earthly goods, but went to work with his hands and is now the owner of twenty-two hundred acres of good land, farm and pasture, besides having much stock. The place has been improved from time to time as he has found the need, and is today a valuable estate. Mr. Jones is a man of sagacity and plans carefully in his enterprises and then with a sure hand executes his plans to the line. This, with his untiring care of details insures him the best of success and his business could but prosper under his guidance.

Owen Jones was born in Wales, on June 9, 1869, the son of Robert and Sarah (Jones) Jones, both natives of Wales. The father died in his native place, but the mother is still living there. Our subject was well educated in the public schools, and in 1888, came to the new world to find the fortune that was awaiting him here. He spent the first eighteen months in Utica, New York, then came to the land of promise, Oregon, where he soon decided to try his fortune in Wasco county. After looking over the country, he decided on the place where he now dwells as a homestead and filed. Since then he has transformed the prairie claim into a valuable farm and has added betimes by purchase until he owns now the magnificent estate we have already mentioned. It is no small task to start on the raw prairie with one's bare hands and in a few years have a fine farm, plenty of stock and all improvements needed, as any one will testify who has tried the scheme. But Mr. Jones was equal to the task and he has now to show a handsome property. He winters many cattle and sells annually about seventy-five hogs, all being the fine Poland China breed. His cattle number usually about one hundred head, sometimes more. His place is neat and thrifty, and he is making the wealth that his labors deserve.

At The Dalles, on July 10, 1899, Mr. Jones married Miss Sophia Roth, who was born in Kansas, on September 21, 1872. Her parents, John and Margaret (Nunselt) Roth, are mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mr. Jones has the following named brothers and sisters: John, William, David, Robert, Ellis, Thomas, Mrs. Sarah Pritchard, Mrs. Elizabeth Seufert, and Catherine.

FELIX C. SEXTON, sheriff of Wasco county, and member of the firm of Sexton & Walther, dealers in hardware and implements, at The Dalles, was born in Henry county, Tennessee, April 13, 1854. His parents were James and Milberry (Ellis) Sexton, natives of Tennessee. The father's father was born in Ireland. The father, who was a farmer, died about 1873, and the mother passed away in September, 1900, in Kansas, at the age of seventy-eight. Her mother lived to be ninety-eight years old.

Until 1859 our subject was reared in Tennessee, and the family then moved to Illinois where he received his education in the district schools in his locality. At the time he was working on a farm with his father he split the log seats for the log school house at which he received his elementary education. The Sexton family moved to Kansas, and when our subject was eighteen years of age his father died. Young Sexton and his brother purchased a farm and they cultivated the same until 1880, when, in common with their neighbors, they suffered greatly from drought and the grasshopper pest. Then our subject and his wife came to Oregon, she remaining in Portland visiting while he came to The Dalles arriving April 16, 1880, with a cash capital of five dollars. He immediately went to work on a ranch, remained through harvest, and then went into the timber where he split rails and chopped cord wood, and for three years followed various employments, and saved money sufficient to purchase a ranch about two miles from Kingsley postoffice, and here the family resided for thirteen years. Disposing of this property they came to The Dalles, and prepared to return to Kansas. Owing to high water in the Columbia they could not get away, and when they attempted to leave by the railroad the strike on the line prevented them from doing so. It was the wish of Mrs. Sexton to remain, and in the various obstacles thrown in their way she could see the hand of fate, and the eastern trip was abandoned. Mr. Sexton then engaged in the feed business three years and when he disposed of the same he was appointed deputy sheriff by Robert Kelly, now living in Spokane. In June, 1902, our subject was elected to the office of sheriff of Wasco county, receiving a majority of five hundred and seven on the Republican ticket, running ahead of his ticket two hundred votes. He has served nearly every season as delegate to county conventions and has always taken as active an interest in politics as his business would permit. In January, 1901, he entered into partnership with W. E. Walther in his present business. Our subject, however, is justly proud of being a successful farmer, and holds to the opinion that that is the ideal life for one to lead.

February 12, 1879, Mr. Sexton was married, at Abilene, Kansas, to Vinelda V. Bradfield, a native of Kansas, born in Dickinson county. Her father, Erasmus W., and Mary (Bell) Bradfield, are both dead. Mr. Sexton has six brothers and two sisters living: William H., of Kansas; George W., of Sherman county, Oregon; James T., Joseph M., Isaac A., and Henry, all of Kansas; Jerline H., wife of Samuel W. Scoggins, of Denver, Colorado; Martha J., married to J. H. Dunn, a farmer, living in Kansas. Mrs. Sexton has three brothers and three sisters: Benton P., mining in Alaska; Jesse J., a contractor and builder in Kansas; Ellis E., an Oklahoma farmer; Dora D., wife of David Sommers, of Kansas; Annie A., married to William Swartz, of Kansas; and Montie M., single, residing in Kansas. Our subject has nine children living, having lost one: Francis M., bookkeeper in the hardware store; Millie M., Dora M., Guy A., Leona, Felix N., Harold, Nello, and Theodore D.

Mr. Sexton is a member of the B. P. O. E., I. O. O. F., of which he is past grand and representative to the grand lodge, and the W. O. W.

In June, 1904, Mr. Sexton was reelected sheriff by a majority of over twelve hundred.

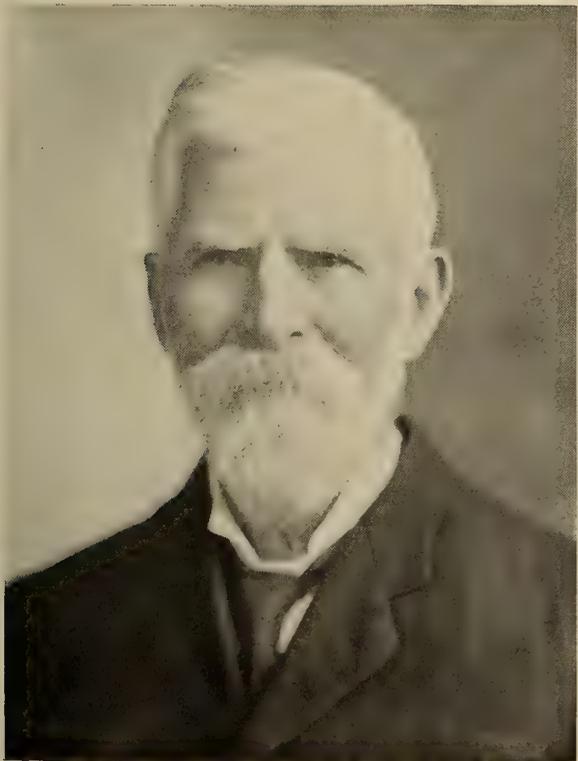

DANIEL J. COOPER resides on Tenmile creek about ten miles up from The Dalles. He was born in Bradley county, Tennessee, on August 23, 1836. His father, Elbert E. Cooper, was a native of Kentucky. His parents were also born in Kentucky. The mother's father, the great-grandfather of our subject was George Frederick Cooper, a native of Germany. During the Revolution such was the intense feeling against King George that he dropped the name George and it was never used by him afterward, he always being known as Frederick. He fought during the Revolution and was finally married in North Carolina to Dorothy Call, who came from a prominent and influential colonial family, which is still a leading family in the south. He made several trips to Kentucky with Boone and finally settled there where he died. It is stated that his little log cabin is standing there to this day. Our subject's father was reared in Kentucky until sixteen years of age when his father died and he went to Tennessee where he was married to Nancy Wann, a native of Meigs county, Tennessee. Her parents were natives of Virginia and their ancestors originally came from Wales, among the early settlers of the Virginia colony. Nancy (Wann) Cooper's mother, our subject's grandmother, was Lydia Stockton before her marriage to Mr. Wann. Her father, Clayton Stockton, married Nancy Patton. Clayton and Nancy (Patton) Stockton were born Quakers, but later became Baptists. They migrated from Virginia to Tennessee. Clayton Stockton served in the War of 1812. Our subject was raised principally in Missouri where his parents moved when he was two years of age. He was well educated in the district schools and the high school and when twenty left home for California with his uncle, Michael W. Buster. They crossed the plains with ox teams to Santa Rosa and vicinity. He did well cutting wood for the Santa Rosa mills, then went to Fraser river and finally came back to San Francisco broke and disgusted. He spent two years in charge of a cattle ranch and then took steamship to New York, finally landing in Missouri, in 1861. He tried several times to enlist but the company every time was disbanded or broken up. Finally, he was enlisted in Company D, Seventy-sixth Missouri, on August 30, 1862, and was in several battles and skirmishes and was then discharged honorably as second sergeant. Then with his wife and one child, and his parents, he turned his face westward with no definite place in view except to get out of the unsettled and uncertain state of affairs in Missouri and Kansas. When they came to the forks of the road on the Platte river, they finally decided to come to Oregon and in the fall of 1863, reached Polk county where they remained fourteen years. After following farming and stock raising for this time, our subject was in the mercantile business for three or four years, having purchased a warehouse on the river in company with his brother. In 1876, he sold out this property and went to Marion county, near the Silverton mills. He did well in business there for a couple of years then came to eastern Oregon and bought a portion of the place which he now owns. He has in this estate now twenty-nine hundred acres of land, sixteen hundred of which are tillable. This year he has seven hundred acres of grain and rents the balance. Mr. Cooper is one of the leading farmers of eastern Oregon and has made a fine success in his labors.

On May 9, 1861, in Lawrence county, Missouri, Mr. Cooper married Arvazena Spillman, who was born in Allen county, Kentucky on April 13, 1845. Her parents, Nathan and Emily (Prewett) Spillman, were natives of Kentucky. Mr. Cooper has six brothers, William H., James S., Jacob C., Riley D., John E. and Albert and three sisters, Mrs. Sarah Gildow, Patience, single, and Mrs. Elizabeth Mann, deceased. Mrs. Cooper has the following named brothers and sisters, Lewis, Brownlow, John, William, Luther, Mrs. Parilee Cooper, the wife of our subject's brother, Jacob C., and Mrs. Julia Mize. To Mr. and Mrs. Cooper the following named children have been born: Charles C., a harness maker in Dufur; Elbert N., a stockman at Billings, Montana; Cyrus, with his father; Daniel J., in Wyoming; Avery J., a lieutenant in the regular army at Fort Stevens; James A., at home; Kenneth L., at the agricultural college at Corvallis; Belle, the wife of Dr. Elmer E. Ferguson, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work, and who, with her husband and Dr. Reuter owns The Dalles hospital and is one of the most successful physicians in this part of the state; Mary, wife of James F. Thompson, a flour mill owner at Lewiston, Idaho; Nancy, a teacher in The Dalles public school; Prudence, the wife of Fred W. Bailey, in charge of the grocery department of Pease and Mays establishment; Ruth, a trained nurse at Portland; Bingilia, the wife of Harry E. Northrup, an attorney of Portland; and Mildred, a school girl.

Mr. and Mrs. Cooper are members of the Congregational church. He belongs to the G. A. R. and his wife to the Relief Corps. In political matters, Mr. Cooper is a Republican and is frequently delegate to the state and county conventions. After coming to Oregon our subject was a special agent in the land office with his headquarters in Washington, D. C., for some time. Mr. Cooper's father was a Baptist preacher and for forty years preached the gospel, never accepting any pay for this service. He was well known in the Willamette valley, where he labored for many years.

FRANK CADDY is one of the most progressive and successful farmers in the Hood River valley. He resides near Frankton school and was born in Dubuque, Iowa, on July 5, 1854. His father, Thomas Caddy, was born in Staffordshire, England and the family were farmers and blacksmiths for many generations back, they having lived in the same house since the reign of Queen Ann. The father came to the United States when twenty-one and settled in Dubuque and followed his trade. In 1877, he moved to Fayette county and in 1883, went to Nebraska, where he followed blacksmithing and in the winter of 1883, was caught in a blizzard and froze to death in Wheeler county. He was an enthusiastic Republican and a school director for twelve years in Centergrove, Iowa and the suburbs of Dubuque. He married Lucy E. Day, a native of New York. For many generations, her ancestors lived in Day Hollow, near Binghampton. Several of the family fought in the Revolution and her grandfather came from an old Scotch family that dates back to the time of King James. Our subject remained with his parents until he came west in 1885 and rode the range for many years. His favorite trip was to go to the Pecos valley in New Mexico, purchase horses and drive them to Iowa where they were sold to advantage. He made the trip each year until he came to the Hood River valley. On November 10, 1890, he took a homestead which he still owns. For seven months he worked for William Slingerland when he first came, and in March, 1896, he bought five acres where he resides at present. Later, he added ten more by purchase and here he has bestowed his labors since.

On April 30, 1891, at the Belmont church, Mr. Caddy married Miss Minnie E. Boorman, the daughter of William and Lucy (Rand) Boorman. To this union the following children have been born, Leon, Dorothy, and three who died in infancy. Mr. Caddy has four brothers, Charles, Thomas, Wilbur A. and Joseph, and two sisters, Mrs. Hannah Ohler and Alice E., besides three sisters dead, Ella, Neva, and Blanche.

Mrs. Caddy belongs to the Methodist church. Mr. Caddy's father was an Oddfellow of many years' standing and very influential, having passed all the chairs of the order and was delegate to the grand lodge. Mr. Caddy has an excellent place and well improved. From about four acres, he has sold five hundred and sixty-two dollars worth of strawberries. He cuts as high as twenty-two tons of hay from four acres. On one acre, he cut seven tons at the first mowing, a record which is hard to beat.

HENRY L. MAYHEW is a man of large experience in the industrial world and has passed through many hardships and much arduous work to attain the position he now occupies. He resides about eight miles east from Kingsley, where he has an estate of four hundred acres, over half of which is now under the plow. He took the first part of it as a homestead and after improving that, purchased the balance. He raises grain and stock and is one of the thrifty and leading men of this section. Mr. Mayhew is a man of wide information and keeps himself well posted in the literature of the world and its progress. He was well educated in the French schools of his youth, but when he came to the United States he took up the task of mastering the English language, so as to speak, read and write it correctly. He has accomplished this task, which is no small one, and entirely without instruction, which shows his tenacity and ability.

Henry L. Mayhew was born near Stony Point, Ontario, on April 16, 1863, the son of Jacob and Lucy (Brunnett) Mayhew, both natives of Stony Point. The father came from a French colonial family and remained in his native place until his death, which occurred when our subject was seven. The mother also descended from a French colonial family and now dwells at Stony Point. After being educated, Henry L., went to Michigan, being then seventeen. Two years later he returned to Ontario and then entered the employ of the Canadian Pacific. Later he contracted on the construction of that line in British Columbia and following that he took a trip overland, with his blankets and provisions on his back, to Sandpoint, Idaho. Two companions accompanied him and they had a hard time. Then Mr. Mayhew did contract work on the Northern Pacific, and after that did logging at Chehalis. Two years later he came to Wasco county and took the homestead mentioned. He went to work with a will to make a home and gain a fortune and he has succeeded well. He started without means, but has prospered exceedingly in his work since.

At The Dalles, on November 25, 1895, Mr. Mayhew married Mrs. Lulu Wildrick, the daughter of Harvey and Jennie (Brown) Smith. The father died in the east, but the mother lives with this daughter. The former was born in Vermont, and the latter in Pennsylvania. Mrs. Mayhew was born in Michigan. By her former marriage she has one son, Willie, who is a student in Holme's business college in Portland. To Mr. and Mrs. Mayhew one son has been born, Arthur. Mrs. Mayhew is an only child. Mr. Mayhew has the following named brothers and sisters: Patrick, Napoleon, Mrs. Emily Bully, Mrs. Delama DeMarrais, and Mrs. Selema DeMarrais. Mr. Mayhew was the first one to come here from Stony Point, and now several of his early associates are here and prosperous men. In politics, he is a Republican and active in the interests of his party. He is school director and has been for a long time. Fraternally, he is affiliated with the W. W., and is also chairman of the precinct committee.

HENRY H. TOMLINSON, surveyor and farmer, resides about a mile out from Mount Hood. He is one of the pioneers of this country and has been very active in many lines of development work throughout the state. He was born in England, on January 22, 1855, the son of Samuel and Harriett (Hindley) Tomlinson, natives also of England, where they were married. The wedding occurred in Lincolnshire. They came to the United States in 1857 and settled in Genesee county, Michigan, where the father now lives retired. The mother died on June 4, 1902, aged seventy-two. Our subject was raised and educated in Michigan, and in 1874 went to Nebraska and engaged in overseeing a crew on the railroad. Later, he returned to Michigan and came to Ohio, after which he went to Michigan and learned the carpenter trade. In 1883 we find him in Hood River, Oregon, and he filed on a preemption a little south from where he lives at the present time. In 1884 he worked for H. C. Coe, on the Mt. Hood stage line. The next year he relinquished his preemption and went to Douglas county, Oregon. The same year he returned to Hood River, then went to Washington and worked for Lyman Smith as engineer in sawmill. In 1890, we find him working for the Southern Pacific railroad at Woodburn. Soon thereafter, he came to the valley to clear his homestead, which he had taken up in 1878. Since that time he has farmed here. In the spring of 1893, Mr. Tomlinson bought the Baldwin sawmill and operated the same for nine years. In May, 1902, he sold his property to John Koontz. Ever since learning the art in younger years, Mr. Tomlinson has given more or less attention to surveying and has operated in various sections of the country. He has sold one hundred and twenty acres of his quarter section and is improving the other forty in an excellent manner. He has a very tasty cottage together with other improvements and is making an ideal home of his place. He has a fine apple orchard and expects to plant more.

On February 20, 1877, at the residence of the bride at Mount Hood, Mr. Tomlinson married Miss Emily E. Edick, who was born in Illinois, on August 7, 1859. Her father, Henry Edick, was a native of New York, and his father, Henry Edick, lived to be one hundred and four years of age. He was born in Deerfield, Oneida county,

New York, on June 28, 1770, and was a pioneer there and in various sections of the country. He married Miss Amelia Edick. He was the father of ten children and at the time of his death, six were living, the eldest being seventy-four and the youngest forty.

Mrs. Tomlinson's mother was Alice (Seymour) Edick, a native of McHenry county, Illinois, where she was married. She now resides in Mount Hood, the widow of Oscar Sandman. Our subject has two brothers, Lewis W. and Franklin, and five sisters, Mary E. Allen, Sarah, Hattie Montague, Ida and Lucy Meyers. Mrs. Tomlinson has one brother, William H., and one half brother, Delbert Sandman. Mr. Tomlinson is a member of the A. F. & A. M., and a good strong Republican. The children born to this worthy couple are Myrtle E., Delbert V., and Ivy, aged fourteen, eleven and two respectively. Mr. Tomlinson has had two severe accidents, each of which nearly cost him his life. While piloting a number of tourists to Mount Hood, on one occasion, he stooped to drink water from a spring and a falling rock struck him in the forehead, fracturing his skull. After recovering, he was one day in his mill when the emery wheel burst and a portion of it struck him in the same place, again fracturing his skull. He is one of the enterprising and progressive men of this valley, has a broad acquaintance and many friends.

CHARLES FRALEY resides at 922 Ninth street, The Dalles. He was born on April 29, 1849, in Iowa, the son of Daniel A. and Jincey C. (Goslin) Fraley, natives of Ohio and Indiana, respectively. The father's ancestors were prominent American people in colonial days, and he was brought up on the farm. He died at Rosco, Missouri, on November 20, 1887. The mother's ancestors were also settlers on American soil long before there was a United States, and she died at Rosco, Missouri, on February 6, 1872. Our subject was reared principally in Indiana. Montgomery county, where he was taken when six years of age. The graded schools of Linden furnished his educational training and he remained with his father until twenty-two years of age, then he began farming for himself continuing in the same until 1889, when he came to Oregon. Wasco county appealed to him more strongly than any other place and he selected land near Kingsley, securing a half section, half of which he still owns, the balance having been deeded to his son. During the winters he resides in his home in town, but spends most of the summers on the farm, having been prospered in his labors since coming here and having secured a sufficient fortune to warrant his retiring from the arduous labors of life; and it is pleasant that he is enabled to enjoy the fruits of his toil.

On March 31, 1871, at Rosco, Missouri, Mr. Fraley married Miss Margaret J. Pugh, a native of Columbus, Ohio. Her father, Andrew J. Pugh, was also born in Ohio, being descended from Welsh parents. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Wales. The mother was Christina Wolf, a native of Ohio and from a Virginia family. The parents of our subject are now both deceased. Mr. Fraley has two brothers, Horace G. and Oliver M., and two sisters, Jincy C. Leslie, and Lizzie Lasley. Mrs. Fraley has three brothers, James M., Archibald and Jacob, and two sisters, Frances Hobkins and Martha Evick.

Politically, we find Mr. Fraley allied with the Republican party where he is considered a staunch wheel horse. He is a member of the A. F. & A. M. To our subject and his wife seven children have been born: Athel V., who owns a ranch adjoining our subject's and is a partner with him; John, on the home place; Nettie, wife of Ernest Mayhew, at Victor, Oregon; and Nannie, Ellen, May and Stella at home.

WILLIAM S. GRIBBLE, a prominent and popular citizen of Wasco county, is located at Mt. Hood, where he handles a general merchandise establishment and also is postmaster. He has a choice stock of well selected goods and is doing a fine business. His birth occurred in Clackamas county, Oregon, on November 28, 1862, and he carries the distinction of being a native of the Web-Foot state and is a son of whom Oregon may be proud. His father, Joseph B. Gribble, was born in Missouri and crossed the plains with his parents in 1846, with ox teams, being then twelve years of age. They had an uneventful journey, as the Indians were quiet; but they broke out the next year. Our subject's father took a donation claim and also traded for unsurveyed land, giving a gun and pony for a large tract. The grandfather died on the old donation claim. The father also died in the Willamette valley. He had married Miss Eunice Fish, a native of Clackamas county, and her parents were early pioneers of that country. William was educated and reared in the Willamette valley, and, excepting a trip of six months to California, he remained there until 1892. In that year he came to this section and filed on a homestead, which lies one mile north from the store. He cultivated that for several years, and in 1902 decided to embark in the mercantile business. He accordingly erected a commodious two story structure and selected a stock of goods and opened for business. He had a good patronage from the start and is a man of good ability in this enterprise. He possesses a geniality and affability that wins friends and he has the confidence and esteem of the people. In January, 1904, he was appointed postmaster and is giving the best of satisfaction in this capacity.

While in Clackamas county Mr. Gribble married Miss Hattie E. Hodges, a native of Iowa, and to them two children were born, Alta G. and Hazel B., who are with their mother in Los Angeles county, California. Owing to sufficient reason, Mr. Gribble secured a divorce from this woman, and, at The Dalles, on March 18, 1903, he married Mrs. Nettie M. Booth, a native of Maine, and the daughter of Charles Hobart, who is now in Massachusetts, but he was for many years master mechanic for the O. R. & N. at The Dalles. Mr. Gribble has the following named brothers and sisters: Raymond N., Walter J., Elmer W., Martin J., Clarissa E. Cooper, and Kate E. Cooper, and one half brother, Bruce O. Billings, our subject's step-father being Amos Billings. By her former marriage, Mrs. Gribble has two children, Hobart and Leah Booth, both living with our subject and his wife. Mr. Gribble is a member of the United Artisans, and is an influential and active Republican. Mrs. Gribble belongs to the Congregational church, while her husband is a member of the Methodist.

REMI RONDEAU is well known in the country adjacent to Kingsley and is a highly esteemed and popular man. He is one of those substantial men who form the boast and strength of any well regulated community and is a man whose labors have always been bestowed wisely and for the upbuilding and improvement of the country and his property. He is a native of the province of Quebec, Canada, and was born on June 11, 1850. His parents are mentioned in the sketch of his brother's life, which appears in this work. In the French schools of his native country, Mr. Rondeau acquired a good education and in 1872, he came to Wasco county, whither his father, his brothers, Leon, Joseph, Edward and his sisters, Delia Celia and Louisa, came five years later. The mother had died in Vermont where the family dwelt for some time. Mr. Rondeau immediately took up land upon reaching this place and soon thereafter purchased railroad land and now has an estate of four hundred and forty acres. It is good land and half of it is bearing bounteous crops of wheat and other cereals. A portion of the land was disputed between the railroad and the government and finally the title became settled. Mr. Rondeau has given his attention to the cultivation of his farm and has succeeded well, having now a choice farm, well improved with fine new dwelling and other accessories needful on a first class place. He has always shown a marked interest in the affairs of the county, state and nation, as well as laboring untiringly for the betterment of educational facilities. He gave freely of his time for this good end and progress in all lines is his motto. In 1888, Mr. Rondeau suffered a stroke of paralysis in his lower limbs and of late it has grown so that he is confined to a wheel chair. It is one of those things in life which reason cannot compass, but to which the heart can only bow in submission. Mr. Rondeau has manifested a spirit of resignation and his life has endeared him to all.

At The Dalles, on July 3, 1882, Mr. Rondeau married Miss Jessie McLeod, who was born in Michigan. Her father and mother, Alexander and Ellen McLeod, were born in Ontario, and Wales, respectively. The father is descended from Scotch ancestry. They now live at Ashland, Oregon. Mrs. Rondeau has two half sisters, Mrs. Allie Bessoni and Mrs. Annie Herbert. To Mr. and Mrs. Rondeau four children have been born: Remon, aged twenty-one, and now on the farm at home; Nellie, Minnie, and Annie, aged respectively, six, twelve, and ten, and all now deceased. Mr. Rondeau is a Republican and has always labored for the success of his party. He is a great reader and has acquired a mastery of the English language, both in speaking and writing, that shows an attention and studiousness commendable.

CAPTAIN AMBY S. BLOWERS, well known and highly respected, is one of the leading business men and the mayor of Hood River. He is a merchant of experience and ability and has enjoyed a large patronage in his business in the years that have gone by, but at present he is not personally active in these relations, although interested in the Hayness Hardware Company of this town. He stands as one of the prominent men of Wasco county and has displayed integrity and stamina that commend him to all good people.

Amby S. Blowers was born in East Otto, Cattaraugus county, New York, on December 31, 1845, and is the son of Asa S. and Charlotte (Heth) Blowers, natives respectively of Bennington, Vermont, and Washington county, New York.

The first Blowers who is recorded as visiting the New World is Thomas, who landed at Boston, in 1635, having sailed in the ship, Truelove from England. This patriarch's son, Thomas Blowers, Jr., was a ship master, and in partnership with his brother-in-law, Andrew Belcher, owned the ship, Adventure. Thomas Blowers, Jr., purchased a house and four and one-half acres of land at the corner of Brattle and Mason streets, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1672. There he died in June, 1709. His son, the third Thomas, graduated from Harvard in 1695 and was the second preacher at Beverly, Massachusetts. John Blowers, the son of this last named man, died at the siege of Louisburg, a lieutenant in the British army. Lieutenant Blowers' son, Sampson S., graduated from Harvard in 1763 and was for thirty-six years chief justice of Nova Scotia. His death occurred in Halifax, in 1842, being aged one hundred and one years. Six of this venerable jurist's brothers and cousins were patriots in Washington's army and displayed that true zeal and love of country which assisted so to win the day. One of these cousins, William by name, had a son named Solomon, who fought with eleven others of the Blowers family from New York state, in the war of 1812. Solomon Blowers married and raised a family, among which was Andrew Blowers, who in turn begat Asa S. Blowers, the father of our subject. Andrew Blowers was a native of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Asa S. Blowers, his son, was a prominent merchant and died when thirty-one. Our subject well remembers sitting on the knee of his great-grandfather, Solomon Blowers, when that patriot related the thrilling times of 1812 and subsequent years. Thus is traced a chain of patriots, pioneers, professional men, scholars and artisans, in whose breasts burned that love of country which inspired the action leading to independence and this great nation, that is calculated to stir the hearts of descendants, now remote, with true pride for their forefathers and a determination to achieve also, things worthy to be remembered by those yet to come. The full record of the family is given in Savage's Genealogical Dictionary of New England Families, and they were among the prominent ones of colonial days.

Captain Blowers' maternal grandfather, Jacob Heth, came from a prominent old southern family, which traces its early ancestry to the rugged hills of Sotia. His daughter, the mother of our subject, is still living in Minnesota, advanced in age.

At Preston, Minnesota, on April 18, 1866, Mr. Blowers married Miss Ellen L. Damon, a native of Vermont. She comes from a prominent New England family and has one sister living, Lucinda, the widow of David Reed, at Granger, Minnesota. She also has one brother, Alonzo M., at Hebron, Illinois. Mr. Blowers has one sister, Anis, the wife of Joseph Fountain. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Blowers: Lawrence, mentioned elsewhere in this work; Laura M., the wife of William Yates, the postmaster of Hood River; Charlotte E., wife of Charles Early, manager of the Mt. Hood Lumber Company, at Hood River; Amelia E., the wife of John R. Nickelsen, a blacksmith; Eva B., wife of William Haynes, a hardware merchant in Hood River; Samuel M., the partner of Mr. Haynes, in Hood River; Blanche and Aubry S., at home.

Mr. Blowers is a member of the A. F. & A. M., the R. A. M., and the G. A. R., being officer of the day in the latter order.

In December, 1862, Mr. Blowers enlisted in the Sixteenth United States regulars and served for four months. On October 19, 1863, he enlisted in Company A, Second Minnesota Cavalry, under Captain R. A. Fields. His honorable discharge occurred on April 3, 1866. He had participated in the heat of the great Civil War, and for one year after its close, he was detailed to fight Indians on the frontier and participated in the Black Hills struggle, being much of the time on scout duty. He was also at times in his career associated with the noted Buffalo Bill, Major William F. Cody.

For twelve years in Minnesota, Mr. Blowers was county commissioner, and for four years he filled that important position in Wasco county. He is school director at this time and has been in that office since he was twenty-one. In December, 1904, Captain Blowers was chosen mayor of Hood River. He was mayor of New York Mills, Minnesota, and has been city councilman six years in Hood River. He is a staunch Republican, serves in both county and state conventions, and is an influential and active man.

Captain Blowers organized Company D, Oregon National Guards, and held the office of captain for three years. In April, 1904, with his son, Samuel, and his son-in-law, William Haynes, he organized the Haynes Hardware Company and purchased the hardware business of E. E. Savage & Sons. They enlarged the business and are now handling a fine patronage. They expect in the near future to still further enlarge their business and will have one of the most complete stocks in this part of the state. Captain Blowers has a good interest in the business, but is not personally active in its operations. The splendid success he has achieved in the business world and the enviable standing he now enjoys indicate the manner of man and place him as one of the leading men of Wasco county.

JOHN D. WHITTEN, a progressive and substantial citizen of Wasco county, dwells about one mile north from Kingsley. He owns a choice farm there and does general farming and stock raising. He has been quite successful owing to his industry and sagacity, being a man of ability and energy. He handles about a section of land, much of it to grain and hay, and raises considerable stock, all graded and thoroughbred. His horses, Cleveland Bays, are among the best to be found in this part of the country. At the head of the band was a choice Cleveland Bay stallion, imported by Ladd & Reed, of Portland, Duke of Wenlock, and whose get are among the best horses of this part of the county. Recently this valuable animal died. Mr. Whitten also handles some cattle, and raises a great many hogs. He breeds the Poland China, having a choice registered boar of that blood. The improvements of the place show thrift and up-to-date methods, while Mr. Whitten is considered one of the best farmers of this part of the county.

John D. Whitten was born in county Armagh, Ireland, on August 29, 1845, the son of John and Jane (Douglass) Whitten. The father was born in the same county as our subject, as were his ancestors for many generations back. The family originally came from Holland. The father had one brother, a clergyman in the English church, but the balance of the family was Presbyterian in faith. The mother of John D. was born in county Monaghan, Ireland, and her ancestors were natives of that county for many generations back. Our subject was educated in public and private schools and was trained by his father on the farm. When twenty-six, he came to the United States and settled in Philadelphia, where he was city salesman to the trade for a wholesale house for five years. Then he went to New York, and travelled in the south and west as salesman for M. Lineau & Co. After eighteen months in that business, he went to Edgar, Nebraska, and opened a lumber yard, where he was occupied until 1884, the year he came to this county. For a time after coming here he wrought manufacturing furniture for the farmers, then rented a farm, and later bought the place where he now resides. To this he has added by purchase until he has one half section, and in addition he rents some land. He cultivates about four hundred acres of grain land.

In Philadelphia, on January 16, 1876, Mr. Whitten married Miss Isabella, daughter of Thomas and Emily (Geary) Whitten, and a native of county Derry, Ireland. Her father was born in county Armagh and there remained until his death. The mother was born in Market Hill, Ireland, and died at the home of our subject, aged ninety-three. Mr. Whitten has brothers and sisters, named as follows: William J., George, Mrs. Martha J. McCormick, Mrs. Elizabeth Scott, Mrs. Mary Scott, Mrs. Sarah A. Rantin, and Mrs. Isabella Edgar. Mrs. Whitten was one of four children. To our subject and his wife four children have been born: Andrew, a student at Philomath college, Oregon; John A. and Edith L., twins, the former at home and the latter a student in college with her elder brother; Harry, at home. Mr. Whitten and his wife belong to the United Brethren church, as do Andrew and Edith. He is a class leader and is a prominent and influential man both in this capacity and in the neighborhood. In political matters, he is a Republican and is often at the conventions, and has held various offices. He is a well read man and keeps well abreast of the advancing times.

HORACE S. RICHMOND, who resides at Mt. Hood, is one of the prosperous and enterprising farmers of this valley, and owns and operates a place which is valuable and highly productive. He was born in Springfield, Ohio, on May 12, 1855. His father, Shephard W. Richmond, was born at Sherburne Falls, Massachusetts, and his parents were natives of the same place and from a prominent New England family. He married Miss Lucretia Patch, a native of Wakefield, Massachusetts. The Patch family dates back to colonial days and Johnson Patch, the father of Mrs. Richmond, fought under Ethan Allen. The ancestors of our subject are all deceased, as are his brothers and sisters. He was married in New Hampshire, on September 11, 1879, to Martha A. Bailey, a native of Brookline, New Hampshire. The Bailey family came from Great Britain in 1635, and were of Scotch-Irish extraction. Our subject was educated in the public schools of Ohio and New Hampshire, whither the father removed. He was a skilled cabinetmaker and carpenter. During the Civil war he enlisted in an Ohio regiment and served with distinction in that struggle. Horace S. remained with his father until the latter's death in Brookline, then went to Reading, Massachusetts, and wrought at cabinetmaking. This was in 1886, and three years later, he came to Spokane, it being just after the fire, and followed various occupations until he journeyed to Whatcom, one year later. Laundry work engaged him a year and next we find him in Portland, city salesman for Beach & Company, paint merchants. He remained with them until 1893, when he came to Hood River valley and filed on the place where he now resides. He has cleared twenty acres and raises diversified crops. Mr. Richmond has been in partnership with Willard W. Nason, and together they owned half a section. They have sold one quarter and are now giving their attention to the development and cultivation of the other one hundred and sixty acres. Mr. Nason is a native of Maine and is an industrious agriculturist of the valley. Politically, our subject is a Republican and stanch, but not especially active in the campaigns.

Since the above was written, Mr. Richmond sold his farm to B. F. Gray, and will make his home in Hood River. He contemplates entering the mercantile world, and his sterling business ability will insure success in his ventures.

JOHN H. FITZPATRICK, who is at present head bookkeeper for Van Duyn & Adams, was born in Tygh valley, Oregon, where he is now engaged. He has been practically reared here and his education was received from the public schools and from the business college of Portland. The date of his birth is November 26, 1879. His father, Edward C. Fitzpatrick, came across the plains with his parents to California when a young lad. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was accidentally killed while crossing the plains to California, after a visit to the east. Edward C. came on to Oregon with an uncle and for a time rode the range for Pete French, in Harney county and vicinity. Then he married Miss Malinda Steers and they settled in the Bakeoven country and engaged in stock raising. When his mother was on a visit to her mother, Mrs. A. H. McAtee, here in Tygh valley, our subject was born, but the family did not come here until the early eighties. Then the father bought land here and raised stock. The family home was here until recently. The father sold all his interests and removed to Klamath county where he is now freighting. John H. was associated with his father in stock raising, mostly sheep, for the last few years and they made their sale of all the property on November 1, 1903. Previous to that time, our subject had been engaged with the firm where he is now, occasionally, but last November he accepted a permanent position with the house and there is engaged at this time. His mother was born in Illinois and crossed the plains with her parents in early days. Her mother, now Mrs. McAtee, resides in Tygh valley. Mr. Fitzpatrick has two sisters, Maud and Lois, both with their parents in Klamath county. In political matters, Mr. Fitzpatrick is a Democrat and is well posted in the issues of the day and takes an intelligent part in the campaigns. He is affiliated with the I. O. O. F., the M. W. A., and the Royal Neighbors. He is a popular citizen and has many friends.

LUCERN B. KELLY. On December 28, 1865, it was announced to Hampton and Margaret (Fitch) Kelly that a son was born to them, and that individual is the gentleman whose name is at the head of this sketch. Multnomah county was the native place of Lucern B. and his education was received from the schools of Portland, the Clinton Kelly school, which was situated on his grandfather's donation claim, being the place where the major portion of the training was received. After he had arrived at man's estate, Mr. Kelly came east of the mountains with his father and took land, a homestead, a timber culture claim and later bought railroad land until he owns at this writing sixteen hundred acres of good soil. It is located on Juniper flat, and is utilized both for grain raising and for handling stock. Mr. Kelly is a man of enterprise and intelligence and has made a first class success in his labors. He stands well in the community and is a respected citizen. In stock raising Mr. Kelly has been prosperous and each year he turns off lots of hogs, Poland China, and also winters many cattle. This year he had about one hundred and twenty-five, and among them are three registered Hereford bulls, all excellent animals. He also owns a fine Percheron stallion, a beauty, one of the finest horses in the county. He has a band of horses, grades, and all his stock is of the best. Mr. Kelly cultivates about two hundred acres of land each year, and has good returns from the same.

On December 28, 1893, Mr. Kelly married Miss Zilpha Snodgrass, a native of Wasco, Oregon. To this marriage one son, Floyd, aged ten, has been born. Mrs. Kelly's parents, Joseph P. and Arvesta A. (Stearns) Snodgrass, crossed the plains with ox teams and now dwell on Juniper flat four miles distant from her home. She has the following named brothers and sisters; Merton J., Elmer, Clyde, Ralph, Fay, Tina, and Lena. Mr. Kelly has three brothers and one sister, Plympton J., Linus, Lester and Mrs. Helen Manley. In politics, Mr. Kelly is Republican and always active. He has held various offices and is frequently at the conventions.

HAMPTON KELLY, deceased. A fitting tribute to the memory of Hampton Kelly is called for in a work of this character, since he was a pioneer of this country, since he was a man of integrity and uprightness and since the people had learned to love him as a good and kind man, as he was. He was born on April 16, 1830, in Kentucky. His father, Clinton Kelly, was also born in Kentucky, and his father, the grandfather of our subject, was a patriot in the Revolution. They all came across the plains to Oregon in 1848 and the father and son both took donation claims in what is now East Portland. Later Clinton Kelly donated an acre of this claim for the school now known as the Clinton Kelly graded school of Portland. The father and son were both prominent and influential people in Portland and were very progressive, public spirited and enterprising. They were always the ones to head any general improvement or movement for the good of the city and the people. Both were generous men and were very liberal in supporting and founding churches, being true blue Methodists, and also in supporting every measure that had for its end the betterment of the people and the community. In 1875, Clinton Kelly was called to the world beyond. He died as he had always lived, a devout and trusting Christian, and the time of his demise was a day of sincere mourning far and near, for by his kindness and generosity, Clinton Kelly had endeared himself to all, and everyone was aware that a true, noble, and good man had that day gone from their midst.

On account of the asthma, our subject came east of the mountains in 1879, and from that time until 1881, he was back and forth between Juniper flat and Portland. Finally, on August 7, 1881, he brought all of his family hither and settled down. He became the proprietor of about sixteen hundred acres of good land and made his headquarters here until the day of his death. It was on October 16, 1898, that the summons came for Hampton Kelly to resign the duties of life and come to a better world. He was willing to go and passed quietly into the realities of the world that is to be. Like his father, his life had been filled with good deeds, and he had won the hearts of all who knew him. He left a widow and the children mentioned in L. B. Kelly's sketch to mourn his demise.

On March 22, 1827, in Coshocton county,

Ohio, Margaret Fitch was born to David and Sarah (Wiggins) Fitch, natives of Pennsylvania and Virginia, respectively. In 1844, the family came on to Illinois, where the father died two years later and the mother in 1847. Being thus left without a home, Margaret decided to accompany a brother and some friends to California. Accordingly they all set out on the trip, but upon arriving at the point where the Oregon trail branched from the old California road, they were confronted with rumors of great sickness in California, and so they turned aside to Oregon. At the crossing of the Snake, the brother was persuaded to try and float down the Snake with caked wagon beds, but owing to many portages, he was forced to abandon the scheme. However, he arrived in The Dalles before his sister and friends, and together they came down the Columbia in scows. This was in the year 1852. Miss Fitch began to cast about for employment and met Clinton Kelly, who wished to hire her services. She wrought for them some time and then occurred the marriage of Hampton Kelly and Miss Margaret Fitch, the date being January 30, 1853. The nuptials were celebrated in the old Clinton Kelly log house on the donation claim. The date of Miss Fitch's arrival in Portland, which was then a town of six hundred people, was November 11, 1852. She was a faithful helpmeet to her husband until the day of his death and since then has conducted the estate in a becoming manner. She is highly esteemed in the neighborhood and is a faithful Christian woman.

JEFFERSON N. MOSIER, a real estate dealer at Mosier, Oregon, is a man whose life has practically been spent in Wasco county. He was born here on September 28, 1860, the son of Jonah H. and Jane (Rollins) Mosier, who are mentioned elsewhere in this work. The father hired George J. Ryan, a well educated Irish gentleman, as tutor of his children for twelve years. Jefferson was with his father until 1876, then went to Walla Walla and worked in a furniture store for one year and in a meat market for two years, learning thoroughly meat cutting. When the O. R. & N. came through here he returned to Wasco county and was engaged with the engineer corps as a helper until the road was completed. Then he accepted a position with Dubois & King, handling all their meat supplies for their boarding houses on the Northern Pacific. After that, he was employed in a market in The Dalles for two years and finally retired to a farm of one hundred and seventy acres which his father had given him. He improved the same and also did stock raising. Recently Mr. Mosier sold this property and moved to Mosier station where he had purchased one hundred and twenty acres of the old Mosier estate from the heirs a few years before. This he has platted and recorded as the Town of Mosier. Mr. Mosier devotes his attention to disposing of this property and the upbuilding of the town where he has cast his lot. He is still interested in stock raising and has sixty head of cattle. Mosier is beautifully situated on a sloping rise overlooking the Columbia and is starting with good promise of being one of the lively centers of prosperous Wasco county. Mr. Mosier has recently erected an ornate Queen Anne cottage near the old Mosier home and is taking steps to beautify and make popular the town of Mosier.

On February 16, 1889, Mr. Mosier married Miss Mary A. Sivener, who was born in St. Louis, Missouri. The ceremony was performed by Father Bronsgeest. Mrs. Mosier's father, John Sivener, was born in Paris, France, followed cabinet making until November, 1903, when he retired from active business and now resides in Portland. He married Miss Mary A. McNamee, a native of Missouri, of Scotch-Irish ancestry and now dwelling in Portland. Mr. Mosier has the following named brothers and sisters: Mrs. Alice S. Faucette, Mrs. Mary S. Adams, Lydia S., Benjamin F., deceased, Mrs. Emily A. Mansfield, deceased, and Mrs. Josephine E. Willoughby, deceased. Mrs. Mosier has one brother and four sisters, who are now living, Joseph P., Mrs. Jennie T. Glenn, Mrs. Kate M. Bradley, Mrs. Nellie E. Eber, and Mrs. Agnes R. Zander. Mr. and Mrs. Mosier have no children of their own but have adopted one, Alice K., the daughter of Mrs. Mosier's sister, Mrs. Lizzie A. Kaega, who is deceased. Mr. Mosier is a member of the K. P., the I. O. O. F., the M. W. A., and the United Artisans. Mr. Mosier remembers well the trying and dangerous times of early days.

DAVID R. COOPER, who resides at Mount Hood, is one of the largest land owners in that section and has the distinction of being a pioneer farmer and settler in this portion of the valley. He was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, on December 9, 1845, the son of George and Eliza (Kid) Cooper, both natives of Scotland, where they remained until their death. The father came from an old Highland family that had dwelt in Aberdeenshire for over three hundred years. After receiving a good education in his own country and remaining there until 1872, our subject came to the United States, landing in Oakland, Oregon, where he joined his brother, James T., who had crossed the plains with burros and jacks in 1849. He took his citizen papers out at Roseburg, in 1873, then bought a farm near his brother and remained on it for ten years. In 1882, he came over the mountains from The Dalles to the place where the settlement of Mount Hood is now located. There were then no roads and no settlers except two bachelors, Sam Baldwin and Harry Teimen, the latter now deceased. Mr. Cooper selected a quarter section and filed on the same. A few months thereafter, he made the acquaintance of Captain H. C. Coe, and made arrangements to build a road from this settlement to Mount Hood. They completed it and then sold to William Ladd, of Portland. They soon brought settlers here in great numbers and tourists constantly and Mr. Cooper is justly entitled to the credit of opening up and building up of this country. A few months later, Mr. Cooper's wife and six children joined him and they were the first family to settle in this wilderness. He now has a large orchard in the upper settlement, having over three thousand bearing trees. He also has a large pear orchard. He still owns a rich quarter, which he homesteaded, except for a half acre, which was donated for school purposes. He was a leading spirit in the organization of district number six, and started the school and since has been director almost constantly. In political matters, Mr. Cooper is independent, reserving for his own decision all the questions of the day without being trammelled by party lines. He has been a delegate to the various conventions and is an influential man.

At Glasgow, Scotland, on September 13, 1870, Mr. Cooper married Miss Marion Porteous, who was born in Hollytown, Scotland. Her father, John Porteous, was a native of the same place as also were his ancestors for many generations back. He died there in 1901 and his widow still lives there. Mr. Cooper has the following named brothers and sisters, James T., John, Robert, Ann Perkins and Isabella, in Scotland. Mrs. Cooper's brothers and sisters are John, James, Alexander, Daniel, Mary, Christina, Jessie and Margaret, all in Scotland. To our subject and his wife, ten children have been born; James T., in Scotland, and now a sheep man at The Dalles; Warren, John, George and David, at home; Wyoming, the wife of James A. Cook, a farmer at Hood River; Christina, married to Elmer Gribble, a farmer at Mount Hood; Lizzie, May and Hattie, at home. For six years after the road was opened, Mr. Cooper followed the business of guiding parties to Mount Hood and also operated a tent hotel for tourists. He has labored faithfully during the years of his residence here and has secured a fine competence as the result of his industry. He is a leading man in the community and deserves the esteem and confidence of the people which are generously given.

JAMES J. LEWIS is a farmer at Mosier, Oregon. He was born near Harrisburg, in Linn county, Oregon, on September 11, 1857. His father, John Lewis, was born near Gallipolis, Ohio, and his father, the grandfather of our subject, owned a large grist mill there. He was a native of Pennsylvania and came from a prominent American family. Our subject's father came to Oregon in 1847 and settled first in Portland, where he had a donation claim in what is called Goose Hollow and is now a choice residence part of Portland. He sold out later and bought a pack train and transported goods from Portland to Yreka, California, and from The Dalles to the Salmon river country and to many other points. In 1852, he was ambushed by Indians who destroyed his train and killed two of his men. He was forced to flee for his life and after great destitution found his way to General Joe Hooker's headquarters, who gave him succor and finally secured a contract for him to build the Cow creek canyon road. He made thirty-five hundred dollars on this enterprise and with that, started in the stock business in which he continued until his death. In 1864, he was engaged in the steamboat business on the Willamette with Church, McCully and others. He was a member of the A. F. & A. M. He married Martha W. Howard, a native of Harrisburg, Oregon, and the daughter of James Howard, who crossed the plains with his family in 1844, and was a gun and blacksmith at Whitman station. The Indians, who killed Dr. Whitman, guided Mr. Howard and his family to Portland. The guide and other Indians considered Mr. Howard a supernatural being, owing to his skill in working metals and this accounted for his act of guiding them to safety. His name was Telokite or Teloket and he said Dr. Whitman was cultus. The family were afraid of him and were glad when they reached civilization. When crossing the streams, he would carry Mrs. Lewis, who was then a girl, on his shoulders. They came past where Mosier and other settlements are now located in this vicinity. Our subject's father married in 1856 and after his death his widow married Jonah H. Mosier, in 1865. She died at The Dalles, on September 25, 1903, after an illness of nine years. She was a consistent member of the Methodist church, a woman of strong character and highly esteemed. Our subject was educated in the public schools in the various places where he lived and now resides with his half sister, Dollie C. Mosier, on the old Mosier estate. He has two sisters, Mrs. Emma Taylor and Mrs. Ida Cook, one step-brother, Jefferson N. Mosier, and three step-sisters, who are mentioned elsewhere. Mr. Lewis is a member of the M. W. A. and the United Artisans. He is a Democrat in political belief but not especially active. After completing his education in The Dalles high school, he engaged in stock raising and owned thirteen hundred acres in the Klickitat county. After that, he came to the place where he now resides and has continued here since. It is an estate of thirteen hundred acres and is owned by our subject, his half-sister and three other heirs, Lewis and Mosier's children. Miss Dollie C. Mosier was born in the original house on this estate, which later burned, and was educated in the convent at The Dalles. She began teaching when sixteen years of age at Bakeoven and other places, then completed her education and after graduation, taught in various sections. She keeps the inn and is a highly esteemed lady.

CLINTON L. GILBERT is one of the most enterprising and successful educators in the state of Oregon. Should he do no more in this important field, he has already accomplished sufficient to place his name indelibly on the records in the state of Oregon as one of the leading men of his day. At present he is proprietor of the Mount Hood hotel at Hood River, which is under the management of his son and doing a good business.

Clinton L. Gilbert was born in Mount Blanchard, Ohio, on January 26, 1859, the son of James H. and Phœbe A. (Wingate) Gilbert, natives of Pennsylvania and Ohio, respectively. The father was a contractor and enlisted in 1862, in Company B, Ninety-ninth Ohio Volunteers, as second lieutenant. He served for ten months and then was killed at the battle of Murfreesboro. His father came from England and is a well known builder and contractor. Our subject studied in the common schools of Mount Blanchard and when less than sixteen years of age began teaching, having secured a county certificate. Later, he spent three years at a normal school at Lebanon, Ohio, then studied medicine at the Miami Medical College. After this, he taught again in Ohio and Kansas until 1887 then went to Los Angeles and took a position in the faculty of the Los Angeles Business College, the training school. Later, he was principal of the same and in 1889 came to Oregon and immediately took up teaching. He was for two years the principal in the public schools in Hood River and in 1894, was appointed deputy county assessor and assistant county school examiner and in this latter position, he served for five years. In 1895, he was deputy county clerk and in 1896 was elected school superintendent of Wasco county, holding the same for eight years, being reelected twice. He has been instrumental in establishing libraries in every district school in Wasco county. Mr. Gilbert was appointed secretary of the Oregon State Teacher's Association and in this capacity formulated a plan of holding uniform examinations for the eighth grade throughout the state. The practicability and benefit of the same was immediately seen and the plan was adopted and under the efficient direction of state school superintendent, Ackerman, it was carried out successfully throughout the entire state. The benefit derived from this will be readily seen when it is understood that pupils having completed the eighth grade receive diplomas which will entitle them to higher instructions in any part of the state, this being a great stimulus for the youth to complete the grades. It is working admirably throughout the state. At the present time, Wasco county is leading the entire state, as shown in the school exhibit at the world's fair at St. Louis.

In 1900, Mr. Gilbert bought the hotel which his son now operates.

On December 14, 1878, Mr. Gilbert married Miss May A. Wells, who was born December 10, 1861 in Henry county, Ohio, where her wedding occurred. Her parents, James and Clara (Scribner) Wells, were natives of Ohio. The father was killed in the Civil War when this daughter was two years old. The mother is a member of the well known Scribner family. Mr. Gilbert has three brothers, Melville S., J. M., and Zealand T. The latter died in 1895. Mrs. Gilbert has two brothers, Clarence E. and Frank W. Our subject and his wife have two children, Maude F., the wife of Fred H. Shoemaker, manager of the Washington Life Insurance Company at Pendleton, Oregon, and Clarence F.

Mr. Gilbert is a member of the A. F. & A. M., the K. P. and the A. O. U. W. He is a staunch Republican and influential in the conventions, besides being a very active laborer for educational affairs.

HON. JONAH H. MOSIER, deceased. The records of the Mosier (Moser) family have been twice destroyed by fire, therefore but little, comparatively, can now be obtained. Some time in the seventeenth century members of the family came from Germany and landed on Chesapeake Bay, Maryland. Some time before their emigration eighteen million dollars left by early ancestors was given to the Catholic church instead of being divided among the heirs, as they would not conform to some requirements of the bequest. This points out to what church the Mosier's originally adhered. Our subject was probably married in Maryland and had a family of six children. They had five sons and one daughter, Jonah H., born March 10, 1821, being the youngest. The mother died when he was an infant and the family moved to Fayette county, Pennsylvania and some years later came to Ohio, settling in what is now Crestline Crossing. In 1839, we find our subject's father in Platte county, Missouri, he having in the meantime married a widow, with two sons, whose name was Leveridge. Two sons of the family remained in Ohio and one died there. Jonah served an apprenticeship with a cabinet maker and later, they moved to Gentry, Missouri, the date of this, being about 1844. Our subject followed carpentering there and also clerked in a dry goods store. He later became one of the proprietors of the store and soon afterwards went to Clay county, where he met Miss Jane Rollins, whom he married on May 14, 1846. In 1849, a party of six or seven young men, among them, J. H. Mosier, formed a partnership and equipped themselves for the gold fields of California. After a hard trip they arrived at their destination and for some time, made and sold hay. The partners refused to assist him and he did all by his own personal efforts, making a good stake for himself. Eighteen months later, he returned home by way of Panama. In the early months of 1851, his father died, probably in Nodaway county. In April, 1853, Mr. Mosier joined an emigrant train then fitting for Oregon and in company with a friend, Hiram Smith, made the long trip with his wife and children to the Pacific slope. He arrived at The Dalles with one dollar and seventy-five cents in cash and three head of oxen, three having died while on the way, one cow and an old, worn out wagon. Nothing daunted, however, he cast about for some occupation. The Dalles was a military post and the only store was kept in a large tent with a hewed log for a counter. Only two dwellings were in evidence and some tents completed the entire settlement. Mr. Mosier took hold as a builder erecting a store for W. D. Bigelow and another for M. M. Cushing and Lowe. After that, he put up several dwellings and with Col. N. H. Gates and Judge Laughlin laid out a town. Owing to a scarcity of building material,

Mr. Mosier saw the opportunity of supplying the same and early in 1855, sought out a mill site which he found sixteen miles below The Dalles on a stream tributary to the Columbia. Here he took a donation claim and this was the headquarters for the remainder of his life and here he lies buried beside his faithful wife who preceded him to the grave twenty-nine years. His death occurred in 1894, when he was aged seventy-four. He erected a mill in 1855 in partnership with Thomas Davis. There was money in the lumber business and also there was very much hardship and trial and labor connected with the same. His family increased, expenses were high, the Indians troubled him and all these things had to be overcome. Mr. Mosier never used a gun or a knife upon the savages and never knew fear. When they were committing their depredations he would appear in their midst and with telling blows from his first or club scatter them. Owing to this and also to his just and fair treatment of them, they learned to respect him. The firm took another partner, Mr. Noah Mull. Later, Mr. Mosier bought Mr. Davis' interest and finally purchased the interest of Mr. Mull. A freshet carried away the mill, which however was soon rebuilt. In those days, lumber sold for fifty dollars per thousand but it was an expensive proposition to produce it. However, little by little, Mr. Mosier improved his place and good buildings replaced the log cabins. His home was headquarters for travelers and many were entertained in those days. His better buildings were burned and later he erected a fine, modern, two story structure, which still stands. In the spring of 1862, Mr. Mosier went into the Caribou country, with cattle, being accompanied by a partner, who died at Deep Creek, British Columbia, in that year. Our subject realized a handsome profit in this venture, and in 1865 he again gathered a herd of cattle and went to the Kootenai mines where he established butcher shops in the various camps, where he made a small fortune with his partner, E. D. Warbass. Late in the fall, he learned that his wife had died during the summer, and he hastened to collect what he could of the outstanding indebtedness and placing the balance in the hands of his partner hurried home in December. He never received any further returns from the business he had left. However, in the next year he gathered another herd of cattle, going to the Willamett valley to purchase the same. There, he met his old friend, Hiram Smith, who introduced him to a fascinating young widow, Mrs. Lewis, who had three children and to whom he was married on December 16, 1866. His seven children at home and these three, with two more that were born made an even dozen for Mr. Mosier to look after. In 1867, he drove his cattle to Montana but did not realize so well on the venture. In 1868, he drove another bunch to that territory. Mr. Mosier was chosen representative to the territorial legislature and in politics, he was a staunch Democrat. His death occurred on October 5, 1894. Jane (Rollins) Mosier was the daughter of Lee and Susan (Penn) Rollins, being the second child in a family of fourteen and was born February 14, 1824, near Paris, Kentucky. Her paternal grandfather, Joshua Rollins, married Sophia Kennedy, who came from old Virginia and Pennsylvania families. John Kennedy, the father of Sophia, fought in the Revolution and with a neighbor was taken prisoner at Guilford courthouse and held on the old Jersey prisonship until his death, then being buried by the British in the sand of the seashore. Lee Rollins and Susan Penn were married in Paris, Kentucky. In 1830, they removed to Clay county, Missouri where they remained until their death. All of their fourteen children, except one, who was accidentally poisoned, lived to become the honored heads of large and respected families. The maternal grandparents of Jane (Rollins) Mosier, were Joseph and Charlotte (Aker) Penn, natives of Pennsylvania, Joseph being a direct descendant of the noted William Penn. Thus in the union of Jonah Mosier and Jane Rollins, two long lines of pioneers joined their fortunes to form another pioneer family. While the greater part of Oregon was yet an unbroken wilderness, teeming with hostile savages, Mr. and Mrs. Mosier pushed their way into the untrodden wilderness and made a home amid the crags of the Cascade mountains. Their first dwelling was situated on the banks of the broad Columbia, and these two faithful pioneers toiled steadily on until called to rest. From a family of seven children, four are still living, three daughters and one son. Two daughters by the second marriage also reside in Oregon. At the time of the Indian massacre at the Cascades when so many pioneers were killed, the Mosier family fled in the middle of the night on horseback over the almost impassable roads, to the fort at The Dalles. Mr. Mosier was shot at many times and although the bullets grazed his body, he was never seriously injured. Much rest and peace were enjoyed when finally the cruelties of the savages were put down and people were assured that they would not be driven from their homes in the midst of the night by murderous redskins. Mr. Mosier was a faithful man and did his work well. He was a member of the A. F. & A. M., a zealous laborer for educational advantages, a genuine path finder and a noble man. Although he made several fortunes during his life time, he died in only reasonable circumstances. The estate of one thousand acres was largely wild land, which has been improved by his son since. At the present time, a town is growing up on the old donation claim, called Mosier, the same being promoted by his only living son.
